A PLEA FOR SOFT WORDS.

BY ALICE CAREY.

Strange and subtle are the influences which affect the spirit and touch the heart. Are there bodiless creatures around us, moulding our thoughts into darkness or brightness, as they will? Whence, otherwise, come the shadow and the sunshine, for which we can discern no mortal agency?

Often, as we grow older, come the shadows; less frequently the sunshine. Ere I took up my pen, I was sitting with a pleasant company of friends, listening to music, and speaking, with the rest, light words.

Suddenly, I knew not why, my heart was wrapt away in an atmosphere of sorrow. A sense of weakness and unworthiness weighed me down, and I felt the moisture gather to my eyes and my lips tremble, though they kept the smile.

All my past life rose up before me, and all my short-comings—all my mistakes, and all my wilful wickedness, seemed pleading trumpet-tongued against me.

I saw her before me whose feet trod with mine the green holts and meadows, when the childish thought strayed not beyond the near or the possible. I saw her through the long blue distances, clothed in the white beauty of an angel; but, alas! she drew her golden hair across her face to veil from her vision the sin-darkened creature whose eyes dropt heavily to the hem of her robe.

O pure and beautiful one, taken to peace ere the weak temptation had lifted itself up beyond thy stature, and compelled thee to listen, to oppose thy weakness to its strength, and to fall—sometimes, at least, let thy face shine on me from between the clouds. Fresh from the springs of Paradise, shake from thy wings the dew against my forehead. We two were coming up together through the sweet land of poesy and dreams, where the senses believe what the heart hopes; our hands were full of green boughs, and our laps of cowslips and violets, white and purple. We were talking of that more beautiful world into which childhood was opening out, when that spectre met us, feared and dreaded alike by the strong man and the little child, and one was taken, and the other left.

One was caught away sinless to the bosom of the Good Shepherd, and one was left to weep pitiless tears, to eat the bread of toil, and to think the bitter thoughts of misery,—left “to clasp a phantom and to find it air.” For often has the adversary pressed me sore, and out of my arms has slid ever that which my soul pronounced good: slid out of my arms and coiled about my feet like a serpent, dragging me back and holding me down from all that is high and great.

Pity me, dear one, if thy sweet sympathies can come out of the glory, if the lovelight of thy beautiful life can press through the cloud and the evil, and fold me again as a garment; pity and plead for me with the maiden mother whose arms in human sorrow and human love cradled our blessed Redeemer.

She hath known our mortal pain and passion—our more than mortal triumph—she hath heard the “blessed art thou among women.” My un-availing prayers, goldenly syllabled by her whose name sounds from the manger through all the world, may find acceptance with Him who, though our sins be as scarlet, can wash them white as wool.

Our hearts grew together as one, and along the headlands and the valleys one shadow went before us, and one shadow followed us, till the grave gaped hungry and terrible, and I was alone. Faltering in fear, but lingering in love, I knelt by the death-bed—it was the middle night, and the first moans of the autumn came down from the hills, for the frost specks glinted on her golden robes, and the wind blew chill in her bosom. Heaven was full of stars, and the half moon scattered abroad her beauty like a silver rain. Many have been the middle nights since then, for years lie between me and that fearfulest of all watches; but a shadow, a sound, or a thought, turns the key of the dim chamber, and the scene is reproduced.

I see the long locks on the pillow, the smile on the ashen lips, the thin, cold fingers faintly pressing my own, and hear the broken voice saying, “I am going now. I am not afraid. Why weep ye? Though I were to live the full time allotted to man, I should not be more ready, nor more willing than now.” But over this there comes a shudder and a groan that all the mindfulness of the careless were impotent to drown.

Three days previous to the death-night, three days previous to the transit of the soul from the clayey tabernacle to the house not made with hands—from dishonor to glory—let me turn them over as so many leaves.

The first of the November mornings, but the summer had tarried late, and the wood to the south of our homestead lifted itself like a painted wall against the sky—the squirrel was leaping nimbly and chattering gaily among the fiery tops of the oaks or the dun foliage of the hickory, that shot up its shelving trunk and spread its forked branches far over the smooth, moss-spotted boles of the beeches, and the limber boughs of the elms. Tithé and blithe he was, for his harvest was come.

From the cracked beech-burs was dropping the sweet, angular fruit, and down from the hickory boughs with every gust fell a shower of nuts—shelling clean and silvery from their thick, black hulls.

Now and then, across the stubble-field, with long ears erect, leaped the gray hare, but for the most part he kept close in his burrow, for rude huntsmen were on the hills with their dogs, and only when the sharp report of a rifle rung through the forest, or the hungry yelping of some trailing hound startled his harmless slumber, might you see at the mouth of his burrow the quivering lip and great timid eyes.

Along the margin of the creek, shrunk now away from the blue and gray and yellowish stones that made its cool pavement, and projected in thick layers from the shelving banks, the white columns of gigantic sycamores leaned earthward, their bases driven, as it seemed, deep into the ground—all their convolutions of roots buried out of view. Dropping into the stagnant waters below, came one by one the broad, rose-tinted leaves, breaking the shadows of the silver limbs.

Ruffling and widening to the edges of the pools went the circles, as the pale, yellow walnuts plashed into their midst, for here, too, grew the parent trees, their black bark cut and jagged and broken into rough diamond-work.

That beautiful season was come when

Go gleaming through the woods.”

Two days after this, we said, my dear mate and I, we shall have a holiday, and from sunrise till sunset, with our laps full of ripe nuts and orchard fruits, we shall make pleasant pastime.

Rosalie, for so I may call her, was older than I, with a face of beauty and a spirit that never flagged. But to-day there was heaviness in her eyes, and a flushing in her cheek that was deeper than had been there before.

Still she spoke gaily, and smiled the old smile, for the gaunt form of sickness had never been among us children, and we knew not how his touch made the head sick and the heart faint.

The day looked forward to so anxiously dawned at last; but in the dim chamber of Rosalie the light fell sad. I must go alone.

We had always been together before, at work and in play, asleep and awake, and I lingered long ere I would be persuaded to leave her; but when she smiled and said the fresh-gathered nuts and shining apples would make her glad, I wiped her forehead, and turning quickly away that she might not see my tears, was speedily wading through windrows of dead leaves.

The sensations of that day I shall never forget; a vague and trembling fear of some coming evil, I knew not what, made me often start as the shadows drifted past me, or a bough crackled beneath my feet.

From the low, shrubby hawthorns, I gathered the small, red apples, and from beneath the maples, picked by their slim, golden stems, the notched and gorgeous leaves. The wind fingered playfully my hair, and clouds of birds went whirring through the tree-tops, but no sight nor sound could divide my thoughts from her whose voice had so often filled with music these solitary places.

I remember when first the fear distinctly defined itself. I was seated on a mossy log, counting the treasures which I had been gathering, when the clatter of hoof-strokes on the clayey and hard-beaten road arrested my attention, and looking up—for the wood thinned off in the direction of the highway, and left it distinctly in view—I saw Doctor H——, the physician in attendance upon my sick companion. The visit was an unseasonable one. She whom I loved so might never come with me to the woods any more.

Where the hill sloped to the roadside, and the trees, as I said, were but few, was the village graveyard. No friend of mine, no one whom I had ever known or loved, was buried there—yet with a child's instinctive dread of death, I had ever passed its shaggy solitude (for shrubs and trees grew there wild and unattended) with a hurried step and averted face.

Now, for the first time in my life, I walked voluntarily thitherward, and climbing on a log by the fence-side, gazed long and earnestly within. I stood beneath a tall locust tree, and the small, round leaves, yellow now as the long cloud-bar across the sunset, kept dropping and dropping at my feet till all the faded grass was covered up. There the mattock had never been struck; but in fancy I saw the small leaves falling and drifting about a new and smooth-shaped mound—and choking with the turbulent outcry in my heart, I glided stealthily homeward—alas, to find the boding shape I had seen through mists and shadows, awfully palpable. I did not ask about Rosalie. I was afraid; but with my rural gleanings in my lap, opened the door of her chamber. The physician had preceded me but a moment, and, standing by the bedside, was turning toward the lessening light the little wasted hand, the one on which I had noticed in the morning a small purple spot. “Mortification!” he said, abruptly, and moved away as though his work were done.

There was a groan expressive of the sudden and terrible consciousness, which had in it the agony of agonies—the giving up of all. The gift I had brought fell from my relaxed grasp, and hiding my face in the pillow, I gave way to the passionate sorrow of an undisciplined nature.

When at last I looked up, there was a smile on her lips that no faintest moan ever displaced again.

A good man and a skilful physician was Dr. H——, but his infirmity was a love of strong drink; and, therefore, was it that he softened not the terrible blow which must soon have fallen. I link with his memory no reproaches now, for all this is away down in the past; and that foe, that sooner or later biteth like a serpent, soon did his work, but then my breaking heart judged him hardly. Often yet, for in all that is saddest memory is faithfulest, I wake suddenly out of sleep, and live over that first and bitterest sorrow of my life; and there is no house of gladness in the world that with a whisper will not echo the moan of lips pale with the kisses of death.

Sometimes, when life is gayest about me, an unseen hand leads me apart, and opening the door of that still chamber, I go in—the yellow leaves are at my feet again, and that white hand between me and the light.

I see the blue flames quivering and curling close about the smouldering embers on the hearth. I hear soft footsteps and sobbing voices, and see the clasped hands and placid smile of her who, alone among us all, was untroubled; and over the darkness and the pain, I hear a voice saying, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." Would, dear reader, that you might remember, and I, too, always, the importance of soft and careful words. One harsh or even thoughtlessly chosen epithet may bear with it a weight which shall weigh down some heart through all life. There are for us all nights of sorrow in which we feel their value. Help us, Our Father, to remember it.

THE OLD QUEEN.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER I.

In a small but magnificent cabinet of Hampton Court, sat Elizabeth, the stern old monarch of England. Upon her forehead—darkening the furrows of age—a frown lowered ominously. Her eyes were vivid in their expression, and her thin lips clung together with the tenacity of stern and long endured passion—the iron passion of age, in which there is so much pain.

Around her was everything beautiful and costly enough to gratify even her queenly pride and fastidious taste: hangings of rare old tapestry—cushions glowing with crimson and gold—ebony tables carved to a network and woven over with gold, supporting vases and caskets of the same precious metal, in which the royal jewels were occasionally flung—birds of Paradise, preserved in all the brilliancy of their flowing plumage—and many a rare curiosity from the East filled the royal cabinet. A Persian carpet, gorgeous with arabesque and flowers, covered a small portion of the floor, and upon this stood the great ebony chair, cushioned with purple velvet, in which the old Queen was seated. The light from a large crystal window fell upon her wrinkled brow, shaded, not by the cold and wintry gray of age, but with false ringlets of sunny gold, surmounted by a small crown. Over her bowed but still majestic figure a robe of glowing crimson fell, wave after wave, till it lay a mass of mingled velvet, ermine and jewels, over the cushion on which her foot was pressed. Her withered neck, and the small pale hand, that rested on the arm of her chair, were one blaze of jewels that only kindled up the ravages of time they were intended to conceal. Before her stood a small cabinet of silver, encrusted with a Mosaic of precious stones, whereon lay a jewelled pen and a roll of vellum that seemed to have been freshly written upon.

Everything in the palace seemed moving on with the slow and regular magnificence that always surrounded the Queen. Through an open door which led to the ante-chamber of her withdrawing-room, several pages and yeomen of the guard, in their crimson vestments and golden roses, were moving about with the listless and indifferent air of persons on easy duties. Beyond, might be seen the maids of honor and ladies in attendance, gliding through the gorgeous apartments with that hushed and reverential manner which always bespoke their close neighborhood to royalty. But now even more than usual silence prevailed among the high-born beauties. Many a wistful glance was cast through the open door, and the color paled on each fair cheek, as the old Queen sat with that stern frown upon her features, gazing upon the roll of parchment that her minister, Cecil, had just brought for her signature. She reached forth her hand, took up the parchment, and slowly unrolling it, began to read. The light lay broad upon her face—and those who gazed upon it, saw that a slight change fell upon her features. Some memory seemed busy with her heart—and, heaving a deep sigh, she laid the parchment down upon the cabinet; and while her hand rested on the edge, allowed it to roll together again, while she fell into a deep thought.

All at once, Elizabeth seemed to remember that she was not entirely alone. The form that had been gradually bowed as with oppressing thought, was straightway uplifted. She turned her eagle eyes upon the door, and rising, swept across the room, and closed it with her own hand. And now her aged features were sorely troubled; alternate flashes of fierce passion, and tenderness that seemed almost as wild, shot from her eyes. Great emotion swept aside the infirmities of age for a moment, and she paced the floor of her cabinet with a quick and imperious tread that had been so conspicuous in her first queenly days.

"Why is he thus stubborn?" she muttered, clasping her hands, and then dashing them apart, as if ashamed of the feminine act. "He has the ring!—he has the ring, and yet sends it not! To save his own life, will he not bend that stubborn will—and to his Queen, his loving, too loving mistress?" These words seemed to overwhelm the haughty woman with recollections of the past; a tear started to her eye, and with something of lofty pride, she added—"But if the loss of our love and favor bowed him not, what can be hoped from a fear of death? Is that stronger than—than—" Elizabeth did not finish the sentence, but sinking into her chair, pressed one hand over her eyes, and tears gushed through the jewels that burned upon it.

And Elizabeth gave free course to the tears, that she might indulge in secret without detriment to her queenly pride; for that moment she was all the woman—a weak, trembling, disappointed old woman—in whose wrong heart tenderness had conquered pride. Essex, the petted favorite—the lover of her old age—it was his death-warrant that her counsellors had laid before her. The pen was ready; the deathly black ink welled to the top of her golden standish; the vellum was before her, and lacked nothing but the royal signature. She arose, and while her hands and face were wet with tears, snatched up the scroll with a burst of passionate feeling, and trampled it under her foot.

"May thy Queen perish with thee, Essex—my best, last beloved—if her hand touches this death-paper!" she cried, in a voice that reached the ante-room. "What if thy proud stomach does refuse to send the token—Elizabeth—can forgive the pride her favor has fostered. The lowest man may take life, but mercy is a royal prerogative. Let them gibe, if they dare, and say that the Queen could not shed the blood of him she loved. Ha! what intrusion is this?" she added, crushing the vellum beneath her foot, and dashing aside the tears that hung on her cheek. "Who dares thus force themselves on our privacy?"

As she spoke, Elizabeth drew herself up with more than regal majesty, and awaited the approach of two females dressed in deep mourning, who came tremblingly toward her: one, a tall and beautiful woman in the full bloom and summer of life, but pale from emotion, and trembling like an aspen leaf, in every delicate limb, seemed to grow desperate as she met the eagle eyes of the Queen; clasping her hands with a sort of wild and timid grace, she sprang forward and fell at Elizabeth's feet.

"My Lady of Essex, here—here in our very presence!—and you also, Lady Blunt—or Leicester—or Essex—for of your many husbands, dame, we are puzzled to know whose name besecms you. Have you not both received our command not to approach the court?"

"We did receive it, most gracious Lady—most august Queen," cried the elder female, kneeling by her young and beautiful daughter-in-law, and speaking with that subdued and touching pathos that seems born of the troubled waters in a heart that has been long in breaking. "We did receive it; but despair has made us bold. God, in His mercy, touch your heart in our behalf—for we have no hope save in this disobedience!"

The thin lips of Elizabeth Tudor curled with a cruel and haughty smile. Her rivals—the two rivals of her youth and of her age—were at her feet. The widow of Leicester, her first favorite—the wife of Essex, her last. Ah, how cruelly her heart exulted in the triumphs of that moment! how hard and stern it grew with thought of revenge! An oath broke from her, and she replied, with bitter violence:

"Then in this disobedience let all hope perish!"

"Oh, say not so, great Queen—say not so!" cried the Countess of Essex, lifting her beautiful face from the floor, where it had fallen, in the bitter anguish of her first repulse. "He has been rash—headstrong; but there is not in all England a heart more loyal, nor one that loves your august person so truly."

"Ay," replied Elizabeth, with a bitter sneer, "he proved it, by wedding with thy baby face!"

"Oh, that he had never seen it!" cried the beautiful woman, in a passion of bitter anguish, and burying the reviled features in her hands—for she saw that their very loveliness pleaded against her. "God help me!—I know not how to plead his cause! Will nothing save him? Great Queen, will nothing save him?"

Again that face was lifted from the clasped hands, and the mass of golden ringlets in which it had been for a moment buried. Oh, how piteous, how full of sorrow, were those deep blue eyes, those tender and tremulous lips!

The old Queen shook off the passionate grasp which the wretched woman had fixed upon her garments, and drawing back, bent her keen and disdainful eyes on the poor suppliant, but she made no answer; and Lady Essex read her fate too truly in those stern features. Her hands dropped, and her head sunk forward on her bosom, from which the last gleam of hope had gone forth.

And now the widow of Leicester—the mother of Essex—grew desperate in her anguish. As Elizabeth turned from the lovely form of her last rival to the faded beauty of Essex's mother, a shade of more gentle feeling stole over her face. In those sad and withered features there was nothing to excite envy, or outrage her own self-love. If Elizabeth was old, the suppliant at her feet had also outlived all the bloom and brightness of youth, and a bitter sorrow added its pallor to the marks that time had left.

"And you," said Elizabeth, "methought years ago the Countess of Leicester was informed that her presence would at all times be unwelcome to Elizabeth Tudor."

"I have come," said the Countess, in a voice of meek humility, pathetic with sorrow, but how unlike the passionate grief of Lady Essex! "I have come, knowing that my presence must always be hateful to your Highness."

"And why hateful, pray?" cried the Queen, with a haughty sneer.

"Alas, I know not; for I have ever been an humble and loving subject,—a—a——"

The poor lady paused, for there was something in the Queen's eye that warned her not to tread upon the ground of difference that existed between them. She bent her forehead till it almost touched Elizabeth's feet, and her demeanor was full of humility.

"I know, your Highness, I know that with this bent form and aching heart I am no longer deemed worthy even of that displeasure which sent the most faithful and loyal subject that ever Queen had, to his grave, and now threatens all that is left to me—my last husband and noble son—with a darker death. Oh, that I could but die to save them! How willingly would I be stricken down here at your Majesty's feet!"

There was something in this speech that seemed to move the old Queen. The angry expression of her mouth relaxed a little, and turning her eyes away, she seemed to meditate.

"Oh, Lady, look on me! Am I not sufficiently bereaved?" cried the mother of Essex, sweeping back the raven hair from her temples, where many a silver thread was woven. "My youth was clouded by your displeasure. Must its blight press me to the grave? If so, let me perish, but save my son!"

Still the Queen seemed to ponder: she evidently heard nothing that her rival was saying.

"I was his mother," continued the unhappy woman, "and loved him as only a mother can love. Yet, when he found favor with your Highness—when I saw that his heart was lured by your generous condescension, till even his own mother was as nought, compared to the worship which he lavished upon his Queen, I rejoiced in the sacrifice, and surrendered him willingly—but to death, oh, not to death! Great Queen, say that he is not rendered up to that! It were a cruel return for so much love.”

Elizabeth was now greatly disturbed; she withdrew her garments gently from the suppliant's grasp, and sat down. Once more the woman grew strong against the Queen.

“Your son was a traitor,” she said, “taken with arms in his hands—he has had a fair trial, and death is but justice!”

“He loved you, lady, and your continued displeasure drove him mad!” pleaded the mother, searching eagerly for some shadow of hope in the dim eyes of Elizabeth. “When you condemn him, I can but answer—he was guilty, but he loved you beyond all earthly things.”

“Beyond all earthly things!” cried the Queen, turning her eyes upon the Countess of Essex, who still knelt upon the carpet, pale and hopeless.

The wretched young Countess lifted her eyes at these words, and a mournful smile crossed her lips.

“Spare but his life,” she said, “and I will never see him more—I can give him up—but not to the block—oh God—not to the block!” and, shuddering from head to foot, she sank to her old position again.

The Queen glanced at her with a sort of impatient motion of the head, and then turning to her cabinet, took up a slip of parchment, and wrote upon it. “Take this,” she said, reaching it toward the elder Countess; “it is an order for your admission to the Tower. Go and see your son.”

The Countess of Essex almost sprang to her feet, but sunk down again as she met the stern eyes of Elizabeth, who, remarking the eager joy that sparkled over her face, coldly added: “Go and see your son—but go alone, and when you leave the Tower, come back hither, and then our answer to your prayer shall be given!”

The Dowager Countess took the order, and cast a supplicating glance from the face of the tortured young wife—which was pale and wild with sudden emotions—to that of the Queen.

“The Lady Essex will remain here,” she said, with cruel deliberation, and a grim smile crept over her mouth as she marked the air of keen disappointment with which the poor creature watched her mother-in-law as she rose to depart.

“Oh, for sweet mercy's sake, let me go with her,” cried the agonized wife, as her companion in misery moved toward the door. Mother—mother—plead for me.”

Still upon her knees, the unhappy wife of Essex watched her mother-in-law as she opened the door and disappeared. Her lips were parted, and her eyes grew wild and eager like those of a newly-prisoned bird, when he seeks to dart through the wires of his cage. The Queen watched her narrowly, and that cold smile deepened around her lips. She found inhuman satisfaction in the torture which she was inflicting on the young and suffering wife whom Essex had dared to marry against her own imperious will. The humble position which the suppliant dared not change, unbidden, even if weakness had not chained her to the floor—the look of keen disappointment that settled on her eloquent face, were all sources of cruel pleasure to the iron-hearted Elizabeth. Her revenge on the youth and beauty that had won the love of Essex from herself, seemed almost perfect. Notwithstanding his contumacy and his pride, she could have pardoned him then, but for the thought that her clemency must re-unite him to that beautiful young wife.

For some considerable time, Elizabeth sat fostering her revengeful jealousy in silence. Lady Essex had almost fallen upon the floor, and cowered, rather than knelt, at her enemy's feet. She seemed withered to the heart by the cruel scorn with which her petition for mercy had been received.

At last the Queen arose, and entered her bed-chamber, into which the cabinet opened. With her, all struggle was ended; she had resolved how to act, and left the room with a slow but imperious tread, leaving the poor wife faint and heart-sick with suspense.

Half an hour after, the Queen was in her audience chamber, receiving some foreign ambassadors with more than her usual elaborate courtesy; but the reception soon became wearisome, and her heart grew heavy beneath its weight of jewels. She had offered Essex a last chance for life. Would his pride yield? Would he take advantage of his mother's visit to forward the ring that she had given him years before, as a pledge, that, in any extremity, she would be merciful to him? She began to fear that he might still hold out—that his haughty pride would bend only beneath the keen edge of the axe. Then another doubt entered her heart and fired it with fierce passions again. What if Essex no longer possessed the ring? What if he had parted with her gift as a love-token to some other woman? This doubt became insupportable; and, as she stood there in all the pomp of her regal state, it fastened on her like a bird of prey; she could not shake it off; and when Elizabeth returned to her closet hours after, she was almost as much an object of compassion as the wretched woman whom she had forgotten there.

The Countess of Essex had been alone in that gorgeous little room all the time that Elizabeth was occupied with her court. The torturing suspense of each miserable hour as it crept by, no pen can describe. She had neither strength nor courage to go away, and seating herself upon one of the crimson chairs, remained motionless and heart-sick, waiting for her destiny.

It came at last, for the old Queen entered her cabinet, having dismissed her ladies in waiting, at the door. She too was suffering the stern torture of suspense, and had come there for rest and solitude. The unhappy Countess arose as she saw the Queen. Her clasped hands dropped meekly downwards, and her lips grew pallid, as she was preparing herself for some cruel taunt, some bitter sneer, from the royal lips.

But if Elizabeth could have found it in her heart to increase the affliction that oppressed the poor suppliant, she had no time for such cruelty.

Scarcely had she reached her chair, when an aged gentlewoman of the bed-chamber opened the door, and announced—"The Lady Blunt, Countess Dowager of Leicester." This lady seemed completely exhausted with the terrible sorrows of that weary day. She approached the Queen, tottering in her walk, and knelt at her feet.

"Well," said Elizabeth, sharply, for she was anxious almost as the suppliant at her feet, "our order admitted you, doubtless—and your son: felt he a proper sense of our clemency in granting the visit?"

"He was grateful, and upon his bended knees besought many a blessing upon the mistress who could thus send comfort to an offending servant. He—"

"But the ring—the ring! Why talk of lesser things, woman? If Essex is in truth penitent, he has sent the ring given with our own hand, under a solemn pledge of mercy, even though his crime were deserving death. If he has sent the ring, render it up at once. It should plead his cause against our whole council—nay, against all England!"

"Alas, alas!" said the Countess, "he gave me no ring!"

"Nor mentioned one?" said the Queen, still in a sharp, anxious voice.

"Nor mentioned one," was the faint and heart-broken reply.

"Then God have mercy upon him, for I will have none!"

Elizabeth stooped as she spoke, and took up the roll of parchment, which still lay where she had trampled it on the carpet. She laid it upon the silver cabinet, slowly smoothing it out with both hands: very pale those hands were, and so also was her face, but every feature seemed locked with fierce resolution: she was calm and stern as death.

When the parchment was smoothed, Elizabeth took a pen from the standish before her, and, without a tremor or the pause of a moment, wrote her signature. A cry of terrible anguish broke from the two women as they saw her take up the pen, and they cast themselves at her feet, clinging wildly to her robe.

Elizabeth took no heed, but appended the usual bold flourishes to her signature, and touched a little bell that stood upon the cabinet.

"Take this to the Lord Chancellor, and see that the great seal is affixed," she said to the person who entered—"then conduct these ladies from the palace, and see that they enter it no more."

"That parchment!" cried the Countess of Essex, following the man, as he went forth, with her wild eyes—"Great Queen, in mercy say it is not—it is not—"

The wretched wife could not finish the question that she had begun; her lips seemed turned to ice, and her breath choked her.

"It is the Earl of Essex' death-warrant," said Elizabeth, rising sternly up. "Go!"

She lifted her withered finger, and pointed toward the door.

The young wife knelt motionless, frozen as it were with the horrid truth that had been told her; but the mother of Essex stood up; her lips were ashen, her eyes had a terrible light in them.

"Elizabeth of England! the Great God of Heaven will call you to judgment for this act!"

Before the Queen had rallied from the awe with which these words had filled even her undaunted spirit, Lady Blunt had raised her daughter-in-law from the floor.

"My daughter, let us go. Henceforth, we must only trust to the God who will avenge us."

A moment after, and the old Queen was alone.

CHAPTER II.

It was done; the axe had fallen. The Queen's dignity was saved, and her heart broken. She was at her harpsichord when they brought her tidings of Essex' execution. Her face was turned from the light, and no one saw the spasm of pain that convulsed its stern lineaments. She did not pause even for an instant, but her hand was dashed violently on the instrument, sending forth a harsh, sharp note, that was almost a wail, and then the soft music gushed forth again, sweetly, as if nothing had happened. Alas, how slight are sometimes the indications which a proud heart allows the world to see of those struggles that pass through the soul like an earthquake! That moment had left the haughtiest woman, and the most imperious queen that trod the soil of England, utterly desolate.

"What ho! what ho! Who claims admittance to the palace at this late hour?" cried the yeoman of the guard, as he arose an hour after midnight, to answer an abrupt summons at the great portal which opened to the Thames. A few words from without, of explanation and entreaty, soon prevailed upon the guard to admit the untimely visitor, who paused by the entrance, and, taking the yeoman on one side, spoke to him earnestly for some moments.

"What! the old Countess of Nottingham dying, and would have speech of her grace?" exclaimed the royal door-keeper. "Why, think you the Queen would arise from her couch, at this hour of the night, and risk her sacred person on the water at the behest of fifty dying countesses?"

"I tell you," rejoined the man, whose face was pale with excitement, "I tell you, this message of my dying mistress must be brought to her majesty; there is that in it which the boldest man in England dare not keep from Elizabeth an instant. As you value liberty and life, friend, do nothing to hinder me in deliverance of my mission. The soul of my poor mistress will wrestle sorely with the body till I bring back tidings to her death-bed. I must see the Queen!"

"Be it so, then, as your business is so momentous," cried the yeoman: "I will lead you to the ante-room, and arouse some of the ladies—but remember, if evil comes of this I will not hold myself responsible. The man should be bold, and the business weighty, that disturbs Elizabeth from her slumber at this hour."

"The business is weighty, and the scene that I have witnessed this night is enough to make a man brave any earthly peril without shrinking. What is it to ask an audience here, when my poor mistress is summoned before the King of Kings!"

"Have you a letter, or bring you only a message by word of mouth?" said the yeoman, still hesitating, though the agitation of his untimely visitor had made a strong impression upon him.

"Here is the letter!" cried the man, taking a large, square missive from his bosom, sealed with the Nottingham arms in black. "Hasten, good friend—hasten, I beseech you, and give it to the Queen. Heaven only knows what torment my wretched mistress will know till the errand is done!"

The guard seemed greatly relieved by this tangible and imposing excuse for disturbing the slumbers of his mistress. He took the letter, and passing through many a state-chamber and richly decorated gallery, paused in an ante-room, where half a dozen pages lay upon their couches asleep, some disrobed, and others muffled in mantles of azure velvet, and pillowed upon their own perfumed ringlets.

"What ho!" cried the guard, shaking one of these pages by the arm, and half lifting him from the couch. "Arouse yourself, good master George, and rub open those blue eyes, without loss of time. Here is a letter, which you must give to one of the Queen's bed-chamber women this very instant. Say that it is a case of life and death. Do you hear, jackanapes?"

"Do I hear?" cried the lad, rubbing his eyes with a little hand, white as a lady's and sparkling with rings—"I should be deaf if it were otherwise. Why, man, your voice is like a trumpet. Do you guess what hour of the night it is? coming after this fashion to the very door of her majesty's chamber. This will make you a head shorter, some fine day, master yeoman!"

"Take the letter, and leave me to the care of my own head," replied the yeoman, sharply. "Give it to the first Lady of the Bed-chamber—and say that a messenger from the Countess of Nottingham awaits her majesty's pleasure here."

The lad took the letter, held it to the light of a large silver lamp that swung overhead, examined the seal minutely, and then turned his eyes with equal assurance upon the messenger, whose anxiety became each moment more apparent.

"It must be a pressing business, and if one may judge by the white face of our friend there, full of peril! No matter, it shall not be said that the beloved of—the fairest and sweetest lady about the court—mind, master yeoman, I mention no name—ever allowed the peril of an enterprise to count anything with him. Rest content, good friend," he added, turning to the messenger, "I will find a lady, who, for my sake, would take upon herself greater danger than that of arousing the Queen at midnight; fortunately, you have chanced upon the only courtier who could have managed the matter for you."

"Well, jackanapes, get about the errand after your own fashion!" cried the yeoman, with an impatient laugh.

"Nay, you would not have me present myself before her without some preparation," said the youth, shaking the scented and glossy ringlets, with which his head was adorned, over his shoulders, and arranging the folds of his cloak with an air of the most perfect self-conceit. "Tell me, master yeoman—for, lacking a mirror, I must even take counsel of your ignorance—think you not this garment falls a trifle too much over the right shoulder? Let me step beneath the lamp that you may judge."

"Tush, boy! this is no time for such foppery. Begone upon thy errand, or I will find it in my heart to knock a portion of the conceit from that little body. Go—go! See you not our friend here is fast losing patience?"

This allusion to the messenger from Nottingham house was well authorized by the appearance of the man. Once or twice, as if bereft of all patience by the boy's foppish airs, he advanced a pace to take the letter from his hand, half determined to enter the Queen's chamber, and at all peril present it himself. His cheek grew more and more pale, and his eyes burned with anxiety that nothing could restrain, as the page turned his head superciliously over one shoulder to look at him after the yeoman's remark, still holding the letter carelessly between his thumb and finger. His impatience broke all bounds. He strode forward, and grasping the youth by the arm, gave him a slight shake—"You trifle with a message from the dying," he said, sternly. "No more of this folly! Begone!"

The boy shook himself free, and with a petulant lift of the shoulder, muttered something about his cloak being forced awry; but there was something in the deep passion with which he had been addressed, that completely quelled his frivolous spirit, and without attempting any further excuse for delay, he left the chamber.

The Queen had been ill in health, and becoming daily more infirm, it was necessary that some one of her ladies should remain in attendance at night, ready at a moment's warning to answer her summons. Thus it was that the page, on entering the small ante-room, or rather boudoir, which led to the royal bed-chamber, found a lovely woman in full dress, but with a rich brocade dressing-gown thrown over her shoulders, sound asleep in a large easy-chair heaped with crimson cushions, upon which her fair head had fallen, crushing a mass of beautiful hair; that had cost an artist much labor that morning, beneath the warm roses of her cheek.

"Lady Arabella," whispered the page, stealing toward the fair slumberer, and sinking upon his knees while he touched the little hand that fell over an arm of the chair, timidly with his—"Lady Arabella."

His voice was very low—for the boy could hardly breathe, his agitation was so great. With all his audacious vanity he was timid as a child in the presence of purity and high-born loveliness like that. "Lady Arabella, I have a letter—I would speak with you!"

The lady started up in her chair, passed a hand over her eyes, as if to be quite sure that they were not deceiving her, and then bent them, full of sleepy wonder, upon the youth.

"Why, George, how is this? Here, and after midnight!" she said, gently, but with evident surprise, and some displeasure.

"Lady, I have brought this for her majesty," said the boy, holding up the letter with its broad black seal: "a messenger has just arrived from Nottingham house. He says the Countess is dying."

"Dying!" exclaimed the Lady Arabella.

"Aye, dying; and the messenger says the lady, in her extremity, will have speech with the Queen—that this letter must be given to her majesty even now!"

"It cannot be," said the Lady Arabella, putting back the letter with her hand—"our royal mistress is ill at ease, since—since his death, she gets but little sleep. I dare not disturb her!"

"Shall I take the letter back?" said the page, rising. "The man is waiting without."

"Yet if the poor Countess is in such a strait—if she is in truth dying!" said the gentle lady, reluctant to refuse that which she, nevertheless, had not the courage to undertake—

"Who speaks of dying?—what is it? Who speaks of dying?" cried a sharp voice from the royal bed-chamber. "Arabella—Arabella!"

"Hush! it is the Queen. Give me the letter!" whispered the lady, and she entered an adjoining chamber.

Elizabeth had half risen, and leaned upon her elbow in the midst of her huge bed—her face looked haggard in the crimson shadows cast downward from the cumbrous hangings, and her head shook with an almost imperceptible tremor, that partook both of the infirmities of age, and of the terror that sometimes follows unpleasant dreams. Locks of gray hair streamed down from her night-coif, and she clutched the damask counterpane with a hand that shook like an aspen as it crushed the glowing folds together.

"Did I dream?—I did dream of the dead!" she exclaimed, bending her keen eyes upon the lady as she entered, and sinking slowly back to her pillow. "Of the dead—the dying! The Countess of Nottingham—who told me the Countess of Nottingham was dying?"

"Your highness must have been disturbed by the messenger that just came up from Nottingham house with this letter," said the Lady Arabella, kneeling by the royal couch. "The hour was so untimely, that I was about to send him back again."

"Give me the letter," cried Elizabeth, starting up, and seizing the folded parchment fiercely, as a bird of prey clutches its spoil—"I tell you, Arabella, I have dreamed things to-night that make the sundering of this seal terrible!" and with shaking hands, the Queen burst the black seal and tore it apart.

She cast her keen eyes over its contents, and dashing the letter aside, sprang to the floor. "Yon' garments, Arabella; bring yon' garments, and robe me," she cried in a voice that was low, but fearfully concentrated. "Quick, quick! No ruff—no farthingale, but a cloak and hood—one for yourself, too. Who waits in the ante-chamber?"

"The page, young George Pagot, one of your highness' yeomen, and the messenger from Nottingham house."

"It is enough! Let the boy go with us—the boy and yourself—that will be sufficient escort for Elizabeth on an errand like this."

"Shall I tell George to give orders that the royal barge be prepared?" said the Lady Arabella.

"No—send hither the messenger."

"Hither?" questioned Arabella, mindful of the disarray which the royal person still exhibited.

"Yes—here, and thus!" replied Elizabeth, and a bitter smile swept over her face as she interpreted the look of her attendant.

Filled with wonder that almost amounted to consternation, Arabella went forth to summon the messenger. Elizabeth received him at the door of her chamber. She had folded a cloak around her person, but the hood was thrown back, and with nothing but her gray hair veiling the aged brow that had never been presented to the gaze of mortal man before, without the disguise of art and a blaze of jewels, she put a few brief questions to him:

"Come you to the palace by water?"

"By water, may it please your highness," replied the man.

"And your barge is here?"

"It is now in waiting, and the tide serves."

"Lead on!" said the Queen. "Arabella, follow us with the boy: and you," she added, turning to the guard, "go attend us to the water, and then stir not from the gate till our return;" and the Queen walked on with a degree of strength and energy which startled those who had witnessed the feebleness that had marked the few last months of her life.

As they went forth into the open air, Arabella moved close to her royal mistress. "Let me draw the hood somewhat over your majesty's head," she pleaded, for the wind was trifling with those snowy tresses, and it pained the young girl to see how careless the proud old Queen seemed of an exposure to which she had always been so sensitive.

"Nay—the cool wind does me good," replied Elizabeth, and with a firm step she descended to the barge, and took a seat upon one of the cushions.

Midnight darkness lay upon the river; clouds, heavy and black, were heaped over the sky; and the shores, save here and there a solitary light from some residence, lay in profound night. Amid this wilderness of gloom, the barge swept rapidly downward with the tide. The flow of the waters, heavy and monotonous, was all the sound to be heard; no word was spoken, save when the old Queen bade the rowers make more speed.

At last the barge drew up by a flight of steps that led to a spacious garden half surrounded by the wings of a fine old mansion-house. Through one of the tall windows a light streamed forth upon the blackness, faint and dim, as if some lamp placed there were just expiring.

"Go on to the sick room," said the Queen, as her conductor would have taken her to another apartment, that her presence might be announced. "Stay you below, Arabella; we will see this dying countess alone;" and, with a firm step, Elizabeth mounted the stairs, and found herself in the chamber of death.

A huge bed, canopied with masses of purple velvet, so deep tinted that it seemed black in the gloom, stood at an extremity of the chamber; and upon it lay the pale form of a woman struggling in her death-agony. A group of persons stood around the bed, silent and awe-stricken. Toward this group Elizabeth moved slow, upright, and majestic.

"It is the Queen!" cried the dying countess, lifting her thin hand. "God has had mercy! It is the Queen—and I can now die!"

"Leave us," said Elizabeth, waving her hand. The next moment she stood alone with the dying.

"Countess of Nottingham, you have sent for the Queen—and she is here. What have you to say of Essex? In what can your death-bed confessions concern one whose fate is now sealed?"

The Countess of Nottingham clasped her pale hands, and held them imploringly toward the Queen. Those hands were almost transparent, and, as the light fell upon them, upon one of the fingers it revealed a ruby, glowing like a spark of fire upon it. Elizabeth's eyes fell upon the gem, and instantly she became pale as the woman who lay prostrate before her, pleading, with mute eloquence, for mercy.

"Woman," she said, grasping the pale hand of the dying countess, and bending her eyes close to the ruby, whose light made the heart tremble in her bosom: "Woman! how came you possessed of this ring!"

The Countess of Nottingham closed her eyes, to shut out the terrible anger that convulsed the aged face bending over her death-pillow; her lips moved again and again, before they could utter a word. At length she spoke, but feebly and very low. The Queen bent her head close to those pale lips, that her thirsty ear might drink in every syllable of the confession they were whispering. She held her breath—and a wild, fierce expression, like that of a wounded eagle, came to her eyes. When all was told—when the dying woman opened her eyes, and, with a look of most touching entreaty, besought mercy for the fraud which had brought the noble head of Essex to the block—then the volcano which her words had lighted in the old Queen's heart, blazed forth. Elizabeth stood upright: the infirmities of age were swallowed up in her mighty wrath: her lips grew livid—her eyes burned as with fire—and every nerve in her body seemed hardening into iron.

"Mercy!" she cried, in a voice shrill with anguish and wrath; "Woman! God may forgive you, but I never will!"

The wretched countess, terrified even in her death-throes, cowered down and groveled in her bed. "Oh, God! wilt thou too withhold mercy?" broke from her shivering lips.

"Mercy!" whispered the old Queen—for wrath made her voice very low, and she spoke between her locked teeth—"Mercy!" and, mad with anguish, she seized the dying woman, and shook her, till the huge couch, with its gloomy masses of velvet and its dusky plumes, trembled in every joint.

When the old Monarch withdrew her hands from this unqueenly act, they dropped helplessly by her side, for she saw that her violence had done sacrilege to the dead.

Ten minutes went by, during which Elizabeth stood over that death-couch; then she turned away, and passing from the chamber, descended the stairs, waving a hand for her young attendants to follow. When Elizabeth entered the dwelling, she wore no jewel of any kind; but, as the light fell upon her hand in going forth, Arabella saw that a ruby blazed upon one of the fingers.

It was night when the Queen of England entered her own palace again—night upon the earth, night in her own heart. She could scarcely walk while passing through the palace-grounds, and leaned heavily upon the arm of Lady Arabella all the way to her own chamber. Within the solitude of her room she sat till morning—her face pale and rigid, her limbs bowed as with a heavy weight—gazing intently upon the ring, which burned like a blood-spot on her finger—a blood-spot—and so it was. That ring she had given to Essex, when highest in her favor, with a promise that, let his fault be what it might, forgiveness should follow its presentation to her. He had sent the ring, a few days before his execution, by the wretched Countess of Nottingham, who withheld it in fraud—and, by this treachery, Elizabeth became the executioner of one whom she loved better than life.

And now that he was dead, the ring had reached her from the hand of death. Was it strange that the old Queen never smiled again—that henceforth she called for a staff to support her as she walked about the palace—or that, in a few weeks, she lay upon the cushions heaped in her chamber, weary, heart-sick—afraid to die, and yet dying?

OUR INDIAN FRIENDS.

FROM "ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH," BY MRS. MOODIE.

Their sense of hearing is so acute that they can distinguish sounds at an incredible distance, which cannot be detected by a European at all. I myself witnessed a singular exemplification of this fact. It was mid-winter: the Indians had pitched their tent, or wigwam, as usual, in our swamp. All the males were absent on a hunting expedition up the country, and had left two women behind to take care of the camp and its contents. Mrs. Tom Nogan and her children, and Susan Moore, a young girl of fifteen and the only truly beautiful squaw I ever saw. There was something interesting about this girl's history, as well as her appearance. Her father had been drowned during a sudden hurricane, which swamped his canoe on Stony Lake; and the mother, who witnessed the accident from the shore, and was near her confinement with this child, boldly swam out to his assistance. She reached the spot where he sank, and even succeeded in recovering the body; but it was too late; the man was dead.

The soul of an Indian that has been drowned is reckoned accursed, and he is never permitted to join his tribe on the happy hunting-grounds, but his spirit haunts the lake or river in which he lost his life. His body is buried on some lonely island, which the Indians never pass without leaving a small portion of food, tobacco, or ammunition, to supply his wants: but he is never interred with the rest of his people. His children are considered unlucky, and few willingly unite themselves to the females of the family, lest a portion of the father's curse should be visited on them.

The orphan Indian girl generally kept aloof from the rest, and seemed so lonely and companionless, that she soon attracted my attention and sympathy, and a hearty feeling of good-will sprang up between us. Her features were small and regular, her face oval, and her large, dark, loving eyes were full of tenderness and sensibility, but as bright and shy as those of the deer. A rich vermilion glow burnt upon her olive cheek and lips, and set off the dazzling whiteness of her even and pearly teeth. She was small of stature, with delicate little hands and feet, and her figure was elastic and graceful. She was a beautiful child of nature, and her Indian name signified "the voice of angry waters." Poor girl, she had been a child of grief and tears from her birth! Her mother was a Mohawk, from whom she, in all probability, derived her superior personal attractions: for they are very far before the Mississaguas in this respect.

My friend and neighbor, Emilia S——, the wife of a naval officer, who lived about a mile distant from me, through the bush, had come to spend the day with me; and hearing that the Indians were in the swamp, and the men away, we determined to take a few trifles to the camp, in the way of presents, and spend an hour in chatting with the squaws.

What a beautiful moonlight night it was, as light as day!—the great forest sleeping tranquilly beneath the cloudless heavens—not a sound to disturb the deep repose of nature but the whispering of the breeze, which, during the most profound calm, creeps through the lofty pine tops. We bounded down the steep bank to the lake shore. Life is a blessing, a precious boon, indeed, in such an hour, and we felt happy in the mere consciousness of existence—the glorious privilege of pouring out the silent adoration of the heart to the Great Father in His universal temple.

On entering the wigwam, which stood within a few yards of the clearing, in the middle of a thick group of cedars, we found Mrs. Tom alone with her elvish children, seated before the great fire that burned in the centre of the camp; she was busy boiling some bark in an iron spider. The little boys, in red flannel shirts, which were their only covering, were tormenting a puppy, which seemed to take their pinching and pommelling in good part, for it neither attempted to bark nor to bite, but like the eels in the story, submitted to the infliction because it was used to it. Mrs. Tom greeted us with a grin of pleasure, and motioned us to sit down upon a buffalo skin, which, with a courtesy so natural to the Indians, she had placed near her for our accommodation.

"You are all alone," said I, glancing round the camp.

"Ye'es; Indian away hunting—Upper Lakes. Come home with much deer."

"And Susan, where is she?"

"By and by," (meaning that she was coming.)

"Gone to fetch water—ice thick—chop with axe—take long time."

As she ceased speaking, the old blanket that formed the door of the tent was withdrawn, and the girl, bearing two pails of water, stood in the open space, in the white moonlight. The glow of the fire streamed upon her dark, floating locks, danced in the black, glistening eye, and gave a deeper blush to the olive cheek! She would have made a beautiful picture: Sir Joshua Reynolds would have rejoiced in such a model—so simply graceful and unaffected, the very beau ideal of savage life and unadorned nature. A smile of recognition passed between us. She put down her burden beside Mrs. Tom, and noiselessly glided to her seat.

We had scarcely exchanged a few words with our favorite, when the old squaw, placing her hand against her ear, exclaimed, "Whist! whist!"

"What is it?" cried Emilia and I, starting to our feet. "Is there any danger?"

"A deer—a deer—in bush!" whispered the squaw, seizing a rifle that stood in a corner. "I hear sticks crack—a great way off. Stay here!"

A great way off the animal must have been, for though Emilia and I listened at the open door, an advantage which the squaw did not enjoy, we could not hear the least sound: all seemed still as death. The squaw whistled to an old hound, and went out.

"Did you hear anything, Susan?"

She smiled, and nodded.

"Listen: the dog has found the track."

The next moment the discharge of a rifle, and the deep baying of the dog, woke up the sleeping echoes of the woods; and the girl started off to help the old squaw to bring in the game that she had shot.

The Indians are great imitators, and possess a nice tact in adopting the customs and manners of those with whom they associate. An Indian is Nature's gentleman—never familiar, coarse, or vulgar. If he take a meal with you, he waits to see how you make use of the implements on the table, and the manner in which you eat, which he imitates with a grave decorum, as if he had been accustomed to the same usages from childhood. He never attempts to help himself, or demand more food, but waits patiently until you perceive what he requires. I was perfectly astonished at this innate politeness, for it seems natural to all the Indians with whom I have had any dealings.

There was one old Indian, who belonged to a distant settlement, and only visited our lakes occasionally on hunting parties. He was a strange, eccentric, merry old fellow, with a skin like red mahogany, and a wiry, sinewy frame, that looked as if it could bid defiance to every change of temperature. Old Snow-storm, for such was his significant name, was rather too fond of the whiskey-bottle, and when he had taken a drop too much, he became an unmanageable wild beast. He had a great fancy for my husband, and never visited the other Indians without extending the same favor to us. Once upon a time, he broke the nipple of his gun; and Moodie repaired the injury for him by fixing a new one in its place, which little kindness quite won the heart of the old man, and he never came to see us without bringing an offering of fish, ducks, partridges, or venison, to show his gratitude.

One warm September day, he made his appearance bareheaded, as usual, and carrying in his hand a great checked bundle.

"Fond of grapes?" said he, putting the said bundle into my hands. "Fine grapes—brought them from island, for my friend's squaw and papouses."

Glad of the donation, which I considered quite a prize, I hastened into the kitchen to untie the grapes and put them into a dish. But imagine my disappointment when I found them wrapped up in a soiled shirt, only recently taken from the back of the owner. I called Moodie, and begged him to return Snow-storm his garment, and to thank him for the grapes.

The mischievous creature was highly diverted with the circumstance, and laughed immoderately.

"Snow-storm," said he, "Mrs. Moodie and the children are obliged to you for your kindness in bringing them the grapes; but how came you to tie them up in a dirty shirt?"

"Dirty!" cried the old man, astonished that we should object to the fruit on that score. "It ought to be clean; it has been washed often enough. Owgh! You see, Moodie," he continued, "I have no hat—never wear hat—want no shade to my eyes—love the sun—see all around me—up and down—much better without hat. Could not put the grapes in hat—blanket-coat too large, crush fruit, juice run out. I had noting but my shirt, so I takes off shirt, and brings grape safe over the water on my back. Papouse no care for dirty shirt; their lee-tel bellies have no eyes."

In spite of this eloquent harangue, I could not bring myself to use the grapes, ripe and tempting as they looked, or give them to the children. Mr. W—— and his wife happening to step in at that moment, fell into such an ecstasy at the sight of the grapes, that, as they were perfectly unacquainted with the circumstance of the shirt, I very generously gratified their wishes by presenting them with the contents of the large dish; and they never ate a bit less sweet for the novel mode in which they were conveyed to me!

The Indians, under their quiet exterior, possess a deal of humor. They have significant names for everything, and a nickname for every one, and some of the latter are laughably appropriate. A fat, pompous, ostentatious settler in our neighborhood they called Muckakee, "the bull-frog." Another, rather a fine young man, but with a very red face, they named Segoskee, "the rising sun." Mr. Wood, who had a farm above ours, was a remarkably slender young man, and to him they gave the appellation of Metiz, "thin stick." A woman, that occasionally worked for me, had a disagreeable squint; she was known in Indian by the name of Sachabo, "cross-eye." A gentleman with a very large nose was Choqas, "big or ugly nose." My little Addie, who was a fair, lovely creature, they viewed with great approbation, and called Anook, "a star;" while the rosy Katie was Nogesisgook, "the northern lights." As to me, I was Nonocostiqui, a "humming-bird;" a ridiculous name for a tall woman, but it had reference to the delight I took in painting birds. My friend Amilia, was "blue cloud;" my little Donald, "frozen face;" young C——, "the red-headed woodpecker," from the color of his hair; my brother, Chippewa, and "the bald eagle." He was an especial favorite among them.

I have said before that the Indian never forgets a kindness. We had a thousand proofs of this, when, overtaken by misfortune, and withering beneath the iron grasp of poverty, we could scarcely obtain bread for ourselves and our little ones; then it was that the truth of the Eastern proverb was brought home to our hearts, and the goodness of God fully manifested towards us, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days." During better times we had treated these poor savages with kindness and liberality, and when dearer friends looked coldly upon us they never forsook us. For many a good meal I have been indebted to them, when I had nothing to give in return, when the pantry was empty, and "the hearth-stone growing cold," as they term the want of provisions to cook at it. And their delicacy in conferring these favors was not the least admirable part of their conduct. John Nogan, who was much attached to us, would bring a fine bunch of ducks, and drop them at my feet, "for the papouse," or leave a large muskinonge on the sill of the door, or place a quarter of venison just within it, and slip away without saying a word, thinking that receiving a present from a poor Indian might hurt our feelings, and he would spare us the mortification of returning thanks.

When an Indian loses one of his children, he must keep a strict fast for two or three days, abstaining from food of any kind. A hunter, of the name of Young, told me a curious story of their rigid observance of this strange rite.

"They had a chief," he said, "a few years ago, whom they called 'Handsome Jack'—whether in derision, I cannot tell, for he was one of the ugliest Indians I ever saw. The scarlet fever got into the camp—a terrible disease in this country, and doubly terrible to those poor creatures who don't know how to treat it. His eldest daughter died. The chief had fasted two days when I met him in the bush. I did not know what had happened, but I opened my wallet, for I was on a hunting expedition, and offered him some bread and dried venison. He looked at me reproachfully.

"Do white men eat bread the first night their papouse is laid in the earth?"

"I then knew the cause of his depression, and left him."

On the night of the second day of his fast another child died of the fever. He had now to accomplish three more days without tasting food. It was too much even for an Indian. On the evening of the fourth he was so pressed by ravenous hunger, that he stole into the woods, caught a bull-frog, and devoured it alive. He imagined himself alone, but one of his people, suspecting his intention, had followed him, unperceived, to the bush. The act he had just committed was a hideous crime in their eyes, and in a few minutes the camp was in an uproar. The chief fled for protection to Young's house. When the hunter demanded the cause of his alarm, he gave for answer, "There are plenty of flies at my house. To avoid their stings I came to you."

It required all the eloquence of Mr. Young, who enjoyed much popularity among them, to reconcile the rebellious tribe to their chief.

They are very skilful in their treatment of wounds, and many diseases. Their knowledge of the medicinal qualities of plants and herbs is very great. They make excellent poultices from the bark of the bass and slippery-elm. They use several native plants in their dyeing of baskets and porcupine quills. The inner bark of the swamp-alder, simply boiled in water, makes a beautiful red. From the root of the black briony they obtain a fine salve for sores, and extract a rich yellow dye. The inner bark of the root of the sumach, roasted, and reduced to powder, is a good remedy for the ague; a tea-spoonful given between the hot and cold fit. They scrape the fine white powder from the large fungus that grows upon the bark of the pine into whiskey, and take it for violent pains in the stomach. The taste of the powder strongly reminded me of quinine.

I have read much of the excellence of Indian cookery, but I never could bring myself to taste anything prepared in their dirty wigwams. I remember being highly amused in watching the preparation of a mess, which might have been called the Indian hotch-potch. It consisted of a strange mixture of fish, flesh, and fowl, all boiled together in the same vessel. Ducks, partridges, muskionge, venison, and muskrats, formed a part of this delectable compound. These were literally smothered in onions, potatoes, and turnips, which they had procured from me. They very hospitably offered me a dishful of the odious mixture, which the odor of the muskrats rendered everything but savory; but I declined, simply stating, that I was not hungry. My little boy tasted it, but quickly left the camp to conceal the effect it produced upon him.

Their method of broiling fish, however, is excellent. They take a fish, just fresh out of the water, cut out the entrails, and without removing the scales, wash it clean, dry it in a cloth, or in grease, and cover it all over with clear hot ashes. When the flesh will part from the bone, they draw it out of the ashes, strip off the skin, and it is fit for the table of the most fastidious epicure.

ANNIE.

BY MARCUS H. TROWBRIDGE.

The grave is Heaven's gate, they say,
And when dear ANNIE passed away,
One calm June morning,
I saw upon the heavenly stairs,
A band of angels, unawares,
Her path adorning.

The grave is Heaven's gate, they say,
And when dear ANNIE passed away,
A music flowing
Filled my sad soul with love and light,
That made me seem, by day and night,
To Heaven going.

The grave is Heaven's gate they say,
And when dear ANNIE passed away,
A saintly whiteness
O'erspread the beauty of her face,
And filled it with the tender grace
Of angel brightness.

The grave is Heaven's gate, they say,
And when dear ANNIE passed away,
An angel splendid
Cast his large glories to the ground,
While waves of throbbing music-sound
In sweetness blended.

The grave is Heaven's gate, they say,
And when dear ANNIE passed away,

In holy sweetness—

When life's sad dream with her was o'er,
Her white soul stood at Heaven's door,
In its completeness.

MINISTERING ANGELS.

BY MAY LINWOOD.

Time and Patience' these are Angels
By our Heavenly Father sent;
Whispering to our restless spirits,
"Cease to murmur— be content;
God, who is thy truest friend,
Doth our aid in trial send.

When thy weary spirit failest,
'Neath the weary cross it bears,
God is not unmindful of thee—
He is listening to thy prayer;
From His children's tearful pleading,
He will never turn unheeding!"

Heart of mine! Trust thou these Angels;
Lean on Patience and be calm;
Trust in Time, who is preparing
For thy grief a spirit-balm;
God is merciful, and He Gave them charge concerning thee.

Light, warmth, and sprouting greenness, and o'er all
Blue, stainless, steel-bright ether, raining down
Tranquility upon the deep-hushed town,
The freshening meadows, and the hill-sides
brown;

Voice of the west-wind from the hills of pine,
And the brimmed river from its distant fall,
Low hum of bees, and joyous interlude
Of bird-songs in the streamlet-skirting wood—
Heralds and prophecies of sound and sight,
Blessed forerunners of the warmth and light,
Attendant angels to the house of prayer,
With reverent footsteps keeping pace with mine—

Once more, through God's great love, with you I share

A morn of resurrection sweet and fair
As that which saw, of old, in Palestine,
Immortal Love uprising in fresh bloom,
From the dark night and winter of the tomb!

White with its sun-bleached dust, the pathway winds

Before me: dust is on the shrunken grass,
And on the trees beneath whose boughs I pass;
Frail screen against the Hunter of the sky,
Who, glaring on me with his lidless eye,
While mounting with his dog-star high and higher,

Ambushed in light intolerable, unbinds
The burnished quiver of his shafts of fire.
Between me and the hot fields of his South
A tremulous glow, as from a furnace mouth,
Glimmers and swims before my dazzled sight,
As if the burning arrows of his ire
Broke as they fell, and shattered into light!

Yet on my cheek I feel the Western wind,
 And hear it telling to the orchard trees
 And to the faint and flower-forsaken bees, Tales of fair meadows, green with constant streams,
 And mountains rising blue and cool behind,
 Where in moist dells the purple orchis gleams,
 And starred with white the virgin's bower is twined.
 So the o'erwearied pilgrim, as he fares
 Along life's summer waste, at times is fanned,
 Even at noontide, by the cool, sweet airs
 Of a serener and a holier land,
 Fresh as the morn, and as the dewfall bland.
 Breath of the blessed Heaven for which we pray, Blow from the eternal hills!—make glad our earthly way! National Era.

THE OLD MAN'S BRIDE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER I.

It was on a dark, cold, rainy morning, late in November, that Helen Lee came down from her room, with a thin shawl drawn around her shoulders. She had nearly reached the street door when her steps were arrested by her mother's voice.

"You're not going out on such a morning as this, Helen, surely!" said Mrs. Lee.

"Oh yes," replied the young girl, in cheerful tones. "I must give my lessons, you know."

"But you will not be expected, Helen. And even if you were, a regard for health should keep you at home on a day like this."

"I have on my thick shoes, mother," returned Helen, in the same cheerful tones with which she had at first spoken. "And you know I am warmly clothed. I shall not feel the cold."

Warmly clothed! Her garments were more fitting the month of June! Thick shoes? A wafer might be called thick as well!

"Don't go, Helen," said Mrs. Lee, in an almost pleading voice. She was not deceived by her daughter's words.

"I must go, mother," returned Helen, now speaking more seriously. "I cannot afford to miss giving a single lesson. But don't feel worried about me. Good by—I will be home by twelve o'clock."

And, saying this, the brave-hearted girl turned quickly away, and went forth on her errand.

As she closed the door, and stepped upon the pavement, the rushing wind swept against her, and penetrated, almost in an instant, her thin garments, causing a chill to run through her slender frame; and almost as quickly did she feel the dampness reach her feet from the wet pavement.

But she shrunk not in the cold blast, for the earnest and high purpose that was in her heart, lifted her above the consciousness of physical suffering like this.

Helen Lee, an only child, was now in her twenty-second year. Her parents were in reduced circumstances. But they had once been moderately well off. There had been no withholding of means, on their part, so far as the education of their child was concerned; and in the dark days of their adversity she was repaying them for all their care and affection. Ills of life too rarely come alone. This was the experience of Mr. and Mrs. Lee. Very soon after the former failed in business, his health became so bad that even the smallest mental or bodily exertion was attended with dangerous consequences; and the physician enjoined the most perfect quiet, as absolutely necessary.

In this unhappy extremity, Mrs. Lee found herself almost helpless. What could she do to support the family? In vain did she ask this question. She had no resources in herself.

But now it was that the seed sown in their daughter's mind began to germinate. The true affection which Helen had for her parents, led her thoughts to the projection of means whereby to serve them. She had been well educated in most of the branches taught in schools, and her first effort was to endeavor to get a situation as an assistant in some established female academy. But, this she found no easy matter. She next endeavored to get music scholars, and was successful in procuring a few, the instruction of which was immediately commenced. From these, the income was not large; yet it was something, and helped to eke out their slender resources, that were fast melting away.

Months went by, and then one sacrifice after another having been made, the family found itself reduced to an entire dependence on Helen's income, which was now swelled by the addition of scholars, to about four hundred dollars a year.

Such was the state of affairs at the time we introduce Helen Lee to the reader. Four hundred dollars were not sufficient to meet the expenses of the family. The small house, into which they had removed, was obtained at a rent of one hundred and twenty dollars a year, leaving two hundred and eighty dollars with which to buy food and raiment for three persons. Accustomed to a different style of living, Mrs. Lee found it impossible to shrink into the dimensions required by outward circumstances, and was, therefore, unable, by any modes of economy understood by herself, to supply the wants of the family with so small a sum. A gradual accumulation of debt to the baker, butcher, and milkman, was the natural consequence; which debt soon became a source of annoyance and trouble.

If Helen had felt no other motive impelling her to attend to the lessons that were to be given on that stormy morning, the fact of two persons having made imperative demands for the settlement of bills, since breakfast time, would have been all-sufficient.

The brave-hearted girl had gone but two or three blocks when she was met by a young man, who turned and walked along by her side.

"A very bad morning, this, for you to be out, Helen," said he, seriously. "Aint you afraid of taking cold?"

"Oh no," she replied, but not with a great deal of warmth in her manner, and partly averting her face as she spoke.

The young man seemed surprised at the character of his reception by Helen, and bending towards her, looked earnestly upon her countenance. As he did so, she turned still farther from him; while from the quick rising and falling of her bosom, it was evident that her mind was much disturbed.

"Have I offended you in anything?" said the young man, after a brief silence.

"No, Henry, I am not offended with you. Why should I be?"

Helen spoke in a softer tone, in which tenderness and sadness were both blended. But still she kept her face partly averted.

"Why this change, then, Helen?"

"What change?"

"You are cold to me; and reserved beyond anything that I have known since we were acquainted."

Helen was silent.

"You are unhappy about something, Helen," said the young man. "Tell me what it is."

"How can I help feeling unhappy?" was returned with some bitterness of tone. "You know the circumstances of our family."

"I do, and Heaven knows how gladly I would relieve them. Oh, Helen! how often I have desired riches for your sake."

"I know the goodness of your heart, Henry," replied the young girl, with visible emotion. "But your hands are tied. You have claims as sacred and imperative as those that are binding upon me."

A deep sigh was the young man's only answer. Yes, there were claims equally binding upon him. He was a widowed mother's sole dependence.

"Henry," said Helen, breaking the silence, and speaking in a low, firm voice—"we had better be to each other as strangers."

"Helen!" the young man started, as if he had been stung.

"I am in earnest," was continued in the same low, steady voice. "Each of us has indulged an idle dream. We must bend to the iron stroke of circumstance."

"Helen! Helen! Why do you speak thus!" exclaimed her auditor, in a distressed voice. "You cannot mean what you say?"

"I mean it, Henry."

"Then you do not love me," was replied in a voice that evidently hurt the young girl, for she answered in still sadder tones.

"You have never looked into my heart. But, no matter. Think so, if you will, Henry. It is better, perhaps, that you should have something to make the trial easier. I shall not have even this to sustain me."

By this time they were in front of a large house, and Helen, with a hurried "good by," sprang up the steps, and after ringing the bell, stepped into the vestibule. Not once did she glance back towards her companion, who stood for a few moments gazing after, and then walked slowly on.

"We hardly expected you this morning, Miss Lee," said a lady, who met Helen as she entered one of the parlors, where a young lady was practising at the piano. "It is wet and cold without."

"I don't mind the weather," replied Helen, forcing a smile.

"But in weather like this you should put on warmer clothing," said the lady seriously. "You are no more thickly clad to-day, than you were at your last visit, and then the air was as soft as in May. It will not do, my young friend. Health is a thing too valuable to be risked after this fashion. Are your feet wet?"

"Only a little damp," replied Helen.

"A little may be too much. There's a fire in the dining room grate. Go up and get dry and warm before you begin Mary's lesson. She can go on with her practising in the meantime."

Helen, who really felt chilled, did as she was directed, and sat before the glowing fire until a genial warmth pervaded her body. Then she gave her music lesson of an hour, and again went forth in the wet and chilling atmosphere.

After a walk of nearly half an hour, by which time her shoes and stockings were saturated with water, Helen came to the residence of a man far past the middle period of life, the only female inmate of whose family, besides domestics, was a young niece whom he was educating. His name was Bullfinch. Helen had been engaged to give this niece instruction in French and Spanish, both of which languages she spoke with fluency. As Helen was raising her hand to pull the bell, some sudden thought passing through her mind, caused her to stop, and then slowly to turn away and walk on. For nearly half a block, she moved along slowly, with her eyes cast to the ground. Pausing, at length, she retraced her steps, and again stopping at the house of Mr. Bullfinch, rung the bell. On being admitted, she passed into the parlor.

"Why, Miss Lee! My dear young lady! What has induced you to come out on a day like this?"

Such was the unexpected salutation received by Helen, as she entered the parlors, in one of which a bright fire was burning. Before this fire sat Mr. Bullfinch and his niece. The former, quite an old man, rose up quickly, and extending his hand took that of his visiter, and pressed it warmly.

"Your hand is like ice," said he, with much kindness of manner, that was blended with interest and sympathy. "It is wrong for you to risk your health in this way. Dear bless me! Look at the girl's feet. Completely soaked in water! Fanny, dear, take Miss Lee right up into your room, and get her a pair of dry stockings and shoes. She may take her death a cold."

"It isn't at all necessary, Mr. Bullfinch," returned Helen, blushing with confusion. "I shall not take cold."

"But I say it is necessary," persisted the old gentleman. "What strange, inconsistent creatures you young girls are! Go right up stairs with Fanny and get dry stockings."

And he put his hand upon her and almost forced her from the room.

Helen was trembling all over when she entered the chamber of Fanny; so much so, that it attracted the young lady's attention.

"What ails you?" said the latter. "I do believe you are chilled through, and are shaking in an ague fit. What could have possessed you to come out this morning? I never thought of expecting you. As for lessons in French, I'm in no humor for that. I gave you up immediately after breakfast, and set myself down to a new novel. Being at a deeply interesting part of the book, a French lesson is out of the question. So, you may run back home again, and take your comfort for the rest of the day."

Helen smiled faintly at the animation of the young girl, as she replied—

"I've two more engagements yet to meet, before I can go home and take my comfort."

"You'll kill yourself," said Fanny, seriously.

"Oh no. I can bear a good deal," Helen spoke partly to herself, yet in a voice that was sad in spite of her effort to seem cheerful.

"I've sent for a carriage," said Mr. Bullfinch, when Helen returned again to the parlor; "and as soon as it arrives, you must go directly home. It was very bad for you to come out on such a day."

"I have two more engagements yet this morning," replied Helen.

"No matter if you have a dozen," said the old gentleman, as he gazed earnestly and admiringly upon the fair and innocent face of the young teacher. "You've got to go home. Health and life are first to be considered."

"But, Mr. Bullfinch—"

"I'll hear no arguments," he interrupted her, smiling, with an air of self satisfaction as he spoke. "I've sent for a carriage, and shall take it upon myself to send you back to your father's house; or, rather take you back—for I will not trust you to go alone, lest you jump out, and run off to give some of your confounded music lessons."

"Oh! you needn't fear that," quickly replied Helen; her face flushing, and then becoming extremely pale.

"I do fear it," persisted the old gentleman; "and shall not trust you. You are now my prisoner, and I will not lose sight of you until I have returned you safely to the place from which you escaped this morning."

"Uncle is exceedingly gallant," said Fanny, laughing. "He's a gentleman of the old school."

Just then the carriage, which a servant had been sent to order, drove up to the door.

"Don't think of going home with me, Mr. Bullfinch!" said Helen, in a very earnest way. "It's very stormy out."

"Tut, child! I'm not afraid of the weather; if it isn't too stormy for a delicate young girl, it certainly is not for a hale, hearty man like myself."

And as Mr. Bullfinch said this, he glanced involuntarily at his face and figure in a large mirror, opposite to which he was standing.

In spite of all the remonstrances of Helen, the old gentleman persisted in his purpose of accompanying her home, and, to this end, entered the carriage with her. The moment the vehicle moved away, his whole manner changed, and he attempted to take the young girl's hand. This she at first resisted, but at length permitted him to hold it passively within his grasp.

"My dear Miss Lee," said Mr. Bullfinch, with all the ardor of a young lover, leaning close to his auditor as he spoke—"I need not repeat to you what I have already said. You fully comprehend my feelings. From the first moment I saw you, I have been deeply interested in all that concerns you. Sympathy has quickly given place to a warmer and purer sentiment. I am older than you are, it is true; but my heart is still young—as young I trust as yours. Have you well considered the proposition I made? Are you ready to become my wife?"

A quick shudder ran through the frame of Helen as the last sentence reached her ear; a shudder perceived by Mr. Bullfinch in the hand he was holding.

"At once you will be elevated above your present condition,—above the necessity for this wearing toil, that is sapping the very foundations of your life!"

But there was no reply from the old man's statue-like companion, whose face was still in part averted; nor did a word pass her lips, until the carriage drew up before the humble abode of her parents. Then, as she was about stepping out—he remaining behind, and shrinking back, as if to avoid observation—she said, in a husky whisper—

"To-morrow you shall hear from me."

A moment or two more, and Helen Lee had passed from his sight.

CHAPTER II.

"You're home early," said Mrs. Lee, as her daughter came in. "I did not expect you back for an hour or so yet. Are you not well?"

"O yes, I am very well," returned Helen, with forced animation. "But, Fanny Milnor's uncle said I ought not to have ventured out on a day like this, and actually made me come home. He wouldn't let me give Fanny a lesson."

"It was very thoughtful in him, certainly," said Mrs. Lee—"very thoughtful. Didn't I hear a carriage stop at the door just now?"

The color deepened in Helen's face as her mother asked this question. Mrs. Lee perceived the change, and her interest and curiosity were immediately excited. As her daughter did not answer her last enquiry; she repeated—

"Didn't I hear a carriage stop at the door?"

"I presume so," was replied.

"Did you come home in it?"

Mrs. Lee's eyes were now intently fixed on her daughter's countenance.

"I did," said Helen.

"Indeed! why, how came that? Whose carriage was it?"

"Mr. Bullfinch sent for a carriage, and insisted on my coming home in it," returned Helen, with as much self-possession as she could assume.

"That was kind in him—very kind, indeed! But why should he do this? Were you sick at his house?"

"Oh, no, mother, I was not sick, but my feet were very wet, and he seemed to think I was in danger of taking cold. It was kind in him, certainly."

"It is not often that such kindness is received from total strangers."

"Certainly it is not. But Mr. Bullfinch is a very kind hearted man, I believe."

Saying this, Helen passed by her mother, and went up to her own room, there to ponder the new relations which things had assumed, and to endeavor to see, in a clear light, what it was her duty to do. If she had been standing alone in the world, there would have been no doubt in her mind. Her heart would have pointed the way in which to go. But others were deeply interested in the decisions she might make touching the future. Others were dependent, even for food and raiment, upon her personal efforts. Was it not her duty to regard them, even to the sacrifice of herself? This was the momentous question she was called upon to decide.

Towards Henry Wellford, the best and tenderest affections of her heart had gone forth; and she knew that he loved her with a true devotion. She had not only read it in his eyes, but listened to the ardent confession as it fell from his lips. Formally they were not betrothed. It had been enough that they loved, and were happiest in each other's society. But, Henry Wellford was poor. He was simply a clerk, on a small salary, and had a widowed mother to support. Helen was also poor,—an humble teacher, whose income was insufficient to meet the wants of those dependent upon her.

Thus it stood, when a rich old man saw the gentle, brave-hearted girl, and, won, by her graces of mind and body, conceived the idea of making her his wife. In his love, if the sentiment may be called by such a name—there was nothing with which her heart could possibly reciprocate. He was a bachelor of nearly sixty; a confirmed sensualist, whose very sphere tended to suffocate the heart of a young, pure-minded girl like Helen. For a true conjugal union to take place between them, was impossible; and that Helen felt the instant he approached her with the idea of marriage.

But, as her thoughts dwelt upon the hopeless indigence of her parents, and her own inability to meet their common wants—while the deep affection she felt made her heart yearn towards them—she looked away from herself; or, rather, calculated the extent of the sacrifice it was her duty to make, in order to secure them from want and privation. Mr. Bullfinch had wealth—she had only to consent to become his wife, and a portion of that wealth came under her control. At once she could lift her parents above their humble, suffering condition, and place every comfort within their reach.

Against all this her heart rebelled. But she laid her hand upon her heart, and called its shrinking from the ordeal proposed, mere selfishness. She kept close to her mental vision the feeble form and pale face of her father, and said, almost aloud, in the effort to give weight to the forced conclusions of her mind—

"It is my duty to make his last days peaceful at any sacrifice."

And, as the words trembled in husky and unnatural tones on the air, a low chilling shudder ran along her nerves.

Then stood distinctly before her the form of Adam Bullfinch, and the shudder ran deeper. She shut her eyes; but he was before her still. She bent her head forward upon the table by which she was seated, and drew her hands over her face. It availed not.

"God help me!" she at last exclaimed, in a despairing voice, and starting up, flung herself, with a low moan of anguish, upon her bed, where she lay for a long time as still as death.

There was something in the manner of her daughter, when she came in, that Mrs. Lee did not understand; and she was still wondering to herself what it could mean, when it occurred to her that Helen remained an unusual time in her room.

"I'm afraid she's sick. It was wrong for her to go out on a day like this," said she, and, acting from a newly awakened concern, she went up to her daughter's chamber.

Mrs. Lee came in so softly, that Helen did not observe her entrance. She was still lying upon the bed, her face deeply buried in a pillow.

"Daughter," said Mrs. Lee; and she laid her hand on Helen as she spoke.

Now first conscious of her mother's presence, the suffering girl did not move, nor reply, but commenced a strong effort to regain the control of her feelings. If she looked up, she knew that her face would betray her intense suffering; and that she wished above all things to conceal.

"Helen! Daughter! Are you sick?"

And Mrs. Lee shook her gently. The girl murmured something that did not reach, with any meaning, the ears of her mother; turned herself partly, yet still concealing her face; thus seeking to gain time, while she strove, with an almost desperate energy, to regain her self-possession.

"Are you sick, Helen?" repeated Mrs. Lee, anxiously.

"Not sick, mother," said Helen, now venturing to speak, yet still keeping her face averted. Her voice was low, yet steady. What an effort it cost to give it steadiness!

"What ails you then, dear? Something is the matter."

Helen now ventured to look towards her mother. Hard as she had striven, she had not been able to call back the blood to her cheeks, and their deathly paleness frightened Mrs. Lee.

"Oh, my child!" she exclaimed. "You are ill—very ill! What is it? Speak, dear."

A feeble smile—how it mocked the shadows that lay, like a pall, on her heart—flitted over the countenance of Helen.

"I am not very well," she answered; "but I shall be better soon." And, rising from the bed, she bathed her face, and re-arranged her hair and dress: seeking, thus, to produce a mental as well as physical reaction, that would conceal, in a measure, the fearful trial through which she was passing. She did not, however, satisfy Mrs. Lee, whose anxieties were fairly aroused. But, how little dreamed the mother of what was passing in the bosom of her child! To efforts in support of the family beyond her strength, and to cold taken from exposure that morning, she attributed the utterly exhausted condition in which she had found her. Had she known the truth, it may be doubted whether she were woman enough at heart to sympathize fully with the deeply tried and unhappy girl.

"I feel a great deal better now," said Helen, turning upon her mother a countenance less pale than before, and lit up with a warmer smile. "I will come down soon. Don't say anything to father about my not being well. It will only make him feel more anxious, and he is troubled enough as it is."

"I wouldn't come down at all, this morning," replied Mrs. Lee. "Take as much rest, and be quiet as possible to-day. You will feel all the better to-morrow."

It did not take much urging on the part of Mrs. Lee to induce Helen to remain, at least for some hours, in the seclusion of her own room. A dress to alter would employ her hands, without bodily fatigue, she said. After repeating her injunction that Helen would remain quiet, at least for the morning, the mother retired, and the unhappy girl was once more alone with her distracting thoughts.

During the time that Mrs. Lee lingered in her chamber, Helen had taken from a closet the dress she proposed to alter, and was sitting with it in her lap, scissors in hand, when her mother retired. How quick a change passed over her the moment she was again alone! Her hands sunk down nerveless, the feeble flush an effort had called to her pale cheeks, faded; her body averted weakly forward, while her dark lashes drooped until the inward-looking orbs beneath were scarcely visible. How very still she sat for a long, long time! Oh, the fearful trial through which she was passing! With what panting eagerness did she search for a way of escape from the terrible fate impending over her!

Had the peace of her own heart alone been at stake, the trial would have been a lighter one for Helen Lee—the decision more easily made. But, she loved Henry Wellford truly, deeply, and unselfishly. All the purest and tenderest affections of her maiden heart had gone out towards him; and to make him happy, would have been the joy of her life. His looks, his tones, and his whole manner, during the last brief interview, were dagger-retyped in her mind; and the question of her duty to him, came up and arrayed itself against the questions of duty to her parents. On the side of her lover, her heart sustained the argument; yet filial self-devotion stood firmly up, and with the spirit of a martyr, held its painful position.

"Have I a right thus to dispose of myself? Is it not sinful? Will God smile on such a sacrifice?"

These words were spoken aloud, as, in the anguish of strong trial, she was searching for a way of escape. Their very utterance brought light into the mind, and imparted a measure of strength.

"No—no," she added, as the light shone more clearly, "I dare not do this. God will not smile on the deed. He asks not so fearful a sacrifice of any heart. Death! Death!" she added, in a quicker voice—"Oh! it would be a sweet alternative—a welcome visitant."

Her pulses beat with a freer motion. A ray of hope had dawned. Alas! how quickly did it fade away into darkness! There came, at this moment to her ears, the sound of a strange voice from below. It was the voice of a man, and its sudden loudness startled her. Going quickly to the door of her room, she partly opened it, and stood listening. The words that came to her ears left her in no doubt. The voice was strange, but it demanded the payment of money.

"It is impossible to-day," she heard her mother answer in a distressed voice.

"Impossible, sir! we have not the money," said her father, in tones feeble and tremulous.

VOL. I.—No. 1.

"And when will you have it, pray?" the man asked, with rude impertinence.

To hear her father spoken to thus—her father, so feeble in health, that his physician had warned him against the danger of any excitement—her father, so tenderly loved, so highly honored and regarded, was more than Helen could bear. At once the balance trembling, so nicely equipoised in her mind, yielded. Filial self-devotion gained the preponderance. Springing, with a sudden impulse down the stairs, she confronted the rude collector, and said, with a decision of manner that surprised her parents—

"You shall be paid to-morrow, sir. Call at this hour, and the money shall be ready."

The man, almost as much surprised as Mr. and Mrs. Lee, looked upon the flushed and indignant face of Helen for a moment or two, and then recovering himself, said—

"A promise is all very well, my young lady, but I have had, in the last two or three months, more than enough of these. What surety have I that your promise will be kept?"

"I have just said," replied Helen, drawing her form up proudly, "that you would be paid to-morrow; let that suffice."

"The bill is sixty-four dollars," said the man, still lingering.

"If it were a thousand, I have told you that it would be paid to-morrow," returned Helen, sharply, while her eyes, that were fixed upon the man, flashed with a fiery indignation, that caused him to retreat a pace or two involuntarily.

Never before had the parents of Helen seen her so moved; and they looked upon her with a feeling of wonder. She had made her decision, and now, a feeling akin to desperation was in her heart.

"To-morrow at this hour?" said the collector, now speaking in a respectful voice, and slightly bowing, with a deferential air.

"I have said it," was briefly answered.

A moment or two the man fixed his eyes curiously upon the maiden's excited face, and then left the apartment. As he did so, Helen turned and fled to her chamber. Thither Mrs. Lee soon followed, but she found the door locked. Half an hour later she came again, but the lock was still turned; and it was so at the end of an hour.

"Helen!" she now called; for anxiety had overcome the instinctive reluctance at first felt to intrude herself forcibly upon her child. There was no answer, nor any movement heard within.

"Helen, dear! Helen!" repeated Mrs. Lee.

Still, all remained silent.

She called again, louder than before, and rattled the lock. There came, now, a feeble, half-smothered reply, as of one awaking from sleep.

"Helen, dear!"

"Yes, mother, I will be down in a little while," answered Helen.

Mrs. Lee retired, but with a troubled, restless feeling in her heart. What did Helen mean by the promise to pay so large a sum on the following day? Over and over a hundred times had she asked herself that question; but no satisfactory reply came. Where was she to get sixty-four dollars? All her resources she knew perfectly well. There would not be a single quarter bill due for a month. It was in vain that she continued to puzzle her thoughts. No satisfactory answer came.

At dinner time Helen joined her parents. She was very pale, and the expression of her countenance strangely altered. But she was more cheerful in manner than she had been for many days. She made no reference to the exciting scene of the morning, until her father said, with much concern of manner—

"I'm afraid, Helen, that you were wrong to promise that payment to-morrow. Where are you to get so much money? The collector will certainly be here at the time, and, if disappointed, will be more uncivil than he was to-day, and more inclined to give us trouble."

Helen smiled, as she answered in a composed voice—

"I did not promise lightly, father. I knew where I could get the money by simply asking for it."

"Where, my child?" enquired Mr. Lee, looking at his daughter very earnestly.

"More than one of those by whom I am engaged to give lessons, would, I know, advance, if applied to, what I need."

"I am not so sure of that, Helen," said Mr. Lee. "Most persons object to advances of money. Indeed, with some, such an application might end in the loss of scholars. People don't like to be annoyed in this way."

"I know at least one person who will neither object nor be annoyed," said Helen, in a low, yet firm voice. But she did not look into her father's face as she said this.

"Of whom do you speak?" enquired Mr. Lee.

"Of Mr. Bullfinch," replied Helen. Her voice was still lower, yet it did not in the least falter. Its firmness was preserved by its depression.

"Of Mr. Bullfinch!" Mr. Lee spoke with some surprise, yet with no manifestation of pleasure. "Why will you apply to him?"

"He has always treated me with great kindness," said Helen.

"He was certainly very kind to you to-day," remarked Mrs. Lee, "and we are greatly indebted to him for sending you home, instead of letting you go from house to house, in wet garments, for the purpose of giving your lessons. I have often heard him spoken of as a good-hearted man."

"Good-hearted only where some selfish end is to be gained," said Mr. Lee. "That is my estimation of his character."

Helen bent her head to conceal her face, the expression of which she feared was passing from her control.

"Have you not looked at him through the glass of prejudice?" asked Mrs. Lee.

"I believe not," was firmly answered. "I believe not," repeated Mr. Lee. After a pause, he added: "I met Mr. Bullfinch occasionally, while in business, but never was much drawn towards him. The sphere of every man's quality of mind is around him, as certainly as the quality of a rose is diffused in the atmosphere, and perceived by its odor, and this quality may be, and is perceived by all who came in contact with him. In Mr. Bullfinch I always had a repulsive perception of something extremely sensual and selfish."

"It is hardly safe," replied Mrs. Lee, "to decide upon a man's character on such slight and altogether intangible evidence."

"Yet," said Mr. Lee, "it is always safe to let such evidence place you upon your guard; and, believe me, that opportunities for personal observation will, in most cases, confirm the instinctive repugnance."

Helen listened to this brief conversation with an eagerness that would have betrayed itself had not the observation of her parents been, for the time, withdrawn from her. How fully did her own perceptions of Mr. Bullfinch's quality accord with those of her father! The thought of becoming his wife, when it was distinctly presented, caused her heart to cease, for the moment, its beating, and produced a feeling of suffocation.

The conversation between her father and mother was continued for some time, but she took no part in it whatever. To conceal, as far as possible, the painful state of mind from which she was suffering, Helen tried to partake of food. A few mouthfuls were received and swallowed—though producing on the palate no sensation of taste—and then the forced effort was abandoned. As soon as she could, with propriety, leave the table, she did so, and retiring once more to her chamber, abandoned her feelings to any current in which they might be inclined to flow. She did not again join her parents until tea-time, when she met them with a cheerfulness which they did not look for, and which she had scarcely hoped to assume. The father, however, saw much below the false exterior. He saw that Helen was acting a part; but what the part, and why assumed, he could not clearly understand.

CHAPTER III.

The day closed as it had begun, cold and stormy, adding its gloom to the already too sad hearts of Mr. Lee and his family. Soon after tea, Helen bade her parents good night, and retired to her own room. Here she strove, once more, to collect her thoughts, to ponder the way before her, and to search again for the means of escape. Her promises to Mr. Bullfinch, and to the collector, had narrowed the chances against her. The one was to have an answer to his suit in the morning, and the other to receive the large sum of sixty-four dollars. Unless the answer to Mr. Bullfinch were favorable, she saw no way by which the demand of the latter could be satisfied.

Hour after hour, during the wretched night that followed, the unhappy girl remained awake, now pondering, with shrinking heart, the fearful abyss down which she was about to plunge, and now eagerly renewing the search for a path leading to a place of safety. It was long after midnight, when she, at length, found temporary relief in sleep. When she awoke, the sun was shining brightly into her window. The storm had passed away, and the face of nature smiled again. Alas! her heart gave back no answering smile. Dark and portentous clouds were yet above and around it.

The time for a decision had come. Ere mid-day, the unfeeling collector would be there, and his demand must be satisfied. Was there no other resource for the poor girl but Mr. Bullfinch? In ten families she gave music lessons, and six out of the ten families were wealthy. Among these, was there no true woman to whom she could go and find wise counsel and aid in her great extremity? Was there not a single heart of sympathy among all these? No one able and willing to stand forth and forbid the fearful sacrifice about to be offered up? We know not. But, doubtless, there was. Yet, even where there exists a humane regard for others, how rarely does it suffer itself to become fully interested! How quick are we to turn away with indifference when the needy and the seeker present themselves!

As the time of decision drew nearer and nearer, a feeling of desperation came over the maiden's heart.

"This must not be!" she said, with a sudden energy of feeling, as she stood thoughtful in her chamber, prepared, at a much earlier hour than usual, to go out. "This must not be. I will make one effort, at least, to gain time, even if all is lost in the end. Mrs. Barker has been very kind; has always shown great interest in me. To her I am indebted for many scholars. She cannot, she will not refuse to help me in this great extremity. I will go to her, and tell her everything."

With this resolution, Helen left her home that morning.

Mrs. Barker was a widow, with two daughters. She had a large income, and was regarded in society as a humane and liberal woman. In many of the public charities she took an active part, and contributed of her money freely to their support. Her style of living was expensive, but not beyond what her ample means would justify. In her intercourse with others, no matter what their condition, she was generally kind and lady-like. In part, this flowed from natural goodness, and in part from a desire to be thought well of by every one.

Mrs. Barker sat reading. The book was one of imaginary pictures: yet the groupings were of characters in real life. Against the wrong now visible, the heart of the reader was indignant; and now she sympathised deeply with suffering innocence. Those who knew of this suffering, and yet relieved it not, and those who remained in ignorance thereof, from lack of thought, she blamed alike. "I would not have done so," she said to herself, with a feeling of self-complacent virtue. As she thus thought within herself, a servant came to say that Miss Lee was in the parlor, and would like to speak with her.

"This is not the day for your Spanish lesson, Clara?" said Mrs. Barker, speaking in a slight tone of surprise to her eldest daughter, a young lady in her eighteenth year.

"I don't take my Spanish lesson until to-morrow," replied Clara.

"I wonder what she can want? Perhaps she has mistaken the day. You had better go down and see her, Clara."

Clara went down to the parlor, while Mrs. Barker re-opened her book. She was in the midst of a scene that drew strongly on her sympathies, and the interruption had not been altogether agreeable. She had just caught up the broken thread of the narrative, when Clara returned, and said that it was her mother Helen wished to see.

"What does she want?" asked Mrs. Barker, in a disappointed tone.

"I don't know, mother. She didn't say."

"Well, I suppose I must see her." And Mrs. Barker, with a reluctance that she did not seek to conceal, laid aside her book, and arose to leave the room.

"I don't think she is very well," remarked Clara. "I never saw her look so badly. There isn't a bit of color in her cheeks."

Scarcely heeding this, Mrs. Barker withdrew, and descended to the parlors, in one of which she found the young teacher.

"Well, Helen," she said, rather coldly, as Miss Lee arose on her entrance.

This coldness was perceived by the poor girl, and it dashed the hope of succor she had permitted herself to cherish. She stood, her eyes upon the floor, and without the courage to make known the purpose of her visit.

"Sit down, Helen," said Mrs. Barker, noticing her embarrassment. Helen sunk back into the chair from which she had just arisen. She had not yet uttered a single word.

"You wished to see me, Clara said." If there had been, in the voice of Mrs. Barker, anything of sympathy, Helen would, in the abandonment of a heart appalled by the approach of utter ruin, have thrown herself upon her, and cried—"Oh! save me! save me!" As it was, she hurriedly sought to compose herself, and, as soon as she was composed enough to speak, said—

"I am not very well, Mrs. Barker, and if you do not object, would like to omit Clara's lesson to-morrow."

"Object, Helen!" replied Mrs. Barker, with manifest surprise, at so singular an application. "Why should I object? Sickness is a sufficient excuse under all circumstances."

Helen cast her eyes to the floor, and remained silent for a few moments, in hurried conference with herself, as to whether she should make known the real object of her visit. But the repulsive sphere of the lady was so strong, that she felt her case to be hopeless.

"Good morning, ma'am," she said, as she arose up, and slightly inclined her body.

There was something in the tones of Helen's voice, and in her manner, as she said this, and then turned away, and almost ran from the house, that Mrs. Barker did not, for a long time, forget. Scarcely had the jar of the closing door ceased to vibrate in the ears of the lady, ere she repented of her coldness, and wished that she had received the visitor in a different spirit. But it was now too late to remedy the evil.

CHAPTER IV.

"I shall not have even this to sustain me." These last words of Helen Lee, as she hurriedly turned from Henry Wellford, at their last interview, kept ringing in the young man's ears: and as he pondered them, he saw but too clearly the painful struggle through which her heart was passing.

"Her love for me is still the same." This was the just conclusion to which he arrived, so soon as the agitated waters of his spirit had time to run clear. "Why, then, does she propose that we be to each other hereafter as strangers? Oh, poverty! Thou art a curse!"

In this bitter exclamation, Wellford answered his own question. Still, the answer was far from being entirely satisfactory. There was a future for them both. He had ability, industry and energy; and he was willing to suffer, to work and to wait. Could Helen not do the same? Why this sudden, unwomanly impatience? The more he thought, the more difficult to be found seemed the clue to Helen's strange conduct. But for the words—"I shall not have even this to sustain me," he would have fallen back on the usual explanation in such cases—estranged affections. He could not do so now. He knew that she loved him. What, then, could it mean? Why did she wish to break the cord entwining both their hearts, and feeling a mutual pulsation? As he continued to think, suggestion after suggestion was presented; and among them one near the truth; yet that was quickest repelled, as both monstrous and impossible.

"No—no—no!" he said, with an inward shudder, "she would never make that sacrifice. There is about her too much of the true woman for that."

And he cast the thought from his mind.

"What can it mean?" Again and again the distressed young man asked himself this question. But his thoughts gave back no reliable answer. If Helen were alone in the world, how clear would have been the way before him! He would have gone to her, and asked her at once to become the sunshine of his humble dwelling; or, if Providence had blessed him with abundance, would have opened wide the doors of home and heart, to take in the beloved ones for whom she was toiling with such an earnest self-devotion. Alas for him! neither of these conditions existed. She was not alone, and he was poor. His slender income barely sufficed, under a system of the closest economy, to procure for himself and mother the meagre necessities and a few of the comforts of life. To have proposed any thing to Helen, under such circumstances, would have been a mockery—and so the young man felt it.

The gloomy day had waned towards evening, and Wellford was about bringing his uncheered labors to a close, when the merchant in whose service he was drew him aside and said—

"Henry, I have for some time wished to see you getting a higher salary. Your ability is worth more than you receive. And yet, in my business, only a certain sum can be paid for assistance. That sum is now paid, and cannot be increased. If there was a vacancy above you, I would at once promote you to that vacancy. But, as you know, none exists, or is likely for some time to exist. I cannot fill your place to my satisfaction as well as it is now filled; that I know too well. Still, I am not so selfish as to wish to keep you when an opportunity for rising is offered. There is such an opportunity now, Henry. Do you wish to embrace it?"

The young man's face flushed, and he became instantly excited. Is it any wonder? With as much composure as he could force himself to assume, he replied—

"I need very much an increase of salary, Mr. Vincent; but have no wish to leave your service."

"Your duty to yourself is first, Henry," said the merchant. "I can fill your place without trouble; though not so well as it is now filled, I am assured; but an opportunity like the present may not offer to you again for years."

"What is the situation to which you refer?" asked Wellford, by no means concealing the eager interest he felt.

"You are aware, I suppose, that Mr. Burton, one of Lane & Latta's book-keepers, has been in very poor health for a long time. Well, I heard this morning, that his physician had positively ordered him to leave the desk, and travel for at least two or three months. His place will, in consequence, be vacant."

"Not permanently?"

"Yes. His physician says that he must, when his strength is sufficiently restored, seek other and more active employment. He has, accordingly, given notice to Lane & Latta that he will be obliged to give up his situation finally."

"He receives a thousand dollars a year."

"Yes; that is the salary."

"Do you think it possible for me to obtain the place?" said Wellford, holding his breath as he waited for a reply.

"I do," was the assured answer.

"There will be many applicants, so soon as it is known that Burton intends to leave."

"We must be in advance of these applications," said Mr. Vincent, in a manner that showed his entire confidence in the result.

"I have no acquaintance with Messrs. Lane & Latta," said Wellford.

"But I have," replied his kind employer, "and my word with them will go a great way. In fact, Henry, to set your mind at rest, I have already spoken to them, and the place is yours if you are willing to accept of it."

"Oh, sir!" exclaimed Wellford, suddenly grasping the hand of Mr. Vincent, and exhibiting strong emotion. "I will never, never forget this! You don't know the good you have done."

Mr. Vincent smiled, and said something kind about the just reward of faithful service, adding—

"Ever be as true to the interests of your future employers as you have been to mine, Henry, and you will never want for friends to promote your interests. Ability and honesty are ever in demand; and the higher the ability the more ample will be the reward."

Though clouds and darkness were in the sky when Henry Wellford turned his steps homeward on that evening, the face of nature was not gloomy to him. Light seemed shining all around him, and he walked with a step so elastic that he scarcely seemed to leave his weight upon the earth. After telling his mother of his good fortune, and taking, hurriedly, his evening meal, for which he found little appetite, he dressed himself to go out, determined at once to call upon Helen Lee, tell her of his good fortune, and offer his hand in marriage.

A few times only had Wellford visited Helen at her father's house. He did not belong to a family which, from any cause—whether from wealth, or from literary or professional standing—had gained a prominent place in the community. His father, a poor but honest man, had lived and died in obscurity, though honoring the position he held, and transmitting his virtues to a son better educated than he had been, and, therefore, better fitted for that higher place in society he was destined to gain. His visits to Helen were not smiled upon by Mrs. Lee, whose mind had become fixed in the hope of social elevation through the marriage of her accomplished child. How this was to be brought about, she did not exactly know. Extreme poverty had excluded Helen from that social contact formerly enjoyed; and now, she only entered the mansions of wealth as a humble and unregarded teacher. We are forced to say, that the marked interest shown by Mr. Bullfinch, in sending Helen home in a carriage through the storm, had affected her with a pleasure beyond what the simple act of kindness might legitimately have awakened. Almost truant to themselves, her thoughts played with pictures drawn against the future, in which Helen, as the wife of Mr. Bullfinch, formed a prominent figure. Half ashamed of herself, the mother would sweep an obliterating hand across these pictures; but, ere she was aware of it, fancy would sketch them again, while she looked on dreamily, yet with a pleased emotion. And thus it was, at times, through all that day of agony to her nearly distracted child.

Thus it was, at an early hour in the evening, when there came a knock at the door. Mrs. Lee opened it, and there stood Henry Wellford.

"Is Helen at home?" he enquired.

Mrs. Lee held the door partly open; and, without asking the young man to walk in, replied—

"She is in; but not well. She has retired to her room."

Wellford expressed regret, and asked if she were seriously indisposed. Mrs. Lee answered, indifferently, that she had taken some cold.

"If not too much indisposed to come down, I should like particularly to see her this evening. Will you say this to her, Mrs. Lee?"

"I cannot permit her to be disturbed," was coldly replied.

Still the young man lingered, while the damp air swept against Mrs. Lee's thinly clad person, causing her to close the door farther; almost, in fact, shutting it in Wellford's face.

"Good evening, sir," she said, finally; and, in the next moment, the generous lover of her daughter, who had come to lay his hand and opening fortune at her disposal, stood alone, repulsed rudely, on the outer threshold.

Indignant pride held, for a time, the mastery over Wellford. At first, he permitted himself to believe that Mrs. Lee had repulsed him in accordance with her daughter's wishes. But his cooler judgment made a more correct decision. This decision was strengthened by the fact that Mrs. Lee had treated him with exceeding formality on each of his previous visits. At the house of a mutual friend, he had most frequently met her, and an intimacy, almost as unreserved as that between a brother and sister, had grown up between them. Freely had they spoken to each other of what was personal to themselves, their hopes, fears, trials and privations; and, without a formal avowal of love on the one side, or a looking for it on the other, they had come to regard the uncertain future as a way they were to tread side by side; and that thought was the pleasantest of all the thoughts that flowed through their minds.

No wonder that the sudden interruption of this thought produced turbulence in the minds of both.

From the residence of Helen, Wellford returned immediately home. Half the night was spent in pondering the new aspect which things had so suddenly assumed. In the morning, with a calmer mind, he was able to look at the whole subject.

"I must and will see her." This he said as he left home. He had frequently met Helen, on her way, at an early hour in the morning, to give lessons, and thus secured the brief pleasure of seeing her face, and listening to a voice the tones of which grew daily more musical to his ears. Now, he would see her with a more defined and higher purpose.

CHAPTER V.

"All lost! all lost!" sobbed the wretched girl, as she hastily retired from the dwelling of Mrs. Barker, and took her way, she knew not, in the bewildered state of her mind, whither. Utterly hopeless as she now was, fluttering like a charmed bird almost in the very jaws of the serpent, she yet held back from the final, dread alternative that loomed up the more awfully the nearer it approached.

With her eyes cast upon the ground, Helen moved along with hurried steps, the agitation of her mind giving fleetness to her motions, and continued to walk for nearly half an hour; when, in some measure, recovering her external consciousness, she looked around in surprise to find that she was in a strange part of the city, and remote from her home. Retracing, now, her steps, and, at the same time, forcing her thoughts to a consideration of what was next to be done in the limited space of time left to her, she took her way towards the dwelling of Mr. Bullfinch, attracted thitherward by an influence which she did not seek to resist, and yet she was not fully determined to go there, without another effort to escape the doom that now seemed almost inevitable. She had reached the neighborhood in which Mr. Bullfinch resided, and was only a short distance from his house, when, lifting her eyes, she saw, a few paces in advance of her, one, whom of all others, she least wished to encounter—her lover, Henry Wellford. And yet, how the sight of him caused her heart to bound, and the blood to rush in hot currents through all her veins! How earnestly did her woman's nature take up instantly the plea for him, and chide the cold, mercenary, calculating spirit to whose influence she was giving herself up body and soul.

Wellford was not approaching Helen, and did not, therefore, see her at the moment she recognized him. How little knew she of what was in his thought! How little dreamed she that he was then in search of her; and that he was both able and ready to save her from a fate more dreaded than death!

Checking her pace, Helen lingered along, in order that Wellford might get sufficiently in advance, to remove the danger of observation. A crowd of passengers hiding him, for the space of a minute from his sight, she found herself suddenly within a few feet of him. He had paused on a corner, and was gazing, first along one street and then another, his eyes alternately ranging both pavements. At the moment he was partly turned from her; starting quickly forward, she almost brushed him with her garments, passing and hurrying on. For the time, her heart ceased to beat, and her breath was suspended.

"Helen! Helen!"

In an instant after his voice reached her. Why, why did she not obey the quick impulse of her heart, and pause as that voice, to her ears so full of music, fell upon her ears? Why did she not turn for one more look at the face so beautiful to her eyes? Had she done so, she would have been saved. Alas! that it was otherwise. For an instant only were her steps arrested; then, like a frightened deer, she started forward, and quickly disappeared from the sight of Wellford, who did not attempt to follow, but, with a heavy heart, took his way to his place of business. Fortune had begun to smile upon him; but, how cold the smile now, that was so warm and bright when its beams first shone!

Panting from excitement and speed, Helen next found herself at the door of Mr. Bullfinch, and, with a kind of blind desperation, ascended the marble steps, and placed her hand upon the bell to ring for admission. But, ere the summons was given, the native delicacy of her pure heart aroused itself against the unmaidenly act, and, still irresolute, she was about turning away, when the door opened, and Adam Bullfinch met her face to face.

"My dear girl!" he exclaimed, seizing her hand, and drawing her with a force she had neither the strength of mind or body to resist, into the hall, closed the door, and led her, now all passive, to her destiny, into the elegant parlors where she was so soon to preside as mistress!

"My dear Miss Lee!" He still held tightly the hand of the poor young girl. "I have been looking for you this hour. My heart told me you would be here"—he laid a hand gracefully upon his bosom—"and more than this, told me that my love for you was no rejected passion."

The words were like heavy strokes on the heart of Helen. She caught her breath, panted, grew faint, and would have sunk to the floor, had not the arm of Mr. Bullfinch, who saw, from her extreme paleness, that she was suddenly ill, been drawn around her. Her head drooped upon his shoulder. Not voluntary, oh no! She had become half unconscious. Slightly alarmed, the old man bore her to a sofa, and commenced bathing her face with cold water. He called for no attendance. In fact, his niece was not at home. In expectation of the coming of Helen, he had induced her, on some pretence, to go out on a visit for the morning.

Suspended consciousness was but temporary. Helen soon recovered, and arose from the reclining position in which she had been placed. Mr. Bullfinch was holding her hand; but now she forcibly withdrew it from his grasp, a movement that caused a shadow to flit over his animated face.

"You have come to a decision, Helen, or you would not be here," said Mr. Bullfinch, endeavoring to recover the hand of his victim, but not succeeding in the effort. "Do not keep me long in suspense; and, before you speak, remember how much is at stake."

That was unwisely said. Helen did remember how much was at stake, and it caused her to start in sudden terror, at thought of the horrible pit opening at her feet, to rise quickly from the sofa, and spring towards the door, saying, as she did so, in an agonized voice—"O, spare me! In mercy spare me! I am too weak for this. Kill me; but ask me not to encounter so fearful an ordeal."

Pausing, ere she had reached the door, the wretched creature pressed, convulsively, her open hands over her face. A gush of tears gave vent to the stifling oppression of her bosom, and sinking into a chair, she sobbed for a time violently.

There came not to the selfish heart of Adam Bullfinch, as he looked upon the quivering form of the poor girl, now within his toils, the smallest motion of relenting. In fear of losing the object of his sensual regard, his passion grew into an intenser flame; and, with the skill of the mere sensual man, he composed and controlled his exterior with most consummate art.

Until Helen had grown calm, Mr. Bullfinch did not speak again; but he was by her side, caressing a hand she had relinquished, not without resistance. With the utmost tenderness he now spoke to her; but he did not urge his suit as at first.

"It is a hard life that you are leading, Helen," he said, with such well assumed sympathy, that her heart was deceived, and it leaned, hearkening, and with a softened response, to the tone.

"A life," he continued, "that is obscuring and destroying one fitted to adorn the highest station."

This was not adroitly said. It appealed to her pride, and that was nearly extinct. Perceiving the lack of response, Mr. Bullfinch, after a moment's silence, resumed—

"You have seemed in trouble for some time, Helen. Will you not confide in me as a true friend? There is, believe me, none living who would do more to secure your happiness than I. Come! Make me your confidant. Tell me freely of your anxieties, your cares and your fears, and if there is power in a human arm, they shall be relieved. Love ever seeks to bless its object."

"I am in trouble," said Helen, with the calmness that always follows the subsidence of strong emotion.

"Speak, then. Let it have full utterance. There is no human ear that will listen so earnestly as mine."

Helen, with partly averted face, remained silent.

"Your father is in poor health," said Mr. Bullfinch, slowly. "His physician has forbidden all exertion, bodily, as well as mental. On your feeble arm rests the heavy burden of sustaining the family. But your arm is too weak. Will you not let me hold it up? I have manly strength. Let me put it forth in your behalf. Believe me, that the privilege of doing so will be the dearest pleasure of my life."

"Oh, sir!" exclaimed Helen, turning suddenly towards him, "you can aid me if you will."

"Speak!" said he. "Speak freely, my dear Miss Lee. To your wish I can only give a quick response."

"My father needs——"

"Go on," said Mr. Bullfinch, seeing that Helen paused with hesitation.

"Our circumstances are very limited, as you must know, Mr. Bullfinch." Helen was now entirely self-possessed, and, as she spoke, she looked calmly into the old man's face. "My earnings are our sole income. But these have, hitherto, proved insufficient for our wants, small as we have endeavored to make them. Several debts have accumulated, and the persons to whom they are owed, have become impatient. Yesterday, a man to whom sixty-four dollars is owed, demanded its payment. He was angry and insolent. Distressed beyond measure at my parents' distress, I desperately promised the payment of the money this morning. If you can lend me that sum, or advance it on Fanny's lessons, the act will be one for which my heart will bless you."

"Is it so bad with you, my poor child!" said Mr. Bullfinch with great tenderness. "Why did you not tell me of this before? Have I not ever sought your friendship and confidence? Have I not always manifested the warmest interest in your welfare?"

He was now holding her hand tightly, and looking fondly into her face.

"You have but to say the word," he continued, "and all I have is yours. One little word, spoken now, will lift you, and those you love with such deep self-devotion, above the shadow of earthly evil. I hold your promise to an answer to my suit this morning. Are you ready for the response? Think, dear Helen, how much you have to gain for you and yours; and think of the exquisite happiness you will confer upon one, who, until he looked upon your sweet young face, never saw the angel of his being. Say that you will be mine, Helen, and the words will unlock for you the iron doors of wealth. A day need not pass, before the joy of seeing your parents forever raised above the pressure of want and care, may be yours. Can you look at them, and hesitate?"

Helen was silent for a few moments. But, her election was made. That appeal in favor of her parents had decided the question. But, there was still a matter of justice that she wished to settle—justice to her infatuated suitor. If he took her, he must take her for what she was. She could yield him a hand, but she had no love to give. So far as she was concerned, the struggle was now over. The throbbings of her heart had ceased. Upon its surface had passed an icy calm; and if there was agitation beneath, it was far too deep for visible manifestation.

"Mr. Bullfinch," said she, her fine person seeming to grow taller under his admiring gaze, while a change passed over her pale countenance that excited a moment's surprise. How beautiful it was, in its pale, cold, elevated dignity! "Mr. Bullfinch, you have asked of me this hand, in marriage. It is yours——"

She extended the hand, which he seized eagerly, and covered with kisses. Not a flush passed over her face. There was no softness in her cold, bright eyes. An observer would have noticed on her finely arched lips, a slight curving motion, and he would not have mistaken its meaning.

"But"—she added, as the ardent lover lifted his eyes again to her countenance—"that is all it is in my power to give you. The heart, Mr. Bullfinch, is not so easy of disposal."

"I will trust for that," said he fondly. "Love begets love. I have no fears. Give me the hand, and I will not despair of the heart. That will come in its own good time. Oh! you have made me the happiest man alive, to-day."

And with ardor he kissed her brow, cheek and lips. Helen did not shrink from the salutation; but her reception of it was statue-like. Her eyes now rested upon a mantle clock, and she saw that it was near the hour when the money she had promised must be paid.

"Let me repeat, Mr. Bullfinch," and Helen spoke with solemnity, "that my heart cannot go with my hand; and you must never hope to possess it. I will be to you dutiful and faithful. All in my power will be done for your happiness. But, love goes not at the mere bidding. I do not love you—I can never love you. The difference between us is too great. And now, sir, if, after this declaration, you wish to withdraw the offer you have made, still hold yourself at full liberty to do so."

"Not for a moment will I think of it," replied Mr. Bullfinch, with ardor—"no, not for a moment. Angel!" And again seizing her hand, he pressed it to his lips. "Be it the highest aim of my life to secure your happiness."

From Helen there was not the slightest response. Nothing could have been colder or more passive than her reception of this little piece of fond enthusiasm on the part of her lover.

"Ah, my Helen," he resumed, "you do not yet know me fully. You cannot realize how entirely my life will be devoted to your happiness, and to that of your parents."

"For the sake of my parents," said Helen, in a voice from which all feeling was removed, "I would do and sacrifice everything I dare sacrifice. And now, that you refer to them, let us understand each other in regard to the future. My home must be their home."

"I desire nothing else," was quickly answered.

"They must be at once raised above care and want; in fact, above all anxiety touching the future."

"It shall be as you wish, Helen. You cannot be happy without seeing them happy; and your happiness I desire above all things. Such filial devotion I honor. And, moreover, it is an earnest to me of a pleasant future. So devoted, self-sacrificing a daughter, cannot but make a good and loving wife. Heaven bless you, sweet one!"

"And now, Mr. Bullfinch," said Helen, rising—he kept tightly hold of her hand—"I can remain no longer. The time has already come when my promise to the collector must be fulfilled. I wish to keep my word with him, as well as save my parents from the pain his insolence will occasion."

Mr. Bullfinch released her hand, and going to a secretary which stood in one of the parlors, unlocked it, and, taking a purse, filled it with pieces of gold.

"Here, sweet one," said he, placing the money in her hands, and kissing her white cheek as he did so, "go home quickly and set the hearts of your parents at rest. They may thank Heaven for so good a child, as I do for the destiny of so good a wife."

Helen received the purse, and, without looking at it, thrust it in her pocket.

"You will call as usual, to-morrow," said Mr. Bullfinch. "We will then talk about the future."

"Call here, Mr. Bullfinch!" returned Helen, in a tone of surprise.

"Yes—no—why—I did not think"—stammered the old man—"oh no; of course not. It would not be just delicate for you to visit here now. But when shall I see you again?"

"That will be according to your own good pleasure," replied Helen, coldly.

"I will visit you this evening."

Helen inclined her head in acquiescence, and then, with a "Good morning, sir," turned and passed hurriedly from the room. At the door, Mr. Bullfinch, who had followed with light footsteps, was by her side. He had lifted his hat from the rack, in passing, and was now ready to accompany her in her walk home. Against this she offered a feeble remonstrance; but gallantry and inclination were not to be overcome.

Of the many tender things said by Mr. Bullfinch, and unheard by Helen, we will make no record. They parted at her father's door, Helen not even looking into his face, nor, in fact, giving to his stealthy pressure of her hand, or low spoken—"I will see you to-night," the smallest response.

CHAPTER VI.

It was eleven o'clock, the time at which the collector was to receive his money, and yet, Helen, who had been out nearly three hours, had not yet returned. For more than an hour, Mr. and Mrs. Lee sat awaiting, momentarily, the return of their daughter. Thought was busy; but their feelings too much oppressed for conversation. And so both remained silent.

Eleven o'clock had come, and still Helen was absent, and now each listened for a knock at the door in a state of nervous anxiety. Both started, at length, at a loud, impatient rap. Mrs. Lee answered the summons, and there stood the hard-featured collector.

"Well, madam?" spoke the man, with a rude familiarity of tone, "I'm here."

"Will you walk in, sir?" said Mrs. Lee.

He entered, and was conducted to the small sitting-room.

"Good day." Mr. Lee arose, and handed him a chair.

"Well, sir," said the collector, as he sat down, "I'm here at the hour. Is the money you promised me, ready?"

"I didn't promise you any money," replied Mr. Lee, so much fretted at the man's insolent manner that he could not control his feelings.

"Didn't promise to pay me sixty-four dollars at eleven o'clock, to-day?"

"No, sir."

"Ah, pray what did you promise, then?" asked the collector, in a voice still more insolent and annoying.

"I promised nothing. I had no present means of paying your bill, and I told you so."

"Too bad! I ought to have known you were merely trifling with me to gain time. But, it will be worse for you; mark my word for it! Promised nothing, ha! I wonder why I'm here at precisely eleven o'clock?"

"My daughter promised, under excitement of feeling—wrongly promised—to pay your bill this morning," said Mr. Lee, speaking more firmly, and in that manly, re-active tone which always subdues vulgar impertinence. "That she is making an effort to keep her promise, her absence for some hours is to me sufficient evidence. We look for her return every moment. Whether she will bring the money or not, is more than I can tell. I almost hope she will not. You can await her return, or leave the house, as best suits your fancy. In either case, it is of little consequence to me. Your rudeness, I might better call it insolence, has made me quite indifferent. As to the consequences, which you have so freely threatened, I stand in no fear."

The collector did not anticipate a reaction like this. It came upon him so suddenly, that he cowered under the fixed gaze of Mr. Lee, who, at once conscious of the power he had gained, kept his eye upon him as he would have done upon a wild beast. He was still holding him thus at bay, when the street door was heard to open; then light feet came along the passage.

"Remember, sir!" said Mr. Lee, sternly, "not an improper word or tone to my child, under any circumstances. If she have not the money for you, it is no fault of hers."

Helen entered the room as he was speaking. So altered was the expression of her face, that her parents hardly recognized her.

"My child!" exclaimed Mr. Lee, "what has happened?"

She did not answer him, but turning to the collector, said, somewhat sternly:

"Here, as I expected."

As she spoke, she drew from her pocket the purse received from Mr. Bullfinch, adding, as she commenced counting out the pieces of gold:

"I have kept my promise. Your money is ready for you."

Not another word was spoken, until the collector, after receiving the amount of his bill, and passing a receipt, uttered a subdued good morning. He was rougher and ruder as a collector than as a man. To a great extent, his business had encrusted his feelings with a hard and jagged exterior. For the first time, in many weeks, he was touched by what he saw; and, as a thought of his own daughter came into his mind, accompanied with a question as to the price Helen Lee might have paid for gold, a low chill ran along his nerves.

"I didn't think it was quite so hard with them," he said to himself, as he left the house. "Money is often gained at too great a cost, and has been in this instance, I greatly fear. Ah, me! This is a hard business. I sometimes wish I were well out of it. A man must have iron nerves, and a heart like steel."

Thus musing to himself, he passed on his way. The tenderness and regret were but momentary. Soon, the man was in occultation, while the collector gained the ascendant. The inner softness was hidden by the rough, jagged, acquired exterior.

"My dear child!" said Mr. Lee, catching hold of his daughter, the moment they were freed from the collector's presence, and speaking in a voice of deep concern—"what have you done? Where did you get all this money? Speak, my child! Oh, speak!"

Helen had dreaded this meeting with her parents. While hurrying homeward, her thought had gone forward, picturing the interview which had now come, and she had sought to prepare herself for it, and to fix a rule of action. Alas! of how little avail do we often find preparation for a great heart-trial! It proved of no avail now. For a brief time only did Helen struggle against overmastering emotion; then, with a low, bursting sob, she let her head fall upon his bosom. How still she lay there; all the strength of mind she could rally, striving for external composure. This was at length gained; when raising herself up, and laying her hands upon her father's temples, she pressed backwards his fast whitening locks, and said, with a loving smile, that seemed like sun-light suddenly breaking on her pale face—

"You shall know all, soon."

"All what, dear Helen? All what? I am frightened. What have you done? Why concealment now? Speak out, my child: speak now, if you love me."

"Have you seen Mr. Bullfinch?" asked Mrs. Lee. She had her own thoughts, and she wished to verify them as quickly as possible.

"I have," replied Helen; the smile she had assumed fading from her countenance.

"And you received this money from him?" continued Mrs. Lee.

"Yes, mother. To his kindness are we indebted for timely relief!"

"Helen!" Mr. Lee held his daughter from him, and gazed into her face with a look of intense anguish. "Helen!" and he spoke with solemnity—"At what price, my child? At what price?"

"You will know that soon, dear father!" replied Helen, now regaining her self-possession. "Mr. Bullfinch will be here to-night."

She moved away a pace or two, saying that she had lessons to give during the morning.

"I cannot remain in doubt, Helen," said Mr. Lee: "suspense like this is more than I am able to bear."

"You shall know all in good time. But do not urge me now," returned Helen; "for I can speak no further."

"Has Mr. Bullfinch asked you to marry him?" said Mr. Lee, advancing towards Helen, and grasping the hand a few moments before withdrawn from him. She tried to escape, but her father kept a firm hold.

"Speak, dear. Say yes or no. I ask but a word."

A breathless silence followed. Then, with averted eyes, she answered,

"Yes."

"I feared as much," returned Mr. Lee, sadly.—"I feared as much. Oh!" clasping his hands together and looking upwards—"has it come to this!—to this!"

"And you have given consent?"—he added, a few moments after. But Helen, instead of answering, went hastily from the room. A little while afterwards she came down from her chamber, and without saying anything to her parents, or even turning her face toward them as she passed through the room where they were sitting, left the house to give her lessons in music as usual.

"Dreadful! dreadful! dreadful! That it should come to this!" almost sobbed Mr. Lee.

"Come to what?" asked Mrs. Lee, who had, from the first, been far less moved than her husband.

Mr. Lee gazed at his wife, in undisguised wonder, for a short time.

"Come to what, did you say?" he at length asked, in a half rebuking voice.

"What dreadful consequence do you fear, Mr. Lee? Mr. Bullfinch's proposals are, of course, perfectly honorable."

"Honorable! Good Heavens, Helen! This from you!"

Mr. Lee was strongly excited. His wife looked rebuked; but it was more from his manner, than from any clear comprehension of the error she had committed in seeming to favor the marriage of her daughter with Mr. Bullfinch; for both understood clearly enough that this question was now to come up for consideration and decision. After a few moments, Mr. Lee said—

"If Mr. Bullfinch comes to us with honorable proposals for the hand of our daughter, and she is willing to accept his offer, what will you do?"

"Never, while I live, will I consent to so unnatural a sacrifice," replied Mr. Lee, warmly.

"But, if Helen have already accepted his offer. What then?"

"She has not done so."

"She has taken from him a gift of money," said Mrs. Lee.

"No—no—no," replied the father. "Not a gift, but a loan. Only an advance on the tuition of his niece. It can be nothing more."

"She had a purse full of gold. It could not have contained less than two or three hundred dollars."

Mr. Lee groaned aloud.

"My own impression is," said Mrs. Lee, and the tone in which she spoke did not indicate much distress of mind arising from the conviction—"that Helen has consented to become the wife of Mr.

Bullfinch. If this be so, opposition on our part will be unavailing. As something inevitable, let us look at it with at least a degree of calmness."

"Calmness! Oh, Helen!" said Mr. Lee, reproachfully.

"Mr. Bullfinch, besides having large wealth, is a man in good social standing," resumed his wife. "The only drawback is his age. But, if Helen can accept of this, she may be happier with him than as the wife of a younger man, less favorably circumstanced, and with an undisciplined character. Think, Mr. Lee, from what a condition of toil, anxiety, and suffering she will at once be lifted."

"Into gilded misery," said Mr. Lee, bitterly, "and there is none so hard to endure as that. Helen! Helen! Do not talk so to me. From your lips I did not expect to hear words like these. Would you sell your child's happiness for gold?"

"Happiness!" returned Mrs. Lee, in a voice of equal bitterness. "For her, poor child! there has been little, for a year or two past, that we might call by that name. Any change has in it a promise of good; and this one, it seems to me, of great good."

"Good in such a life-companionship! Oh, Helen! Poverty has strangely altered you, or you never would speak thus. Never—never! Poor child! How sadly her white face told the story of her heart-despair in prospect of so fearful a sacrifice. But it cannot—it must not take place."

"Do you know any harm of Mr. Bullfinch?" asked Mrs. Lee.

"Oh, Helen! Helen! You will drive me distracted. Are you not a woman and a mother? How, then, can you favor such a marriage? In it, there cannot be a single element of conjunction—nothing of a true marriage. The adjunction will be merely external, and attended by a sphere of repulsion, on one side at least, that will be the fruitful source of untold misery. An old man, sixty years of age, and a confirmed sensualist at that—and a pure young girl, in the bloom of innocent maidenhood! The angels would weep at such a union! I could smile, and thank God for the death of my child, as I stood by her newly-made grave, if death had snatched her from a fate like this."

"You look only at the shadows in this picture, Mr. Lee," said his wife, in answer. "It has strong lights as well as deep shadows. They must be allowed to blend under our vision, if we would truly appreciate the picture. Look for a moment at our present condition. Could anything be more hopeless? Could there be for our child, a rougher way in life, or a stormier sky?"

"Rougher and stormier a thousand fold!" replied Mr. Lee. "A very paradise are her present surroundings, to what they will be, if so sad a fate as to become the wife of old Adam Bullfinch awaits her."

"I cannot see and feel as you do," said Mrs. Lee. "Helen must act her own good pleasure in the matter. If she thinks she can be happy as the cherished wife of Mr. Bullfinch, why should we object? Above the thousand ills that are now sapping the very foundations of her life, she will be at once removed. It is no use to talk about it. I cannot see anything so dreadful in such a marriage. Old men are proverbially tender and indulgent of their young wives. Better be an old man's darling, you know, than a young man's slave."

"Spare me, Helen! Spare me!" exclaimed Mr. Lee, putting up his hands, while an expression of blended pain and disgust darkened his countenance. "From another, I might have borne this with some patience: but, from you, it is terrible. Never, never, shall my voice sanction so fearful an outrage of all that is pure, and good and holy."

Under this strong reaction, Mrs. Lee remained silent. Yet did she not feel the force of her husband's objection. Already her fancy was picturing, in warm colors, the proud, social elevation that her daughter would attain. To be lifted at once from extreme poverty, to ease, wealth and abundance, was a change which she could not contemplate, without a feeling of lively satisfaction. For, looking at this consummation, so devoutly to be wished, she could not see the painful steps by which it must be attained. So dazzled were her eyes by the glitter of the golden exterior, that the ghastly skeleton, shrouded in gorgeous attire, was wholly invisible.

Thus were the parents of Helen Lee affected, when the prospect of so great a change in the future life of their daughter was suddenly presented. Mrs. Lee had been a woman of the world—we will not say a heartless woman of the world, for that would be giving rather too unfavorable an impression of her character. She had a higher appreciation of things external than of things internal; for she comprehended them much more clearly. A condition in life, and its power to give happiness, she could understand; but she was not able clearly to realize how a state of mind could make or mar everything. They were all very unhappy in consequence of their poverty, and the evils it entailed upon them; and it seemed to her that wealth would restore the sunshine. The prospect of this, presented so unexpectedly, dazzled her. Not so her husband. He had ever been unworldly. A man of pure, deep feeling, he understood how much of life's happiness depends upon states of mind. Helen's true character—its purity, delicacy, and womanly sensibility—he understood much better than his wife; and he at once comprehended, and with a distinctness that made him shudder, the consequences that would inevitably follow such a marriage as was proposed.

CHAPTER VII.

The more Mrs. Barker thought about her treatment of Helen, the more uncomfortable her feelings became. Her icy reception had, evidently, prevented the young teacher from making known some request, upon the granting of which much, it might be, depended.

"I will see her when she comes in the morning to give Clara a lesson, and learn in what way I can serve her."

With this resolution, she endeavored to dismiss the subject from her mind, but, for some reason, it would keep returning, and troubling her.

"I will try and get her a few more scholars," said Mrs. Barker, as she still thought of Helen. "Her parents are entirely dependent upon her, and I hardly think her income can, at present, be equal to their wants. Struggling industry needs encouragement and aid at times, as well as absolute indigence. I did think of letting Madame Arcot give Maggy lessons in French, in order to secure the true Paris pronunciation; but Helen's French is very pure, and I am not certain that I would really gain anything for my daughter, by giving her a foreign instructor. There are many things about Madame Arcot which I do not like, and, besides, she has not always borne the most unblemished character. I think, upon the whole, I will give Miss Lee another scholar. And there are Jane and Florence Ewing. Only yesterday I was talking with their mother about Madame Arcot, and she was hesitating on the question of employing her as their teacher. A word from me will, I know, determine the question in her mind. If I say that I prefer Miss Lee, and am about engaging her to give lessons to Maggy, she will decide to do the same. This will give Helen three more scholars, and make a very important addition to her income."

Her mind now thoroughly interested, Mrs. Barker called upon Mrs. Ewing, who was very ready to act from her suggestion. And not only so, becoming, through Mrs. Barker, interested in Helen, she promised to get up an interest for her among her friends, and did not, in the least, doubt her ability to secure for her some two or three more scholars.

Greatly relieved in mind, Mrs. Barker waited for the appearance of Helen, on the next morning. The hour had nearly arrived, at which she usually came, when she remembered that the lesson had been deferred on account of indisposition.

"That was but an excuse to cover some more important request, which my want of kindness prevented her from making. She will probably come as usual."

And in this she did not err; for, even as she thought so, Helen entered. There was so marked a change in her appearance, that Mrs. Barker could hardly help an exclamation when she came in. Marks of intense mental pain were strongly visible on her pale face, and there was a tightness about her lips, that no longer arched gracefully. Her eyes, usually drooping and modest, looked strangely large, and in them was something that Mrs. Barker could not comprehend, and from which she shrunk instinctively.

"You have been sick, Miss Lee," said she. "Why did you come out this morning?"

"I am quite well," Helen replied: but without referring to the fact that she had asked the privilege of omitting a lesson, on the plea of indisposition. There was a coldness in the tones of her voice, unmarked before, and a distance in her manner that repelled.

"When you called, yesterday," said Mrs. Barker, now forcing herself to approach a subject that was uppermost in her mind, "my attention was so much occupied with a book I was reading, that my manner must have seemed to you repulsive. It did not occur to me, until after you had gone away, that, in all probability, your visit to me was of more importance than merely to ask permission to omit a lesson on account of indisposition. In fear that my absent manner may have repulsed you, I have been troubled ever since. Am I right in this conclusion?"

"You are," replied Helen, with cold dignity.

"I regret, exceedingly, that you did not make known your wishes," said Mrs. Barker, with earnest kindness. "Believe me, that if I can serve you in anything, I will do so with sincere pleasure. What did you wish to ask of me?"

"The advance of a sum of money on Clara's lessons, in order to pay a small debt, for which my poor father was sorely troubled. In a moment of desperation, on hearing him abused and threatened, I promised that the money should be paid by a certain hour. I had no present means to do this, and, in a moment after the promise was made, felt that I had done wrong. But my word was given and must be kept. I knew where I could get the needed assistance, but, above all things, wished to avoid that application; and so, ma'am, I came to you, believing that you had not only the heart to feel for me, but the willing hand to help me in my extremity."

"So I have, Miss Lee! So I have," replied Mrs. Barker, warmly. "How much money do you need? Oh! why did you not make free to tell me this, yesterday?"

And, while she said this, Mrs. Barker drew her purse from her pocket.

"I was choked when I saw you, and could not utter a word of what was in my mind," replied Helen, with a distance and reserve that Mrs. Barker partly attributed to an offended state of mind.

"It is not now too late to aid you," resumed Mrs. Barker. "Tell me how much you need, and be assured, Miss Lee, that I will supply the sum with heart-felt pleasure."

"It is too late," said Helen, in a tone that came like a freezing breath on the feelings of her auditor.

"Too late! Say not so, Miss Lee. Have you obtained the needed sum?"

"I have."

"From whom did you get it?"

There was a pause of some moments. Then Helen answered, in a voice that betrayed but little feeling—

"From Mr. Bullfinch."

"Adam Bullfinch!" exclaimed Mrs. Barker, in surprise. "Why, of all others, did you apply to him?"

"Because, I knew that I had but to make known my want, and it would be supplied."

"And it was?"

"It was."

"Did he advance the sum you needed on the lessons you were giving his niece?" asked Mrs. Barker, her eyes fixed earnestly on the face of Helen.

"I asked the money as an advance," was coldly replied.

"How much did you require?"

"The debt was sixty-four dollars."

"I will lend you the money, or double the sum, if required. Here it is," and she unclasped her purse. "Take it, and at once cancel this obligation to Mr. Bullfinch. Was there none but him to whom you could go for such a favor?"

"None," sighed Helen, as she pushed back the hand of Mrs. Barker. "I thank you for your kindness; but it is too late, now."

"Too late! Miss Lee. Too late! How am I to understand this?" said Mrs. Barker, in visible concern.

"Time will explain all," murmured Helen, speaking in part to herself. Then, rising, she said, "It is late, and I have two more lessons to give this morning. Is Clara in her room?"

"A moment longer," said Mrs. Barker, laying her hand upon the arm of her auditor. "I have some good news for you. Mrs. Ewing told me, yesterday, that she was going to engage you to give French lessons to her two daughters. And I have another scholar for you, besides."

The expression that came into the face of Helen, when Mrs. Barker said this, was one of pain rather than pleasure. It was evident that she was disturbed by a quick emotion, to subdue which cost her a strong effort. In a little while, she replied, calmly—

"Two days ago, this would have been pleasant news to me; but it is of no particular interest, now. I have concluded to make no more engagements, and to give up all my present scholars, at the end of their respective quarters."

"Why, Helen! What does this mean!" exclaimed Mrs. Barker. "What are you going to do?"

Helen had no voice to reply. There was a genuine interest in the lady's manner, that touched her feelings; the more so, as the full conviction now dawned clearly on her mind, that, if she had but spoken out freely what was in her heart, on the day before, she might have been saved from the dread alternative she had so reluctantly taken. It was too late, now. A little while she sat silent, striving to regain her icy self-possession. Failing in this, she left the room abruptly.

At all this, Mrs. Barker was greatly troubled; and sorely did she repent of her fatal indifference, on the day before.

"When golden opportunities are lost," she sighed, "how rarely do they return to us again! We only have the present in which to do good; and if the present is neglected, it passes away from us for ever. Poor child! What has she done? What can be the meaning of her suddenly formed resolution, to give up her present occupation. Surely, she cannot have consented to become—"

She left the sentence unfinished in her own mind. She could not, even in thought, utter the word that was suggested.

"I must see her again before she leaves the house," said Mrs. Barker, after musing for some minutes. "It will not do to let a matter so serious as this take its course. Unhappy girl! What must she not have suffered! I never saw any one so changed in as brief a space of time."

The longer she continued to dwell upon the subject, the more earnest did she become. Impatiently she waited the hour to expire during which Helen was engaged with her daughter.

More and more clearly did her mind begin to see how she might extricate the poor girl from the unhappy position into which she had fallen.

"I will save her from a fate so dreadful," Mrs. Barker had just said to herself, when her ear caught the sound of light footsteps along the passage.

"Miss Lee!" she called, starting up and going quickly to the door of the room in which she was sitting. There was no answer, but she was in time to catch a momentary view of Helen as she was passing hurriedly from the house.

"Miss Lee! Helen!" she called again. But her voice was drowned in the heavy jar of the closing door. Claspings her hands together, she stood for a few moments, all her thoughts in a state of bewilderment. Then, as she turned slowly, and went back into the apartment from which she had come, she murmured, sadly—

"Unhappy girl! What a future is before her! Oh! that I had but known the greatness of her extremity! And I might have known it. God sent her to me; and when she came, shrinkingly and fearfully, my coldness and indifference repulsed her. Will He call me to answer for the marring of so fair and noble a spirit? But, is it yet too late? No, no, I will not believe it. She will be here again several times. I will secure her confidence, learn all the truth in relation to this matter between her and Mr. Bullfinch, and, if it is as I suppose, devise some means to save her from the false step she is about to take. To accomplish this, I will do and sacrifice much. And," she added, in a confident tone, "I must succeed in so good a work."

MODERN JERUSALEM.

Bayard Taylor gives us a not very flattering picture of the Holy City, as it now is. He says, in a recent letter to the New York Tribune:

Jerusalem, internally, gives no impression but that of filth, ruin, poverty and degradation. There are two or three streets in the western or higher portion of the city which are tolerably clean, but all the others, to the very gates of the Holy Sepulchre, are channels of pestilence. The Jewish Quarter, which is the largest, so sickened and disgusted me, that I should rather go the whole round of the city walls than pass through it a second time. The bazaars are poor, compared with those of other Oriental cities of the same size, and the principal trade seems to be in rosaries, both Turkish and Christian, crosses, seals, amulets, and pieces of the Holy Sepulchre. The population, which may possibly reach 20,000, is apparently Jewish, for the most part; at least, I have been principally struck with the Hebrew face, in my walks. The number of Jews has increased considerably within a few years, and there is also quite a number who, having been converted to Protestantism, were brought hither at the expense of English Missionary Societies for the purpose of forming a Protestant community. Two of the hotels are kept by families of this class. The English have lately built a very handsome church within the walls, and Rev. Dr. Gobat, well-known by his missionary labors in Abyssinia, now has the title of Bishop of Jerusalem. A friend of his in Central Africa gave me a letter of introduction for him, and I am quite disappointed in finding him absent. Rev. Dr. Barclay of Virginia, a most worthy man in every respect, is at the head of the American Mission here. There is, besides, what is called the "American Colony," at the village of Artos, near Bethlehem—a little community of converts, whose experiments in cultivation have met with remarkable success, and are much spoken of at present.

Whatever good the various missions here may accomplish, Jerusalem is the last place in the world where an intelligent heathen would be converted to Christianity. Were I cast here, ignorant of any religion, and were I to compare the lives and practices of the different sects as the means of making my choice—in short, to judge of each faith by the conduct of its professors—I should at once choose Mahomedanism. When you consider that in the Holy Sepulchre there are nineteen chapels, each belonging to a different sect, calling itself Christian, and that a Turkish police is always stationed there to prevent the bloody quarrels which often ensue between them, you may judge how those who call themselves followers of the Prince of Peace practice the pure faith He sought to establish. Between the Greek and Latin churches, especially, there is a deadly feud, and their contentions are a scandal, not only to the few true Christians here, but to the Moslems themselves. I believe there is a sort of truce at present, owing to the settlement of some of the disputes—as, for instance, the restoration of the silver star, which the Greeks stole from the shrine of the Nativity, at Bethlehem. The Latins, however, not long since demolished vi et armis a chapel which the Greeks commenced building on Mount Zion. But if the employment of material weapons has been abandoned for the time, there is none the less a war of words and of sounds still going on. Go into the Holy Sepulchre, when mass is being celebrated, and you can scarcely endure the din. No sooner does the Greek choir begin its shrill chant, than the Latins fly to the assault. They have an organ, and terribly does that organ strain its bellows and labor its pipes to drown the rival singing. You think the Latins will carry the day, when suddenly the cymbals of the Abyssinians strike in with harsh brazen clang, and for the moment triumph. But there are Copts and Maronites, and Armenians, and I know not how many other sects, who must have their share, and the service that should have been a many-toned harmony, pervaded by one grand spirit of devotion, becomes a discordant orgy befitting the rites of Belial.

A long time ago—I do not know the precise number of years—the Sultan granted a firman, in answer to the application of both Jews and Christians, allowing the members of each sect to put to death any person belonging to the other sect, who should be found inside of their churches or synagogues. The firman has never been recalled, though in every place but Jerusalem it remains a dead letter. Here, although the Jews freely permit Christians to enter their synagogue, a Jew who should enter the Holy Sepulchre would be lucky if he escaped with his life. Not long since, an English gentleman, who was taken by the monks for a Jew, was so severely beaten that he was confined to bed for two months. What worse than scandal, what abomination, that the spot looked upon by so many Christians as the most awfully sacred on earth, should be the scene of such brutish intolerance! I never pass the group of Turkish officers, quietly smoking their long pipes, and sipping their coffee within the vestibule of the Church, without a feeling of humiliation. Worse than the money-changers whom Christ scourged out of the Temple, the guardians of this edifice make use of His crucifixion and resurrection, as a means of gain. You may buy a piece of the stone covering the Holy Sepulchre, duly certified by the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem, for about $7. At Bethlehem, which I visited this morning, the Latin monk who showed us the manger, the pit where 12,000 innocents were buried, and other things, had much less to say of the sacredness or authenticity of the place, than of the injustice of allowing the Greeks a share in its possession.

I made the round of the Holy Sepulchre on Sunday, while the monks were celebrating the festival of the Invention of the Cross, in the chapel of the Empress Helena. As the finding of the cross by the Empress is almost the only authority for the places inclosed within the Holy Sepulchre, I went there inclined to doubt their authenticity, and came away with my doubt vastly increased. The building is a confused labyrinth of chapels, choirs, shrines, staircases and vaults—without any definite plan or any architectural beauty, though very rich in parts, and full of picturesque effects. Golden lamps continually burn before the sacred places, and you rarely visit it without seeing some procession of monks, with crosses, censers, and tapers, threading the shadowy passages from shrine to shrine. It is astonishing how many localities are assembled under one roof. At first you are shown the stone on which Christ rested from the burden of the cross; then, the place where the soldiers cast lots for His garments, both of them adjoining the Sepulchre. After seeing this, you are taken to the Pillar of Flagellation; the stocks; the place of crowning with thorns; the spot where He met His mother; the cave where the Empress Helena found the cross; and lastly, the summit of Mount Calvary. The Sepulchre is a small marble building in the centre of the church. We removed our shoes at the entrance, and were taken by a Greek monk first into a sort of ante-chamber lighted with golden lamps, and having in the centre, inclosed in a case of marble, the stone on which the angel sat. Stooping through a low door we entered the Sepulchre itself. Forty lamps of gold burn unceasingly above the white marble slab, which as the monks say, protects the stone whereon the body of Christ was laid. As we again emerged, our guide led us up a flight of steps to a second story, in which stood a shrine, literally blazing with gold. Kneeling on the marble floor, he removed a golden shield and showed us the hole in the rock of Calvary, where the cross was planted. Close beside it was the fissure produced by the earthquake which followed the crucifixion. But to my eyes, aided by the light of a dim wax taper, it was no violent rupture, such as an earthquake would produce, and the rock did not appear to be the same as that of which Jerusalem is built. As we turned to leave, a monk appeared with a bowl of sacred rose water, which he sprinkled on our hands, bestowing a double portion on a rosary of sandal-wood which I carried. But it was a Mahometan rosary, brought from Mecca, and containing the sacred number of ninety-nine beads.

I have not space here to state all the arguments for and against the localities of the Holy Sepulchre. I came to the conclusion that none of them were authentic, and am glad to have the concurrence of such distinguished authority as Dr. Robinson. So far as this being a matter of regret, I, for one, rejoice that those sacred spots are lost to the world. Christianity does not need them, and they are spared a daily profanation in the name of religion. We know that Christ has walked on the Mount of Olives, and gone down to the Pool of Siloam, and tarried in Bethany; we know that here, within the circuit of our vision, He has suffered agony and death, and that from this little point went out all the light that has made the world greater and happier and better in its later than its earlier days.

THE ORPHAN BOY.

From the National Intelligencer we take the following sketch:

The bustle of the fight was over, the prisoners had been secured, and the decks washed down: the watch piped, and the schooner had once more relapsed into midnight quiet and repose. I sought my hammock and soon fell asleep. But my slumbers were disturbed by wild dreams which like the visions of a fever, agitated and unnerved me; the late strife, the hardships of my early life, a thousand other things mingled together as figures in a phantasmagoria. Suddenly, a hand was laid on my shoulder, and starting up I beheld the surgeon's mate:

"Little Dick, sir, is dying," he said.

At once I sprang from my hammock. He was a pale child, said to be an orphan, and used to gentle nature; and from the first hour I joined the schooner, my heart yearned towards him, for I too had once been friendless and alone in the world. He had often talked to me in confidence of his mother, whose memory he regarded with holy reverence, while to the other boys of the ship he had but little to say; for they were rude and coarse, he delicate and sensitive. Often when they jeered him for his melancholy, he would go apart by himself and weep. He never complained of his lot, though his companions imposed on him continually. Poor lad! his heart was in the grave with his lost parents.

I took a strange interest in him, and had lightened his task as much as possible. During the late fight I had owed my life to him, for he rushed in just as a sabre stroke was levelled at me, and by interposing his feeble cutlass had averted the deadly blow. In the hurry and confusion since, I had forgotten to inquire if he was hurt, though at the time, I inwardly resolved to exert all my little influence to procure him a midshipman's warrant in requital for his service. It was with a pang of reproachful agony, therefore, that I leaped to my feet.

"You don't mean it?" I exclaimed. "He is not dying?"

"I fear, sir," said the messenger, shaking his head sadly, "that he cannot live till morning."

"And I have been lying idle here!" I exclaimed with remorse. "Lead me to him."

"He is delirious, but in the intervals of his lunacy he asks for you, sir," and as the man spoke we stood beside the bed of the dying boy.

The sufferer did not lie in his usual hammock, for it was hung in the very midst of the crew, and the close air around it was too stifling; but he had been carried under the opening hatchway, and laid there in a little space about four feet square. From the sound of the ripples, I judged the schooner was in motion, while the clear calm blue sky, seen through the opening overhead, and dotted with myriads of stars, betokened that the fog had broken away. How calm it smiled down on the wan face of the dying boy. Occasionally a light current of wind—oh! how deliciously cool in that pent up hold—edded down the hatchway, and lifted the dark chestnut locks of the sufferer, as, with his head reposing in the lap of an old veteran, he lay in an unquiet slumber. His shirt collar was unbuttoned, and his childish bosom, as white as that of a girl, was open and exposed. He breathed quick and heavy. The wound of which he was dying had been intensely painful, but within the last half hour had somewhat lulled, though even now his fingers tightly grasped the bed clothes, as if he suffered the greatest agony.

A battle stained and grey-haired seaman stood beside him, holding a dull lantern in his hand, gazing sorrowfully down upon the sufferer. The surgeon knelt with his fingers upon the boy's pulse. As I approached they all looked up. The veteran who held him shook his head, and would have spoken, but the tears gathered too chokingly in his eyes.

The surgeon said—"He is going fast—poor little fellow—do you see this?" as he spoke he lifted up a rich gold locket, which had laid upon the boy's breast. "He has seen better days."

I could not answer, for my heart was full—here was the being to whom, but a few hours before, I had owed my life—a poor, slight, unprotected child—lying before me with death already written upon his brow—and I had never known his danger, and never sought him out after the conflict. How bitterly my heart reproached me that hour. They noticed my agitation, and his old friend—the seaman who held his head—said sadly:

"Poor little Dick—you'll never see the shore you have wished for so long. But there'll be more than one—when your log's out"—he spoke with emotion—"to mourn over you."

Suddenly the little fellow opened his eyes and looked vacantly around.

"Has he come yet?" he asked in a low voice.

"Why won't he come?"

"I am here," said I, taking the little fellow's hand—"Don't you know me, Dick?"

He smiled faintly in my face. He then said:

"You have been kind to me, sir—kinder than most people are to a poor orphan boy. I have no way to show my gratitude—unless you will take the Bible you will find in my trunk. It's a small offering I know, but it's all I have."

I burst into tears; he resumed:

"Doctor, I am dying, ain't I?" said the little fellow, "for my sight grows dim. God bless you, Mr. Danforth."

"Can I do nothing for you, Dick?" I said: "you saved my life—I would coin my blood to buy yours."

"I have nothing to ask—I don't want to live; only, if it's possible, let me be buried by my mother—you will find the name of the place, and all about it in my trunk."

"Anything—everything, my poor lad," I answered chokingly.

The little fellow smiled faintly—it was like an angel's smile, but he did not answer. His eyes were fixed on the stars flickering in that patch of blue sky overhead. His mind wandered.

"It's a long, long ways up there—but there are bright angels among them. Mother used to say I would meet her there. How near they come, and I see sweet faces smiling upon me from among them. Hark! is that music?" and lifting his fingers, he seemed listening for a moment. He fell back, and the old veteran burst into tears. The child was dead. Did he indeed hear angels' voices? God grant it.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A ROSE.

I was nurtured among the green leaves in an old decayed garden, on a sunny hill side, where the free winds of heaven fanned my brow, and the gentler breezes left daily their sweet kisses on my ruby lips. While a tender bud, I modestly sought to hide beneath the rich foliage with which I was surrounded; but when I had learned to love the sunshine—when its warm beams had reached my heart—I threw off the fetters with which I had been bound, and, gazing up into the blue sky, was lost in wonder and admiration. All through the long and sunny day I revelled in the glorious sunbeams; and when the quiet even-tide came on, I bowed my head in reverence and adoration, and my grateful orisons ascended on the zephyr's breath to the great Supreme.

The solemn night succeeded to the holy hush of twilight. I gazed around me: could Eden itself have been fairer? The glad, green earth, quiet and beautiful, was bathed in Luna's silver beams; the tall grass bowed gracefully, as the night wind, with its musical voice, swept by; and the stars, holy, pure, and exceeding fair, glittered and glistened in the azure robe by which heaven seems hidden from view. "Ah!" thought I, "this world is indeed a lovely place!" and I glanced meekly upward; as I bowed again, methought a tear of gratitude lay upon my heart. I turned to my sister flowers, who, more sensitive than myself, had folded their leaves with the sun, and their petals seemed to glow with a liquid light; as I gazed, it assumed the form of a pearl, decking the brow of the sleeping flowers.

"Ah!" said I, "how can ye sleep amid so much beauty?" but, without heeding me, they slept on, while I thanked God for the gentle dews which were falling thus, to refresh and invigorate us. And could I but be grateful for life, and the beauty with which I was surrounded? And what return could I make? None. Yes, I could unfold my blushing leaves, and open my heart to the passer by! I could load the breeze with my fragrance, and refresh the hearts of earth's weary wanderers with my odoriferous breath!

Night passed away with her gentle queen,* and the fair, bright stars which followed in her train. Morning came; a few faint beams of light in the East heralded its approach: soon the Day-god arose from his couch of crimson and gold, and trod majestically the path assigned him by the Eternal.

My sleeping sister flowers awoke, and a blush mantled their dewy leaves as they met his ardent gaze. We drank of night's flowing nectar, and were again fanned by the zephyr's breath; the sweet little birds sang their morning hymn on the branches above me: a gorgeous butterfly sought my slender stem on which to rest his weary wing; and soon a little bee came buzzing about, seeking for honey-dew. Methought I was perfectly happy; but alas! for earth's happiness!

A fair young girl came tripping by: I raised my head, and sought to please with beauty, and refresh with fragrance. She came to my side, and praised my unrivalled loveliness; then I sent her the most precious odour from my incense-breathing heart. But in return she cruelly snapped my slender stem, and bore me away to her pleasant home. She placed me in a costly vase upon the mantel, and often comes to look upon her lovely rose, as she calls me, or to inhale my perfume; but she will not breathe it long: I pine for the fresh air, the glad sunshine, and the song of birds. I am fading, withering, dying: I shall soon cease to gladden her heart; and then, perchance, she will cast me forth as a worthless thing; or perhaps she may press my withered leaves between the pages of some favorite book, and bless my memory with a pleasant, grateful thought. If so, I die content—my mission is ended. I have given my fragrance to the breeze; and it has perchance been breathed by thousands! I have poured out the rich treasures of my heart for her; and while I breathe I will breathe but sweetness, and bless with perfume. But I go. Happy is he who can say with me, I have accomplished the object of my life—I have fulfilled the end of my being.

THE BRIDE'S PIE was formerly, in some parts of Yorkshire, so essential a dish on the dining-table after the celebration of the marriage, that there was no prospect of happiness without it. This was always made round, with a very strong crust, ornamented with various devices. In the middle of it, the grand essential was a fat laying hen, full of eggs. It was also garnished with minced and sweetmeats. It would have been deemed an act of neglect or rudeness if any of the party omitted to partake of it. It was the etiquette for the bridegroom always to wait, on this occasion, on his bride. The term bridegroom took its origin from hence.

AMUSING CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

The late Earl of Pembroke, who had many good qualities, but always persisted inflexibly in his own opinion, which, as well as his conduct, was often very singular—thought of an experiment to prevent the exhortations and importunities of those about him. This was to feign himself deaf; and under pretence of hearing very imperfectly, he would always form his answer by what he desired to have said. Among other servants was one who had lived with him from a child, and served him with fidelity and affection, till at length he became his coachman. This man by degrees got into a habit of drinking, for which his lady often desired that he might be dismissed.

My lord always answered, "Yes, indeed, John is an excellent servant."

"I say," replied the lady, "he is continually getting drunk, and I desire that he might be turned off."

"Ay," said his lordship, "he has lived with me from a child, and as you say a trifle should not part us."

John, however, one evening, as he was driving from Kingston, overturned his lady in Hyde Park; she was not much hurt—but when she came home, she began to rattle to the Earl.

"Here," says she, "is that beast of a John, so drunk that he can hardly stand; he has overturned the coach, and if he is not discharged, may break our necks!"

"Ay," says my lord, "is poor John sick? Alas, I am sorry for him."

"I am complaining," said my lady, "that he is drunk, and overturned me."

"Ay," answered his lordship, "to be sure he has behaved well, and shall have proper advice."

My lady finding it hopeless to remonstrate, went away in a pet; and my lord, ordering John into his presence, addressed him very coolly in these words: "John, you know I have a regard for you, and as long as you behave well, you shall be taken care of in my family; my lady tells me you are taken ill, and indeed I see that you can hardly stand; go to bed, and I will take care that you have proper advice."

John, being thus dismissed, was taken to bed, where, by his lordship's order, a large blister was put upon his head, another between his shoulders, and sixteen ounces of blood taken from his arm. John found himself next morning in a woful plight, and was soon acquainted with the whole process, and the reason upon which it was commenced. He had no remedy, however, but to submit; for he would rather have incurred as many more blisters, than to lose his place. My lord sent very formally twice a day to know how he was, and frequently congratulated my lady upon John's recovery, whom he directed to be fed with only water-gruel, and to have no company but an old nurse. In about a week, John having constantly sent word that he was well, my lord thought fit to understand the messenger, and said, he was extremely glad that the fever had left him, and desired to see him.

"Well, John," says he, "I hope this is about over."

"Ay, my lord," says John, "I humbly ask your lordship's pardon. I promise never to commit the same fault again."

"Ay, ay," says my lord, "you are right: nobody can prevent sickness, and if you should be sick again, John, I shall see to it, though perhaps you should not complain: and I promise you shall always have the same advice, and the same attendance you have now."

"God bless your lordship," says John, "I hope there will be no need."

"So do I, too," says his lordship, "but so long as you do your duty towards me, never fear, I shall do mine towards you."

VISIT TO THE CEDARS OF LEBANON.

It required no great research to convince us of their age, which is strikingly apparent in their gnarled and time-worn trunks. Many of the branches have become sapless, and are fast rotting away; others are broken off by the force of many tempests, or have fallen of their own accord from sheer old age; new ones have sprung out, and the young shoots continue to supply the ravages worked by time; the trunks are of vast circumference, and are composed of divers parts consolidated, some of them perhaps the growth of different ages. All the old trees, and many of the younger ones, have large pieces cut out of their trunks, upon which are carved the names of visitors who have been from time to time attracted to this remote region. Among these we noticed the name of Lamartine, said to have been carved by an Arab, while the great sentimentalist was going into ecstasies, in his comfortable quarters below. The object is to see the Cedars of Lebanon, mentioned in the Scriptures; and there they are, without doubt. They can be seen by anybody who has eyes to see. It is true there are only cedars, but they are very wonderful, as well from their great antiquity as from the Scriptural interest attached to them. During a visit to this region last summer, we carefully counted the cedars, both old and young. We also made some measurements of a very interesting character. The entire grove, according to our estimate, consists of four hundred trees; the average circumference of the original twelve is about twenty-five feet, and one was found to measure upwards of thirty. The trunks of the more ancient cedars do not rise to any great height before they branch out into enormous limbs, commencing ten or fifteen feet from the ground, some perhaps twenty feet. The branches are very crooked and tortuous, partly decayed, as before stated, and gnarled with the frosts and tempests of ages. It is said that no other specimens of the kind are found in any part of the world, except such as have been transplanted from this grove. The wood is white, and has a pleasant perfume; and to this odour reference is made in the Scriptures. It is not stronger, however, than the scent of the ordinary red cedar—perhaps less apparent.

COLONEL SHARPLEY AND THE ALLIGATORS.

BY A TRAVELLING NATURALIST.

There are certain animals in the kingdom of nature peaceable enough, if let alone, but ferocious as tigers in defence of themselves or offspring. Of this sort is the alligator.

In excursions through more southern sections of the United States, I have observed them with much interest. Naturalists, who possess the opportunity, should pay more attention to their habits than has yet been done, for but little reliable information is recorded in books concerning them. The lagoons, bayous, and lakes of Southern Mississippi and Louisiana, are their principal places of resort, and there they may be observed to the best advantage. On a hot summer's day, when the deadly miasmatic steam rises from the surface of one those unhealthy collections, alligators may be seen lying half buried in the ooze or floating dreamily on the surface, apparently careless to all that moves around them. But don't believe they are in earnest. Just let a hunter's dog endeavor to reach his master by a short cut across the lake, and by the time the cur is a hundred feet from shore, every alligator in the drink will be after him. Never did you hear such a splashing and bellowing. Their paddles, noisy as the Talleyrand's, will lash foam from the water, as they strain every muscle to gain the first bite, for of all meats toothsome to an alligator, a dog's is most delicious. Their foul breath ascends in vapor. Their little devilish eyes gleam like a shark's, and poor dog, if he gets half way across before those heavy jaws clamp him, he will be lucky enough. But wo to the reptile who is first in the chase; each of the others, as he comes up, will pitch into him with the heartiest hatred, and ten to one he is immolated on the shrine of covetousness, torn into a thousand pieces by his late friends.

In every lake there are certain veterans, who, by virtue of their years, or the fame of former exploits,—most likely their great strength,—are allowed pre-eminence by the rest. But the row becomes serious indeed, when two of this sort,—bull alligators they are styled,—encounter each other. Then Greek meets Greek, Napoleon contends against Wellington, and dire is the strife, for neither party yields until death closes the scene, and one, or both, expires. I once found one, sixteen feet in length, lying upon a sand bar, quite too much exhausted to move. His under-jaw was broken in several places, his bowels were gushing out, and both eyes were gouged. He was, evidently, the victor, and what success his opponent had met with, might be inferred from his horrid condition. Well might the conqueror declare "one more such victory will undo me," if, indeed, he were not already lying in the agonies of death. Only three of his teeth remained unbroken of all his goodly palisade of ivory, and those, each thick as my thumb, I secured for my cabinet. No, I am wrong, there was a fourth, which I presented to Capt. Maryatt, who failed, however, to keep his promise of recording the above incident in his book of travels.

It is not generally known that the alligator, like the turtle, lays her eggs upon the land. When ready for this interesting charge, she crawls from the water for some distance into the dense cane-brake, and then paws up, with her immense paddles, big clumps of muddy earth, until a pile is formed a few inches high, and some four feet diameter. Upon this she lays her eggs, then heaps dry leaves above them, with sticks and mud, until the mound is nearly as high as a man's head, and the good lady returns to the element, leaving the heat and moisture to do the rest. As soon as the progeny is hatched, they hasten like ducks, to the water, and if they escape being eaten by the turtles, catfish, or their own tender mammas, they attain, in a few years, a good size, and are allowed to participate in the fights, feasts and frolics of the lake. The great part, however, are destroyed in infancy.

An anecdote is told of an English dandy sportsman, who had come yachting to New Orleans, and penetrated to the interior, for a shy at the game. But his very first excursion to the cane-brake eventuated in his being lost, and lying out alone, amidst such clouds of mosquitoes as only Vermilion Bay can produce. They almost tapped his heart's blood. Daylight found him on the brink of a lagoon, with an army of alligators in view. Horrified at the sight of the monsters, he struck precipitately into the thicket again, but only to fall over a large one that was egging it upon her huge nest. The reptile struck him over the back with her flexible tail, and knocked him senseless, and had she followed up the blow, he had doubtless made a morning's meal for her ladyship. As it was, he recovered his senses, but with a bruised shoulder, and some time the next day returned to the house, minus gun, hat and curiosity. The yacht soon cleared homeward bound, and that was the last of John Bull.

Every man who has visited St. Louis, recollects the two specimens in Koch's Museum, that engaged in a fight right before a crowd of spectators, and could not be separated until they fell over the balcony into the street, and were both killed by the shock. The incident was so novel, that the enterprising proprietor turned it to good account, and secured more visitors by exhibiting the deceased champions than even by his famous "Miasourium," the eighth wonder of the world. In several points there is a resemblance of habits between the alligator and the large, thick-shelled turtle. Both love to bask in sunrays so hot as to fry up everything else; both are highly tenacious of life; slowly aroused to anger, but spunky as a demon when their ire is excited; both possess the most powerful instruments in their front paddles that are known in mechanics, as may be seen in their skeletons, clumsy, but mighty in leverage. There is one striking point of difference, however, the turtle being the most timid animal in the lake; starting from his log, and plumping into the water at the slightest alarm, while the alligator will lie and watch you with a calmness that is indicative of an innocent heart.

And now for the best anecdote on this subject. Colonel Sharpley, a land speculator, took his way in the month of September, 1837, to the Louisiana land office, to make certain entries of valuable tracts. The day was hot, the dust smotheringly thick, the air perfectly still. About the middle of the afternoon he arrived at Moore's ferry on Plum Bayou, a sheet of stagnant water, filled from the river in spring freshets, and serving for a breeding pond of fish and reptiles the balance of the year. The ferryman lived a mile the other side, as ferrymen always do; but for the convenience of travellers, he had suspended a cow's horn on a sapling, with the tacit understanding that he would come whenever he heard it. Now, I never could sound a note even on a French bugle, although I have heard Gambati blow two trumpets at a time, and as Colonel Sharpley's lungs were of the weakest, he didn't even attempt the cow's horn, harder, however, than five trumpets. Gambati would find it so. And now there is our traveller, there is the bayou; the ferry-boat occupying one side of the picture, the man and his horse the other. Land speculators are a shifty set, and up to most emergencies, but the Colonel was nonplussed here. He saw too plainly the danger of swimming, for a glance at the mud bank a little ways to the left, brought to view several long, black, lumpy, objects that might be logs, but were probably alligators, ready to be aroused at the slightest splash.

So the speculator sat down under an umbrella-looking beech, pulled out his field notes, and began to make calculations for future profit. But nobody came; night drew on; he became weary of his estimates, and putting up his book, began to wonder what he should do. It was ten miles back to the nearest house, and the probability was, that if the ferryman had no fares from his own side of the water, he would not come down for a day or two. The idea of camping out was a disagreeable one; though, barring mosquitoes and the prospect of a bad cold, he cared nothing for the danger. But little was stirring around him. Occasionally, a long, lank garfish would turn a neat caper out of water, and disappear again, as if satisfied with the exploit. Then a kingfisher or two screamed above some fry they had caught, and flew off in amicable mood, as old friends should. Then a snowy white crane, on stilts long as a Savoyard's, waded within fifty feet of him; now groping under water for a morsel, now pluming its spotless feathers with coquettish care.

But such objects have little charm for land speculators. Colonel Sharpley arose and glanced around for an idea. One puff at the cow's horn showed him the fallacy of the attempt; for the sound he made was about as loud and harsh as the notes of its original wearer. A pile of drift wood hard by suggested the notion of a raft; and thankful for the thought, at it he went with double speed, determined, if he could get across to the ferry-boat, to return with that, and convey his horse over. The substratum was soon laid with large pieces of wood, dry as tinder, which he tied firmly together by grape vines. These were crossed tier above tier by others, all being well tied at the corners; and thus he had a structure built in half an hour, large and buoyant enough for anybody. A stiff piece of bark sufficed for a paddle, and the Colonel boldly launched out, congratulating himself upon his ingenuity. But he had not gone more than half across, before the knobbed back of a bull alligator broke water within a few feet of him, and he saw that he should have company on his way of a dangerous sort. Every time he dipped his paddle on that side, the big upper jaw would open a short way, and rows of glistening pegs, four inches long, dripping in slime, met his trembling gaze.

No wonder then that his track was tortuous and his progress slow. The monster made no attempt to stop him; and now the ferry-boat was but a few yards ahead, and hope was becoming buoyant, when things took another turn.

It will be recollected that every lake of this sort has several of these veteran bulls, whose prowess secures them from all attack except from each other. The large one, that had accompanied Colonel Sharpley, was so deeply scared as to prove him a quarrelsome case, and when, as it happened, another one of the same sort, which was prowling about, approached the raft, the motion was taken as a challenge, and a desperate fight immediately commenced. Each seized the other by the head and commenced lashing with their tails, making some such turmoil as a whale with its flukes.

Instantly, the paddle was dashed from the Colonel's hands, his eyes were filled with spray, his raft upset, and it was all that he could do to recover his footing. All this was bad enough, but read further.

The alligator, as a tribe, is pugnacious, and the sound of a fight calls them together as naturally as it does Kentucky raftsmen. So it was but a few minutes until the little raft was surrounded by a whole shoal of them (alligators, not Kentuckians), young and old, dividing their eager gaze between the strife and its unlucky object. The speculator stood aghast. He had often been the centre of an angry crowd of squatters at a land sale, and borne himself boldly, though antagonistic to all. But this was another affair, and the excited crowd around reminded him of what he had read of battle-fields, where the hungry wolves stand a little way off to wait their time of carnage.

And now the evening breeze came up and began to blow his raft up the bayou, leaving him no other prospect than to spend the night upon the water, surrounded by these creatures, maddened by the smell of blood. How he wished himself by the side of his good horse that stood gazing upon him, in the twilight, as if in mute astonishment at his master's movements. Ah, Colonel! your last quarter section has been entered, and your brethren will never drop the sprig of evergreen into your open grave. All this time the fight continued, and even increased in fury.

The military tactics of the alligator tribe is far more simple than Scott's. It only consists in catching your opponent's jaw in yours, then banging his side with your tail. What thrashing machines those tails would make! While the raft floated along, the scene of fight was continually shifted, so as to keep it conveniently near, it being understood by both parties that the spoils were to be the victor's, and so said spoils himself understood by their anxiety to keep him in plain view. Once he approached near a point of land that jutted out from the bank, so near that had he possessed a stick he could have reached it; but he was powerless, and on he went, the victim of destiny, and still the rivals fought, and still the speculator looked on. The ferry-boat was now out of sight. A turn in the land hid his horse, who gave him a loud neigh by way of good-night. Darkness settled over him, and the horrors of his situation began to work upon his mind. One last thought of home and wife and children, no more to hail his coming; and the speculator sank down upon his tottering raft, folded his arms, and a few minutes more would have ended his fate, for he felt that the power to preserve his balance was fast leaving him. But suddenly a light flashed upon his eyes, he heard a loud, harsh voice exclaiming, "Halloo, boys! a bull fight, as I'm a man;" and invigorated by hope, he sprang to his feet, and hailed the new comers. They were fishermen, by torchlight, and their fortunate arrival saved his life. Another half hour, and he was sitting at the ferryman's table, his horse up to his eyes in corn and fodder, and at least one grateful heart silently praising God for a great deliverance.

THE ROOT OF VIOLETS.

BY MRS. ALICE B. NEAL.

It was a little thing!

Yes, and it is a little thing always that makes the pleasure of a child, or its sorrow either.

Only a Violet!

But it brought tears to my eyes, that plain, simple blossom, with its fresh smell, and deep gold and purple petals. It was not a field flower, but of that variety that grew so easily with trifling care. Some give them the name of Heart's Ease.

I had not held one in my hand for many a day before; and little Martha looked quite astonished that I should ask to have one added to the bouquet she was gathering for me. I can see the child now—standing in that narrow garden, with the strip of sky above, and the close, dilapidated houses of the oldest part of the city, crowding its very borders. It was almost like fairy-land, that little nook, because I came upon it so unexpectedly.

Mrs. Lane had moved. Martha, her eldest daughter, was one of my Sunday scholars, and, furnished with the new address, the teacher commenced her search. It was far enough from Chestnut street, the old quarter in which they lived; and the low houses were filled with people very different from the gay promenades there. Children were swarming on the side-walks, with only an elder sister to attend them. Some were groping in the filthy wayside pools, or building houses of the fallen bricks, and even bones bleached in the kennel. Their squallid, ignorant mothers were scolding and toiling alternately, without health, or hope, or aim, save to live and eat and sleep, from day to day. So she came nearer to the river, and there were little shops filled with old iron, rusty hinges and broken nails, or ropes that had seen many a storm at sea, and, perhaps, a suit of sailors' clothes flapping in the wind.

"Can you tell me where Mrs. Lane lives?"

The man in the pea-jacket takes his pipe from his mouth, and stares a moment as if astonished at the speaker or the question. Then he pulls that rough, straggling lock of hair very oddly, and says—

"Round the corner, next to that old frame. Up them high steps. Guess the old woman ain't to home, though."

But it's not Mrs. Lane, it's little Martha, I have come to see, and she opens the creaking door, and looks so smiling and delighted as she finds "Teacher" there. Mrs. Lane is seldom at home. She goes out to her work early in the morning, and Martha takes care of the house, and Betty, and the baby, and gets her father's dinner. Many little girls, her age, have not yet learned to dress themselves. Nurse dresses them for breakfast, and then they go to school, but often not to study. They work book-marks and slippers, and have music lessons, and go to dancing school. But Martha leads a busy, cheerful life, and can make a bed, or cook a dinner almost as well as her mother.

Martha has been in the garden at work. She says her hands are not fit to offer to her teacher.

"Oh, then you have a garden to the new house!"

Her eyes brighten as she points to the strip of grass-plot, showing through the hall door.

"Will you let me walk in it?" asks her teacher.

So they go out together, and the teacher stoops under the clean clothes Martha has just hung up, and there they are, in the narrow, gravelled path, with clumps of Pinks, and Sweet Williams, a great Peony, Star of Bethlehem, and Love in the Mist, along the borders. Such a nice, prim, little, old fashioned garden! A plumb tree in one corner, peaches just thinking of ripening, are half hidden by the green leaves of its neighbor. Martha is pleased that the teacher thinks it so pleasant, and she begins to gather the bouquet to which I beg some fresh Violets may be added.

Martha does not think them half as pretty as the Sweet Williams, and nothing to be compared to the immense sweet-scented Peony, the pride of her heart, but her teacher is glad she is not obliged to answer, for her voice would not be very steady just at that moment.

A great many years ago, (she thinks of it all, as she stands in the snug, little garden, and watches the child,) she was a lonely, solitary little creature, far away from her own home, and the dear mother that had anticipated every wish. Her adopted mother was kind, very kind, and her new sister was an affectionate, gentle little girl. Still there were hours, and hours, that no one knew, when she was very tired at heart, and grievously thought there was no one to love her or care for her.

There was no garden attached to the high, square brick house, with its wide rooms, and great sounding halls. But one day, the child found a single Violet root growing in the stones of the terrace that surrounded it. How it came there she did not know, or how it kept its hold where there was so little earth. But it lived, and thrived, and she visited it in secret, and called it hers. One bright spring morning a blossom was found, unfolding in all its beauty. Her heart could not retain the new joy. So the little Louise came, and saw, and admired, but she did not offer to touch it with her white, dimpled fingers. By and by, there were three blossoms in one morning. Then one was plucked, and laid on the breakfast table, a mute offering to the kind, adopted mother. And, sometimes, when the Sabbath bells rang, the child slipped away, and brought two Violets, one for Louise, to carry with them to the church.

Cousin Alice could almost feel the sunshine of these bright Sabbath mornings, and hear the church bells chime, as they walked slowly behind the rest, and wondered why their blue bonnets were always worn on Sunday, with the wide cambric pantalettes they admired so much! Then they would look at the purple Violet, or perhaps press its soft, velvet petals to their lips, and look in each other's eyes with a smile.

These Violets could not have been sold for a farthing, all that ever grew there. Cousin Alice has since held bouquets that a bright gold-piece had been given for. Pink Jessamines, and waxen Japónicas, dainty Daphnes with its sweet, sweet breath, and Roses with deep crimson hearts. But they were not, with all their loveliness, like the Violets, in the pleasure they conferred.

It must have been weeks that the Violets bloomed, and the children kept their little secret. It was the last morning visit, the first paid on their return from school. They wondered how many blossoms would be out, as they opened their sleepy little eyes, and visions of purple, gold and green leaves illuminated the dull spelling book.

But one sad and sorrowful day, long to be remembered, the sheltered little nook was empty! It was too great a loss to be realized. At first, they could do nothing but sit down and cry, with their pinafores over their faces. Then inquiry and search commenced. The poor Violet root was found, flung out like a worthless weed, and withering, with all its flowers, in the scorching sun. It was so wanton, that robbery of their pleasures, and so hard to bear when the elder boys only laughed, and said "it was on purpose to tease them!" And spies they had been!

We tried to make it grow again, but it was no use. We watered it, and tied up the withered flowers, to support them. But the next day it was quite dead, and lying shrivelled and dusty upon the ground.

This was the memory that made the Heart's Ease so much more beautiful to Cousin Alice than Martha's gayer flowers. She was afraid they would all be withered before the end of her long walk, and so left them beside the bed of a sick class-mate of Martha's, who lived in a narrow court, where no flowers could grow. But she kept the Violets, and wore them all that evening, for their sweet breath, and the memory of her childhood.

An analysis of the cucumber, by Prof. Salisbury, of Albany, shows that ninety-seven one-hundredths of the fruit are water! This is more than the watermelon, which contains ninety-four parts. The mushmelon contains ninety.

SUMMER ROVING.

The season for summer roving is now nearly over. The wanderers have returned, or about to return. I would invite the more serious and reflecting of these to a few minutes' consideration of some questions relative to this practice. Is it not well worthy of one hour's consideration to endeavor to determine what have been the fruits of this summer's recreation, and what is the influence of this summer roving, and of fashionable summer resorts especially. The tendency to leave the city during the summer months is increasing. Young and old, sick and well, fashionable and those making higher professions, all hasten from the city, as from a prison, at the first breath of summer air. For a long time, pure air and quiet were the only requisites easily obtained at a country farm-house; but now the passion or fashion is for the sea-shore and sea-bathing, every little spot by the ocean's shore, where hotel or boarding-house is to be had, is thronged, and its accommodations, no matter how inconvenient or disagreeable, received with seeming gratitude; while the larger places number their guests by hundreds and thousands, from the brightest, best and most gifted the country can produce. The gratefulness of this change is acknowledged; its necessity, in many cases, admitted willingly; the good influences arising from intimacy with nature, in the green fields or by the ocean's shore, heartily confessed.

To the drooping invalid, the care-worn student, the pining child, the worn-out frame of the watching mother, the too-closely confined teacher, the hard-working and self-sacrificing minister, each breeze comes fraught with renewal of vigor, life and hope. Let the kindly ministrations of nature never be undervalued: its soothing, healing, invigorating powers never be overlooked by those seeking to restore exhausted frames and forces. But when all have been included who need the change, or would be essentially benefited by it, how large a multitude remains of those who only leave their homes for amusement—for dissipation! Yes, for dissipation! for by what more appropriate term can you designate a mode of wasting time, in which evening dancing and chatting and singing and reading of frivolous stories, and morning slumbering, are prominent characteristics? What more appropriate name is there for precious time and talents given up to nights of revel, of heated crowds, of unmeaning prattle, of exciting card-playing, of giddy waltzing?

We presume not to question the necessity, the advantage of recreation; but we more than question, we deny, either necessity or advantage in dissipation. And whenever amusement or pleasure-seeking is the main object, then this practice of summer roving becomes dissipation; becomes pernicious; is clearly wrong. For if health, the best use of time, and spiritual improvement, are lost sight of for one day, be it winter or summer, call it work-time or play-time, that day is one we shall be glad to forget when the end of all days shall arrive. Strange that any soul can forget this!

That thousands do forget it all the year round, wasting their time and polluting their souls, is a standing wonder to every thoughtful, every serious, every religious mind. And a most melancholy thing it is to see the first lessons in time-killing taken by the young at our fashionable watering-places! Many, with the bloom of innocence on their cheeks, willing or eager to learn the meaning of life and its uses, and who till now, with the beautiful instincts of the soul, have used their moments with some degree of wisdom and high purpose, there first imbibe the idea, perhaps, that enjoyment may be sought in the most frivolous of pursuits, in unwholesome late hours, in occupations which not only strengthen no faculty of the mind, no affection of the heart, no muscle or function of the body, but do actually weaken and injure all these. The inexperienced victims of fashion do not at once discover the cheat, and ache under the disappointment. They not only commit the immediate folly, but carry home the fatal error, the false view of recreation, the moral blindness as to abuse of time, which, it may be, will gradually undermine their future usefulness, and their wholesome growth into a fitness for Heaven.

We would have this mused upon seriously by a class rapidly increasing in this country—the giddy mature, the adult children—they who sport with the tremendous responsibility of example laid upon them—a burden which dignified virtue would carry lightly, and which they cannot shake off, sport and be thoughtless as they will.

We would have the young ponder it. If the occupations of the summer have not given them a distaste for idle hours and frivolous amusements, and a longing for something more dignified, profitable and noble, then God be merciful to them, when their spirits must plunge into the mysteries on which now they spend not a thought, when they shall learn whether they have fitted themselves for perpetual, joyous, glorious, advancing virtue and action, or must feed, forever, dumb, motionless and miserable, upon bitter recollections.

If religion and eternity be other than meaningless words, then the frivolity, the worldliness, the artificialness, the thoughtlessness of those gathered in the drawing-rooms of our summer palaces must deeply depress, almost to gloom, the heart that looks beyond time, upon the fruits thereof. The untruthfulness, the crushing of all the brighter, purer impulses at the shrine of fashion, the deadening of all the higher, purer aims of the spirit by the paralyzing power of the world's atmosphere, the stifling of the consciousness of a better purpose in life, till the being ends in being utterly perverted and false—false to itself, false to others, false to God. This is the result. This is an influence of a fashionable summer resort. Who would not weep to watch the heavenly gift of beauty perverted to all unhallowed uses—the bright eye flashing with scorn, pride or triumph, which should only beam with love and pity and sympathy? Whose heart would not grow heavy, to follow the gay, the courted, the caressed, the flattered, to their retirement, and know of the throbbing temples, weeping eyes, aching hearts, and not mourn over the hollowness of the world, and ask sadly and fearfully what will be the testimony of the recording angels? Christians, so called, are among these scenes: do they realize their mission and their duty there? If every Christian was true to his Master there, an untold influence would be exerted, even as the good is greater and more powerful than the evil.

There is another matter of serious inquiry. What is the effect produced upon the dwellers by the sea-shore, and in the quiet country village, by the outpouring, from the city, of the gay, the fashionable, the worldly? What life does the fashionable world reveal to them? A life spent in seeking for pleasure, occupied with amusement! In contrast to their early hours, their daily toil, their simple fare, their simple dress and simple enjoyments, how must all the glare and glitter, tinsel and show of the world's people dazzle and bewilder their victim, and seem like the gorgeous fabric of a dream! How can it help bringing questions of the inequalities of lots, loss of contentment and true enjoyment, and false estimates of life?

It surely would result in good, if thoughts and inquiries such as these should occupy the minds of many between this and another summer, so that evils now prevalent might be avoided, and better results follow from summer roving and summer resorts.

THE DUOMO AT MILAN.

We left Lodi and its gory honor on our south, crossed the Adra, and were soon knocking at the Posta gate of Milan, one of the most beautiful cities of the world. Our drive to the hotel is under a promenade, which constitutes the circumference of the city, and measures twelve miles! Travellers have rarely described Milan as it really is, in all the splendor of its views, and the greatness of its extent. Standing, as it does, between the gorgeous palaces of nature upon the North, and the temples of art and luxury upon the South, and sweeping, as its tributary, the blossom and fragrance of Italia's garden, Milan should not alone be spoken of for its Duomo and its Arena, its Arch and its "Last Supper," by De Vinci; but for its regal magnificence and commanding prospects. Lofty houses, elegant court-yards, and fine paves, are not wanting to make an unbroken perspective of grandeur in the streets. But hold! miracle of wonder! what is that tall spire, sculptured and entablatured, rising from forth the sea of stone, "how silently," in its delicate and labyrinthine magic of art! Is it the phantasm of a dream, or the grotesque illusion of the clouds? The white statues, as you approach, people the slender pinnacles, and stand within the marble niches. This unparalleled Duomo has been likened to a river of marble shot into the air to a height of 500 feet, and then suddenly petrified while falling! Surely it must have arisen like an exhalation "to the sound of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet;" for it seems of the very air—airy in its frozen poetry.

We did not tarry long without. We entered its dark, high nave, branching like monster trees of some other world; and uplifted by octagon circular columns, so high, that they seem toppling to the upraised eye. The finest stained glass windows, perhaps, in the world, beautify the darksome aisles. The evening light slowly plays through every colored form of saint and prophet, flower and tracery.

While we stand spell-bound, the janitor, who spoke bad English, came up and politely offered to show us the top. After dropping a few sous for the church at the portal, we wound up a spiral inclined plane, and within the magic marble mountain. We are soon within the mazes above. Solid as earth, it seems a fairy city of towers. One hundred and fifty-five pinnacles point upward; nearly 7,000 statues glance in the light, while niches stand waiting for 3,000 more! Fifteen thousand different points are lifted from the roofs—for there are more roofs than one, as we find by ascending staircase on staircase. Below us, on the last roof, is the Botanic Garden! What! is Italy so prodigal of its verdure, that the Cathedral's top should bud and blow like the hanging gardens of Old Assyria? It is only the marble which has sought, through genius and taste, manifold forms in the pointed spires. Fifteen thousand buds, flowers and fruits, each different, bloom perennially amid the upper air, and that without irrigation or pruning.

This immense pile has been centuries in completing. Napoleon, whose mind was ever ready to build monuments to art and himself, added an immense addition. Architects have discussed the minutest points of this Duomo in lines of solid quarto. Nearly thirty hundred millions of francs have been expended upon it. An edifice as large as Grace Church, New York, is upon its top as plainly as the Pantheon is upon St. Peter's.

The view from it, is incomparably fine. The eye may float over the scenery of Italy, and revel in its fairest bowers, discern the cities around for forty miles, and to the north see those everlasting Alps, which lock up the gateways of Europe. The beautiful hills of Como and Maggiore, surrounding the magic mirrors in which they are reflected; the Saint Gothard; farther west, the Simplon, through whose defiles we expect to pass; the Monte Rosa, white and radiant, except at sunset, when it illustrates its name in the sweetest of hues; Mount Cenis to the direct west; and further around, the line of the Apennines; and to the southeast, the sweeping vale of the Po, with Cremona and Crema—all can be viewed from this lofty spot! What a resplendent, magnificent, glorious creation is ours! How full of beauty and sublimity! Would that our distant friends could behold these splendid Alpine temples upon the north, from this marble observatory, and the great pleasure grounds which lie around their feet in such luxuriance of vegetable life!

What are those scaffoldings, observable as we descend, erected far up to the topmost rose of the pinnacle? We are informed by the custodian, that ten men are constantly employed upon these scaffolds in cleaning the building, and that it takes them just twelve years to complete the circuit outside.

Can it be that the Great Father of all is pleased with such stately structures, erected for His worship? Does He delight rather in the marbles of Italy, rather than the rude churches of our land? Profitless inquisition; for the temple of His love is the upright heart and pure; and where that bows—whether under swelling dome or homely altar—whether under the light of stained splendours, or under the white radiance of an open sky, His presence appears more glorious than all else beside in heaven, or in earth!—A Buckeye Abroad.

ANCESTRY.

"Virtus est nihil aliud quam ad summum perducta natura."—CICERO.

Tush! prithee, Ben, leave off this prate,—
Look to thyself ere't be too late.
See, boy—while dwelling on the past,
How all thy moments run to waste.
Leave boasting of thy sire—but rather
Be in thyself both son and father.
The present, boy!—the glorious present,
Holds forth the prize to peer and peasant.
Herr, Signor, Sir, or Van or Von,
Initial De, Du, De la, Don—
These are but signets. Then begin
To have thy manhood proved within.
For Nick himself—the sire of evil—
Hath, too, his patronymic—D'Evil.

Two casks—one empty—one unbreached,
Stood snug in vault, with sides approached.
That hinted, rich Burgundian blood,
In ages past, within him flowed;
While this claimed lineage from the vine,
Whose clusters glad the pilgrim Rhine.

When, thus the former—"I opine,
My gentle coz, that thou can'st trace
Descent from good tho' humble race.
For me—tho' fallen—I may claim
An ancient and time-honored name.
And tho' of patrimony rest,
Have still my proud escutcheon left,
Which shows my ancestry for centuries,— Births—marriages—and final entries."
"Thou, truly, had'st enough of fame!"
Thus answered he of plebeian name;
But yet not thou—'twas not on thee,
The past bestowed its eulogy.
The escutcheon which thou bear'st—not thine,
Thou art the wood, and not the vine.
Could'st look within me, worthy peer!—
Thou there would'st find my title clear.

The cask, where gen'rous wine is found,
Gives forth, we know, no hollow sound.
'Tis only when the store is fled,
That this, forsooth, supplies its stead.
Hock present's worth Jove's nectar past,
First of my race am I,—thou last.

THE SECRET OF GOOD WRITING.—We are at first to import knowledge, says Dr. Channing, then to export it. Write daily and elaborately, if only for one hour. Avoid verbiage, do not multiply but select your words, and lop off redundancies as you would scatter chaff. In the hands of a writer who adopts these precepts, a multitude of words is not verbiage, because each gives some new view or adds to the effect of the old. There is a splendor in his strength, and a strength in his splendor, because there is a weight as well as brightness in the metal. Nothing so fixes and consolidates your views on any subject as this practice.

PUMPERS AND SUCKERS.

A correspondent of the New England Farmer relates the following story, with a moral:

Having occasion, several years ago, to visit the West, I put up one night at a small rude town near the base of the Alleghany mountains. My stopping place was a small, dingy-looking, neutral-tinted, two-story drunkard-making establishment, which gloried in the significant appellation of "The Hunter's Home." A few rude men, who, to my eyes, appeared oddly dressed, without the least regard to any principles of taste or of fashion—their garments being partly of skins of animals killed by their own hands, and partly of coarse cloths cut without regard to any other idea than that of comfort, with hats of as many different shapes as there were heads to wear them,—were lolling about the bar-room. Some of them had a powder-horn thrown over their shoulder, and a long-barrelled musket in their hand. And one or two, in addition to these, were embellished with rabbits, squirrels and birds, which they had recently shot. I now understood the appropriateness of the name of the tavern.

As I stepped to the door to escape the odor of the various drinks upon which the returned sportsmen were luxuriating, my attention was attracted upwards by a mysterious creaking, shrill sound, which fell at irregular intervals upon the ear, and which I soon discovered proceeded from a sign suspended from the limb of a large elm in front of the house, which the wind took the liberty of keeping in constant motion. It was significantly decorated on one side with a huge bowl, and on the other with a quart-pot, rejoicing under a high crown of light foam, which, on one side, was flowing over, appearing like a beautiful white plume, gracefully bending from the coronet above.

On the right side of the front door was a long, rudely-constructed bench, which appeared as though it had been used from time immemorial, for no other purpose than to accommodate the idlers of the village, with material on which to test the temper of their knives, and, at the same time, to try their own skill in carving; as it was covered with letters and figures of all shapes and sizes. Whilst occupying one end of this antique, elaborated seat, watching the variegated and constantly changing hues produced by the rays of the setting sun upon that wild mountain scenery, I heard a rumbling which, as it gradually grew louder, seemed like the approach of distant thunder. It was heard in the bar-room, and brought the men to the door.

"I must away," said one—a long, lank, tawney fellow, with a garment somewhere between a coat and a jacket, made of black bear skin. "A storm's brewing, and if I ain't on hand my old woman 'ill have the hy-sterics," emphasizing the first syllable. "She's dreadfully skereed at lightning ever since a flash set my hay a fire, killed the cow, and stiffened little Tom, so that all we had to do was to put him in his coffin and bury him up."

"Not so fast," replied another, the prominent feature of whose dress consisted of a tall, steeple-shaped white felt hat. "Not so fast. I reckon your woman don't hear that, and if she did, it would take something more than thunder, manufactured by wagon-wheels and dirt, to frighten her. That's nothing but the pumpers and suckers."

"Glad of it," said Bear-skin. "For I want to kill something for supper before I go home. But your story about the pumping is too much for me to swallow. There's no truth in it."

"What 'ill you bet? I'll stake my Slay-bear against your Fail-not."

"It taint no use. Slay-bear's a good piece, I know, I brought down an eagle with it, once; but Fail-not kills as much game as I want. Besides, my old 'ooman tells me I had better not bet, and I think a sight of her judgment."

During the unsuccessful attempt to get their muskets staked against each other, the cause of the mysterious sound was developed by the approach, in the distance, of eight or nine large baggage wagons, drawn some by four, and others by six horses.

"We shall soon see now whether a horse knows where water comes from, and how to get it when the trough is dry. To create a necessity, I'll empty the trough."

The speaker stepped to the pump, which stood on the opposite side of the road; emptied the trough, and then re-adjusted it for the reception of water. The pump was one of which the handle always sprung up when used; so that all that was necessary to bring the water was simply to produce the downward motion of the handle—it would rise of its own accord.

Not knowing the particular question at issue, nor the nature of the experiment which was expected, I was the more careful in my observations. In a short time, the long string of wagons reached the tavern. Imagine, if you can, my pleasure and surprise to see one of the horses that was first unharnessed, finding nothing in the trough, deliberately lay his head on the handle of the pump, press it down, and make the water issue from the spout. As he raised his head the handle would spring up, but down again he would press it and force the water into the trough. In this manner the ingenious horse kept pumping until nearly all the others had finished drinking. He then left the handle; went round to the trough, drank as much as he wanted himself, then sedately walked into a long stable which was near, and took his place in one of the stalls, as though he had performed nothing unusual.

"That beats all natur," said the knight of the Bear-skin; "I'm glad I took my 'ooman's advice and didn't bet. Fail-not and I would a parted, sure."

"Does that horse always do so?" I asked, addressing the landlord.

"He always does when there's occasion for it, and that's why he's called Pumper and the others, who only drink, are named Suckers."

When I retired for the night my mind was busily occupied with these expressive appellations. I thought they were not exclusively appropriate to these quadrupeds, but that there were those who might worthily bear them among certain bipeds of my acquaintance. Indeed, it required but a limited exercise of the imagination to divide the whole human family into two classes, one of which should embrace all the pumpers, and the other the suckers of the human race.

THE STUDY OF SCHILLER.

In the study of Schiller, I sat down one morning at his desk, and with ink dipped from an inkstand of Goethe, I took phrenological notes on a cast of Schiller's head. There was a seat and an occupation! But nothing is complete in this loose, fragmentary world. Why was there no mould from the cranium of Schiller's renowned friend? Because men are such laggards behind truth. The momentous, brilliant discovery of the physiology of the brain was promulgated in the beginning of this century, and first in Germany, by its great discoverer, Gall. And, still, though so easily verified, it remains unacknowledged by scientific men on the continent of Europe. In freer England, and freest America, its truth has been forced upon the scientific in a great measure by the enlightened perseverance of the laity. Goethe, whose sympathy with the spirit and processes of Nature was the source of his wisdom, meeting with Gall, who, in a tour through Germany, was expounding his newly-made discovery, received it at once into his mind, with that large hospitality which he always extended to new-comers from the realms of Nature. Pity that he had not cultivated acquaintanceship into intimacy. His name would have been a passport to this fruitful truth, and thus have hastened by half a century its acceptance among his countrymen. In that case, moreover, his friends and executors, knowing the scientific value of a fac-simile of his noble head, we should have had his by the side of Schiller's, to compare together and contrast the two.

The brain of Schiller, from its large size and general conformation, denotes uncommon energy, great force and warmth of character, and irresistible mental momentum. In his organization there was a rich mingling of powers. What he undertook he went at with a zeal that rallied his whole nature to the service, with a volume of impetus that bore him onward with burning velocity, and with a resolution that no obstacle could stay. His undertakings were high, his aspirations noble. Onward, onward, upward, upward! might have been his device. With all this fiery enthusiasm, this impatient activity, he undertook nought rashly. He was at once impetuous and prudent. He was self-confident, but with consciousness of his gifts he united an insatiable thirst for better than he could furnish. His ideal was so exalted it kept him ever learning and expanding. Goethe was often astonished, when they would meet after a not very long separation, to find what progress he had made in the interval. His intellect was under the spur of his poetic expansions fed by his hearty impulses. His mind was kept at red heat. His nature was earnest, and even stern. If there was in him no sportiveness or humor, neither was there any littleness. His love of fame was strong, but he sought to gratify it by lofty labors.

Schiller's intellect was broad and massive, not subtle nor penetrative. Hence, with all his material of sympathy and inborn passion, wherewith he energized and diversified his characters, they lack individuality and compactness. In the most finished there is a certain hollowiness. It is not so much, that they are not distinctly enough dif-ferenced one from the other, as that each is not tightly knit up into itself, as in Shakspeare and Goethe. Schiller was not the closest, most scrupulous thinker, and thence in creating characters he could not thoroughly interpenetrate the animal and sentimental vitality with the intellectual, which interpenetration must be in order that each personage have his definite, rounded, vivacious existence. Nor is the action in his dramatic structures always bound up in the severest logical chain. Schiller was not a Poet of the highest order; he was not prophetic, not a vates. He did not deliver truths, or embody beauty in creations, so much above the standard of his age that they have to wait for a higher culture to be fully valued. His generalizations have not the unfading brilliancy which those truths have that are wrought in the mine of emotion by the intensest action of reason. Between his intellect and his sensibility there was not that perfect accord which makes the offspring of their union at once veracious and ideal, and elastic from the compactness of their constituents. His grasp of intellect was not so strong as was his imaginative swing. When the cast was first put into my hands, what first struck me was the want of prominence in the upper part of the forehead.

Speaking of his early flight from Wurtemberg, Schiller describes the joy he felt in having thenceforward no other master than the Public. To an ardent young Poet it could not be but a joy, akin to that of moral renovation, to escape from the suffocation of tyranny, to find himself rid of a narrow King, and face to face with the broad multitude. But there is a still higher Tribunal,—through which, too, the Public is in the end more surely and permanently won than by direct appeal to itself,—the tribunal of Truth. To this and this alone the true Artist feels himself amenable. For, the Artist's function is, to purify the sensibility of his fellow-men, to instruct them by awakening a poetic admiration, to chasten their taste. By creations in harmony with the absolute true and beautiful, he develops and cultivates the latent æsthetic capability of the mass. His part is to be a teacher, not a flatterer or prosaic purveyor. Great Artists are always above their Public. Did Shakspeare suit himself to the common judgment of his day? So little so, that even the shrewdest of his contemporaries discerned not half the meaning and merit of his wonderful creations. He himself,—sublime isolation,—was the only one of his time who knew their transcendent worth. To think, that for more than a century there was in the whole world but one man who entirely enjoyed the Tempest and Lear, who was capable of fully loving Imogen and Juliet, and that man was Shakspeare. What kind of appeal to the general judgment of Charles the Second's generation was Paradise Lost? Wordsworth scorned the Public, who laughed at him, and having survived a half-century his earlier Poems, had the personal enjoyment of a tardy justice, his genius being acknowledged by a more "enlightened Public" than that which first so coldly greeted him, his later contemporaries paying him reverence as a true Priest in the service of Beauty and Truth. He had to make the taste by which he was appreciated. Goethe, mentioning in a letter to Schiller, the limited sale of one of his best Poems, Hermann and Dorothea, comforts himself by adding ironically,—“we make money by our bad books.” And Schiller himself, who always wrote in pursuit of a refined ideal, says somewhere, that the Artist's mission is to scourge rather than to truckle to the spirit of his age.

It is much for a man to possess several eminent qualities that keep him on a high level. Schiller was upborne by his poetic nature and his love of humanity. He had not the deepest sensibility for truth. Thus, although, under his poetic and generous inspirations, he appreciated and practically fulfilled the Artist's function, his impulse when first freed was towards fame. From the same source,—that is, the absence of arched rotundity in the region of conscientiousness,—I would infer a want of punctuality in engagements, literary and other, and venture to conjecture, that by this failing his friend Goethe was occasionally somewhat put out.

Among the precious relics was the bedstead whereon Schiller slept, and whereon he died, at the early age of forty-six. Often, at night, he put his feet into a tub of cold water, placed under his writing-table, in order thereby to keep himself awake. He worked his brain to the uttermost, and wore himself out with the noblest labor. It were easy to figure him seated at his desk, with “visionary eye,” and furrowed brow, intently elaborating thoughts which his pen hurriedly seized, when a knock, drawing from him an unwilling “Herein,” he would lift his eyes with a look of almost sternness, for the unwelcome interrupter; and then suddenly his countenance would relax and beam, as the tall figure of Goethe advanced through the opening door, and rising with an eager motion, he would greet his friend with cordial words and hand-grasp. And the fever of his mind would subside. The calm power of the self-possessing Goethe would soothe him without lowering his tone; and when, after Goethe's departure, he set himself again to his work, it would be with the refreshed feeling of one who, towards the close of a mid-summer's day, has just bathed in the shady nook of a deep, tranquil stream.—Scenes and Thoughts in Europe, by Calvert.

RATHER AWKWARD FOR A SPIRIT.—An exchange has the following incident, illustrative of the mistakes which will unavoidably happen in the Spirit-land:

A gentleman was, a few weeks ago, interrogating the invisible author of certain raps, as to the disease of which he (the rapper) died. With considerable natural difficulty and delay, the reply was spelled out “consumption.” The questioner looked a little dissatisfied; and a physician in the company, who was zealous in the faith, hastened immediately to explain that there are a variety of forms of disease, either of which may well enough come under the general name consumption. “That's all very well,” said the questioner, “but it hardly applies to this case, for the man he professes to be, was blown up in a steamboat!” The rapper was too indignant to make any further revelations to that medium.

CURIOUS DREAM ABOUT ARISTOCRATS.

We once had in the circle of our acquaintance, five persons of professedly aristocratic taste, who prided themselves upon their birth, their money, and their station. Old portraits lined their walls, of personages so stiff and demure that we feel sure none of them would ever have displaced their ruffs under any penalty but that—of hanging by the neck until they were dead.

We had been listening one evening, for the six hundred and sixty-seventh time, to the hum drum of a young lady (since spinster, now deceased) who made it a point to go over the list of her ancestors, and their exploits, invariably after other topics of conversation were exhausted; and when we state that the extent of her knowledge was limited to the fashions and—her ancestors, the reader may judge how often we bore the infliction during the course of twenty-four hours.

As we were seated in a peculiarly luxurious arm-chair that evening, and the numerous astrals threw a beautiful, yet subdued brilliancy over the aristocratic splendor of the apartment, we first grew reconciled to, and perfectly contented with the tympanium accompaniment; then losing all consciousness, fell asleep, by which exploit we were favored with the following dream:

We appeared to be sitting in another mansion, that of aristocrat No. 1, whose family tree began with a Saxon Earl, and ended with a pompous specimen of humanity, four feet, six, worth a million, and who wasn't a lord because he couldn't be. As we looked attentively at a yellow faded picture, representing a meeting of grandees in some starched old court, the canvas suddenly darkened, and opened, when behold! beyond was dimly shadowed the figure of what looked like a man. He was covered with a hairy cloth, and with his fingers was digging for roots which his children were voraciously eating. They were so unlike human beings that at first we took them for animals, and should still have considered them so, had we not have read underneath, “the ancestors of A— B—, Esq.” Well, well, thought we, A. B. could never survive this sight; nor would he dare to be told that his fortieth grand-sire back lived on acorns, like a pig, and scratched them up like a monkey.

Again the scene changed. Two old men were bandying words together. One of them wrinkled, decrepid, and with filthy garments hanging from his limbs, and old battered hook over his shoulder, stooped over a gutter—it seemed in some narrow English street. Every moment or two he would pick over with the hook, and lift the matted rags swept from the refuse of house and shop.

The other, tattered, barefoot and sooty, a worn out faded red handkerchief folded about his head, a bag over his shoulder, his long fingers clutching a miserable portion of bread, his shrivelled cheeks hanging over a ludicrously high coat-collar that had once evidently fitted some other neck, was a veritable chimney sweep. How did my nerves shrink when a voice said, “these are the grandfathers four generations back of C— D—, Esq., the prince merchant, and E—F——, the great financier. Both of them accumulated enough to set their sons up in the same business in a more stylish way. In consequence the family have steadily acquired wealth and reputation; but tell them not to boast over others, of their ancestors."

Slowly and steadily view No. 2 faded from sight, and a rude sort of butcher stall, or sham-ble, took its place, behind which stood a coarse burly man, cutting meat and talking familiarly with a stout red-faced woman, who wore shoes, but no stockings. It was curious, but the very thing he was saying was, "them aristocrats ain't no better nor you, or I, Betty, vat sells meat and takes in vashing."

"The great, great, great paternal ancestry of G—— H——, the richest man on change, whose great grandfather was made a lord for catching at the runaway horses of Her Majesty," murmured the silvery voice, and before I could think the canvas was again occupied by a man scooping out great ladles of fat from a primitive looking boiler. All around on long shelves were rows of soap-bars, and the material in every process of making was displayed to my astonished vision. At that moment a young lady passed by, attired elaborately, but turning her head in an opposite direction to avoid, so we thought, the glance of the soap-maker.

"I—— J——, Esq., who feels himself above attending to any plebeian business, might learn a lesson from this scene, methinks," whispered the voice at my side; "here is the first germ of aristocracy. The soap-boiler, an honest, high-minded man, personally superintending the business from which he is realizing a vast fortune, stands before you, the ancestor of I—— J——, Esq., and his daughter, ashamed of his calling, refuses to notice him. This child, whom he idolized, married a beggared lord, and that was the foundation of what he calls greatness."

Suddenly we became conscious of a low monotonous noise; the soap-boiler and his haughty daughter melted strangely away, and with a light start we found ourself in the identical I—— J——'s parlor, listening to Miss Almira who was just finishing with, "it is said—and I suppose is true, that my father's great great grandfather was distantly related to the Stewarts of England, and that Queen Mary of France was his forty-fifth cousin. If so, then I am distantly related to Queen Victoria of Europe, and I think if ever I go there, I shall claim cousinship." Boston Olive Branch.

Is it not a matter for surprise, that while young ladies are so sedulously taught all the accomplishments that a husband disregards, they are never taught the great one he would prize? They are taught to be exhibitors abroad; whereas he wants a companion at home.

We all of us have two educations, one of which we receive from others; another, and the most valuable, which we give ourselves. It is this last which fixes our grade in society, and eventually our actual value in this life, and perhaps the color of our fate hereafter.

THE DYING CHILD.

We copy from "Household Words," the touching conclusion of a painful story, entitled "The Three Sisters." The youngest sister, Gabrielle, has been cast off by her two elder sisters, Joanna and Bertha, hard, stern women, because she clung to her mother, who had disgraced them. Years go by, and one of the sisters is removed to another world. The story proceeds:—

It was a burial in a village churchyard, and standing by an open grave there was one mourner only, a woman—Bertha Vaux. Alone, in sadness and silence, with few tears—for she was little used to weep—she stood and looked upon her sister's funeral: stood and saw the coffin lowered, and heard the first handful of earth fall rattling on the coffin lid; then turned away, slowly, to seek her solitary house. The few spectators thought her cold and heartless; perhaps, if they could have raised that black veil, they would have seen such sorrow in her face as might have moved the hearts of most of them.

The sun shone warmly over hill and vale that summer's day, but Bertha Vaux shivered as she stepped within the shadow of her lonely house. It was so cold there: so cold and damp and dark, as if the shadow of that death that had entered it was still lingering around. The stunted evergreens, on which, since they first grew, no sunlight had ever fallen, no single ray of golden light to brighten their dark, sad leaves for years, looked gloomier, darker, sadder, than they had ever looked before; the very house, with its closed shutters—all closed, except one in the room where the dead had lain—seemed mourning for the stern mistress it had lost. A lonely woman now, lonely and sad, was Bertha Vaux.

She sat in the summer evening in her silent, cheerless room. It was so very still, not even a breath of wind to stir the trees; no voice of living thing to break upon her solitude; no sound even of a single footstep on the dusty road; but in the solitude that was around her, countless thoughts seemed springing into life; things long forgotten: feelings long smothered: hopes once bright—bright as the opening of her life had been, that had faded and been buried long ago.

She thought of the time when she and her sister, fifteen years ago, had first come to the lonely house where now she was: of a few years later—two or three—when another younger sister had joined them there; and it seemed to Bertha, looking back, as if the house had sometimes then been filled with sunlight. The dark room in which she sat had once been lightened up—was it with the light from Gabrielle's bright eyes? In these long sad fifteen years, that little time stood out so clearly, so hopefully: it brought the tears to Bertha's eyes, thinking of it in her solitude. And how had it ended? For ten years nearly, now—for ten long years—the name of Gabrielle had never been spoken in that house. The light was gone—extinguished in a moment, suddenly; a darkness deeper than before had ever since fallen on the lonely house.

The thought of the years that had passed since then—of their eventfulness and weary sorrow; and then the thought of the last scene of all—that scene which still was like a living presence to her—her sister's death.

Joanna Vaux had been cold, stern, and unforgetting to the last; meeting death unmoved; repenting of no hard thing that she had done throughout her sad, stern life; entering the valley of the shadow of death fearlessly. But that cold death-bed struck upon the heart of the solitary woman who watched beside it, and wakened thoughts and doubts there, which would not rest. She wept now as she thought of it, sadly and quietly, and some murmured words burst from her lips, which sounded like a prayer—not for herself only.

Then, from her sister's death-bed she went far, far back—to her own childhood—and a scene rose up before her; one that she had closed her eyes on many a time before, thinking vainly that so she could crush it from her heart; but now she did not try to force it back. The dark room where she sat, the gloomy, sunless house, seemed fading from her sight; the long, long years, with their weary train of shame and suffering—all were forgotten. She was in her old lost home again—the home where she was born; she saw a sunny lawn, embowered with trees, each tree familiar to her and remembered well, and she herself, a happy child, was standing there; and by her side—with soft arms twining round her, with tender voice, and gentle, loving eyes, and bright hair-glittering in the sunlight—there was one!

Oh, Bertha! hide thy face and weep. She was so lovely and so loving, so good and true, so patient and so tender, then. Oh! how couldst thou forget it all, and steel thy heart against her, and vow the cruel vow never to forgive her sin? Thy mother—thy own mother, Bertha, think of it.

A shadow fell across the window beside which she sat, and through her blinding tears Bertha looked up, and saw a woman standing there, holding by the hand a little child. Her face was very pale and worn, with sunken eyes and cheeks; her dress was mean and poor. She looked haggard and weary, and weak and ill; but Bertha knew that it was Gabrielle come back. She could not speak, for such a sudden rush of joy came to her softened heart that all words seemed swallowed up in it; such deep thankfulness for the forgiveness that seemed given her, that her first thought was not a welcome, but a prayer.

Gabrielle stood without, looking at her with her sad eyes.

"We are all alone," said she, "and very poor; will you take us in?"

Sobbing with pity and with joy, Bertha rose from her seat and hurried to the door. Trembling, she drew the wanderers in; then falling on her sister's neck, her whole heart melted, and she cried, with gushing tears,

"Gabrielle, dear sister Gabrielle, I, too, am all alone!"

The tale that Gabrielle had to tell was full enough of sadness. They had lived together, she and her mother, for about a year, very peacefully, almost happily; and then the mother died, and Gabrielle soon after married one who had little to give her but his love. And after that, the years passed on with many cares and griefs—for they were very poor, and he not strong—but with a great love ever between them, which softened the pain of all they had to bear. At last, after being long ill, he died, and poor Gabrielle and her child were left to struggle on alone.

"I think I should have died," she said, as, weeping, she told her story to her sister, "if it had not been for my boy; and I could so well have borne to die; but, Bertha, I could not leave him to starve! It pierced my heart with a pang so bitter that I cannot speak of it, to see his little face grow daily paler; his little feeble form become daily feebler and thinner; to watch the sad, unchildlike look fixing itself hourly deeper in his sweet eyes—so mournful, so uncomplaining, so full of misery. The sight killed me day by day; and then at last, in my despair, I said to myself that I would come again to you. I thought, sister—I hoped—that you would take my darling home, and then I could have gone away and died. But God bless you!—God bless you for the greater thing that you have done, my kind sister Bertha! Yes—kiss me, sister dear; it is so sweet. I never thought to feel a sister's kiss again."

Then kneeling down by Gabrielle's side, with a low voice Bertha said:

"I have thought of many things to-day. Before you came, Gabrielle, my heart was very full; for in the still evening, as I sat alone, the memories of many years came back to me as they have not done for very long. I thought of my two sisters; how the one had ever been so good and loving and true-hearted; the other—though she was just, or believed herself to be so—so hard, and stern, and harsh—as, God forgive me, Gabrielle, I too have been. I thought of this, and understood it clearly, as I had never done before; and then my thoughts went back, and rested on my mother—on our old home—on all the things that I had loved so well, long ago, and that for years had been crushed down in my heart and smothered there. Oh, Gabrielle, such things rushed back upon me; such thoughts of her whom we have scorned so many years; such dreams of happy by-gone days; such passionate regrets; such hope, awakening from its long, long sleep—no, sister, let me weep—do not wipe the tears away; let me tell you of my penitence and grief—it does me good; my heart is so full—so full that I must speak now, or it would burst!"

"Then you shall speak to me, and tell me all, dear sister. Ah! we have both suffered—we will weep together. Lie down beside me; see, there is room here for both. Yes: lay your head upon me; rest it upon my shoulder. Give me your hand now—ah! how thin it is—almost as thin as mine. Poor sister Bertha! poor, kind, sister!"

So gently Gabrielle soothed her, forgetting her own grief and weariness in Bertha's more bitter suffering and remorse. It was very beautiful to see how tenderly and patiently she did it, and how her gentle words calmed down the other's passionate sorrow. So different from one another their grief was. Gabrielle's was a slow, weary pain, which, day by day, had gradually withered her, eating its way into her heart; then resting there, fixing itself there forever. Bertha's was like the quick, sudden piercing of a knife—a violent sorrow, that did its work in hours instead of years, convulsing body and soul for a little while, purifying them as with a sharp fire, then passing away and leaving no aching pain behind, but a new cleansed spirit.

In the long summer twilight—the beautiful summer twilight that never sinks into perfect night—these two women lay side by side together; she that was oldest in suffering still comforting the other, until Bertha's tears were dried, and, exhausted with the grief that was so new to her, she lay silent in Gabrielle's arms—both silent, looking into the summer night, and thinking of the days that were forever past. And sleeping at their feet lay Gabrielle's child, not forgotten by her watchful love, though the night had deepened so that she could not see him where he lay.

"We will not stay here, sister," Bertha had said. "This gloomy house will always make us sad. It is so dark and cold here, and Willie, more than any of us, needs the sunlight to strengthen and cheer him, poor boy."

"And I too shall be glad to leave it," Gabrielle answered.

So they went. They did not leave the village; it was a pretty, quiet place, and was full of old recollections to them—more bitter than sweet, perhaps, most of them—but still such as it would have been pain to separate themselves from entirely, as, indeed, it is always sad to part from things and places which years, either of joy or sorrow, have made us used to. So they did not leave it, but chose a little cottage, a mile or so from their former house—a pleasant little cottage in a dell, looking to the south, with honeysuckle and ivy twining together over it, up to the thatched roof. A cheerful little nook it was, not over bright or gay, but shaded with large trees all round it, through whose green branches the sunlight came, softened and mellowed, into the quiet rooms. An old garden, too, there was, closed in all round with elm trees—a peaceful, quiet place, where one would love to wander, or to lie for hours upon the grass, looking through the green leaves upwards to the calm blue sky.

To Gabrielle, wearied with her sorrow, this place was like an oasis in the desert. It was so new a thing to her to find rest anywhere; to find one little spot where she could lay her down, feeling no care for the morrow. Like one exhausted with long watching, she seemed now for a time to fall asleep.

The summer faded into autumn; the autumn into winter. A long, cold winter it was, the snow lying for weeks together on the frozen ground; the bitter, withering, east wind moaning day and night, through the great branches of the bare old elms, swaying them to and fro, and strewing the snowy earth with broken boughs; a cold and bitter winter, withering not only trees and shrubs, but sapping out the life from human hearts.

He was a little delicate boy, that child of Gabrielle's. To look at him, it seemed a wonder how he ever could have lived through all their poverty and daily struggles to get bread; how that little, feeble body had not sunk into its grave long ago. In the bright summer's days a ray of sunlight had seemed to pierce to the little frozen heart, and, warming the chilled blood once more, had sent it flowing through his veins, tinging the pale cheek with rose; but the rose faded as the summer passed away, and the little marble face was pale as ever when the winter snow began to fall; the large dark eyes, which had reflected the sunbeams for a few short months, were heavy and dim again. And then presently there came another change. A spot of crimson—a deep red rose—not pale and delicate like the last, glowed often on each hollow cheek; a brilliant light burned in the feverish, restless eye; a hollow, painful cough shook the little emaciated frame. So thin he was, so feeble, so soon wearied. Day by day the small, thin hand grew thinner and more transparent; the gentle voice and childish laugh lower and feebler; the sweet smile sweeter, and fainter, and sadder.

And Gabrielle saw it all, and, bowing to the earth in bitter mourning, prepared herself for this last great sorrow.

The spring came slowly on—slowly, very slowly. The green leaves opened themselves, struggling in their birth with the cold wind. It was very clear and bright; the sun shone all day long; but for many weeks there had been no rain, and the ground was quite parched up.

"No, Willie, dear," Gabrielle said, "you mustn't go out to-day. It is too cold for you yet, dear boy."

"But, indeed, it isn't cold, mother. Feel here, where the sun is falling, how warm it is; put your hand upon it. Oh, mother, let me go out!" poor Willie said, imploringly. "I am so weary of the hours. I won't try to run about, only let me go and lie in the sunlight!"

"Not to-day, my darling, wait another day; perhaps the warm winds will come. Willie, dear child, it would make you ill, you must not go."

"You say so every day, mother," Willie said, sadly, "and my head is aching so with staying in the house."

And at last, he praying so much for it, one day they took him out. It was a very sunny day, with scarcely a cloud in the bright, blue sky; and Bertha and Gabrielle made a couch for him in a warm, sheltered corner, and laid him on it. Poor child, he was so glad to feel himself in the open air again. It made him so happy, that he laughed and talked as he had not done for months before; lying with his mother's hand in his, supported in her arms, she kneeling so lovingly beside him, listening with a strange, passionate mingling of joy and misery to the feeble but merry little voice that, scarcely ever ceasing, talked to her.

Poor Gabrielle, it seemed to her such a fearful mockery of the happiness that she knew could never be hers any more forever; but, forcing back her grief upon her own sad heart, she laughed and talked gayly with him, showing by no sign how sorrowful she was.

"Mother, mother!" he cried, suddenly clapping his little, wasted hands, "I see a violet—a pure white violet, in the dark leaves there. Oh, fetch it to me! It's the first spring flower. The very first violet of all! Oh, mother, dear, I love them—the little, sweet-smelling flowers!"

"Your eyes are quicker than mine, Willie; I shouldn't have seen it, it is such a little thing. There it is, dear boy. I wish there were more for you."

"Ah, they will soon come now! I am so glad I have seen the first. Mother, do you remember how I used to gather them at home, and bring them to papa when he was ill? He liked them, too—just as I do now."

"I remember it well, dear," Gabrielle answered softly.

"How long ago that time seems now!" Willie said; then, after a moment's pause, he asked a little sadly, "mother, what makes me so different now from what I used to be? I was so strong and well once, and could run about the whole day long; mother, dear, when shall I run about again?"

"You are very weak, dear child, just now. We mustn't talk of running about for a little time to come."

"No, not for a little time; but when do you think, mother?" The little voice trembled suddenly: "I feel sometimes so weak—so weak, as if I never could get strong again."

Hush, Gabrielle! Press back that bitter sob into thy sorrowful heart, lest the dying child hear it!

"Do not fear, my darling, do not fear. You will be quite well, very soon now."

He looked into her tearful eye, as she tried to smile on him, with a strange, unchildlike look, as if he partly guessed the meaning in her words, but did not answer her, nor could she speak again, just then.

"Mother, sing to me," he said, "sing one of the old songs I used to love. I haven't heard you sing for—oh, so long!"

Pressing her hand upon her bosom, to still her heart's unquiet beating, Gabrielle tried to sing one of the old childish songs with which, in days long past, she had been wont to nurse her child asleep. The long silent voice—silent here so many years—awoke again, ringing through the still air with all its former sweetness. Though fainter than it was of old, Bertha heard it, moving through the house, and came to the open window to stand there and listen, smiling to herself to think that Gabrielle could sing again, and half weeping at some other thoughts which the long unheard voice recalled to her.

"Oh, mother, I like that!" Willie murmured softly, as the song died away. "It's like long ago to hear you sing."

They looked into one another's eyes, both filling fast with tears; then Willie, with childish sympathy, though knowing little why she grieved, laid his arm around her neck, trying with his feeble strength to draw her towards him. She bent forward to kiss him; then hid her face upon his neck that he might not see how bitterly she wept, and he, stroking her soft hair with his little hand, murmured the while some gentle words that only made her tears flow faster. So they lay, she growing calmer presently, for a long while.

"Now, darling, you have stayed here long enough," Gabrielle said, at last, "you must let me carry you into the house again."

"Must I go so soon, mother? See how bright the sun is still."

"But see, too, how long and deep the shadows are getting, Willie. No, my dear one, you must come in now."

"Mother, dear, I am so happy to-day—so happy, and so much better than I have been for a long time, and I know it is only because you let me come out here, and lie in the sunlight. You will let me come again—every day, dear mother?"

How could she refuse the pleading voice its last request? How could she look upon the little shrunken figure, upon the little face, with its beseeching, gentle eyes, and deny him what he asked—that she might keep him to herself a few short days longer?

"You shall come, my darling, if it makes you so happy," she said very softly; then she took him in her arms, and bore him to the house, kissing him with a wild passion that she could not hide.

And so, for two or three weeks, in the bright, sunny morning, Willie was always laid on his couch in the sheltered corner near the elm tree; but though he was very happy lying there, and would often talk gayly of the time when he should be well again, he never got strong any more.

Day by day Gabrielle watched him, knowing that the end was coming very near; but, with her strong mother's love, hiding her sorrow from him. She never told him that he was dying; but sometimes they spoke together of death, and often—for he liked to hear her—she would sing sweet hymns to him, that told of the heaven he was so soon going to.

For two or three weeks it went on thus, and then the last day came. He had been suffering very much with the terrible cough, each paroxysm of which shook the wasted frame with a pain that pierced to Gabrielle's heart; and all day he had had no rest. It was a day in May—a soft, warm day. But the couch beneath the trees was empty. He was too weak even to be carried there, but lay restlessly turning on his little bed, through the long hours, showing, by his burning cheek and bright but heavy eye, how ill and full of pain he was. And by his side, as ever, Gabrielle knelt, soothing him with tender words; bathing the little hands, and moistening the lips; bending over him and gazing on him with all her passionate love beaming in her tearful eye. But she was wonderfully calm—watching like a gentle angel over him.

Through the long day, and far into the night, and still no rest or ease. Gabrielle never moved from beside him; she could feel no fatigue: her sorrow seemed to bear her up with a strange strength. At last, he was so weak that he could not raise his head from the pillow.

He lay very still, with his mother's hand in his; the flush gradually passing away from his cheek, until it became quite pale, like marble; the weary eye half closed.

"You are not suffering much, my child?"

"Oh, no, mother, not now! I am so much better."

So much better! How deep the words went down into her heart!

"I am so sleepy," said the little, plaintive voice again. "If I go to sleep, wouldn't you sleep, too? You must be so tired, mother."

"See, my darling, I will lay down here by you; let me raise your head a moment—there—lay it upon me. Can you sleep so?"

"Ah, yes, mother; that is very good."

He was closing his eyes, when a strong impulse that Gabrielle could not resist, made her arouse him for a moment, for she knew that he was dying.

"Willie, before you sleep, have you strength to say your evening prayer?"

"Yes, mother."

Meekly folding the little, thin, white hands, he offered up his simple thanksgiving; then said "Our Father." The little voice, towards the end, was very faint and weak; and, as he finished, his head, which he had feebly tried to bend forward, fell back more heavily on Gabrielle's bosom.

"Good night, mother dear. Go to sleep."

"Good night, my darling. God bless you, Willie, my child!"

And then they never spoke to one another any more. One sweet look upwards to his mother's face, and the gentle eyes closed forever.

As he fell asleep, through the parted curtains the morning light stole faintly in. Another day was breaking; but before the sun arose, Gabrielle's child was dead. Softly in his sleep the spirit had passed away. When Bertha came in, after a few hours' rest that she had snatched, she found the chamber all quiet, and Gabrielle still holding, folded in her arms, the lifeless form that had been so very dear to her.

There was no violent grief in her. His death had been so peaceful and so holy, that at first she did not even shed tears. Quite calmly she knelt down by his side, when they had laid him in his white dress on the bed, and kissed his pale brow and lips, looking almost reproachfully on Bertha as, standing by her side, she sobbed aloud; quite calmly, too, she let them lead her from the room; and, as they bade her, she lay down upon her bed, and closed her eyes as if to sleep. And then in her solitude, in the darkened room, she wept quite silently, stretching out her arms, and crying for her child.

For many years, two gentle, quiet women lived alone, in the little cottage in the dell; moving amongst the dwellers in that country village like two ministering angels; nursing the sick, comforting the sorrowful, helping the needy, soothing many a death-bed with their gentle, holy words; spreading peace around them wheresoever their footsteps went. And, often in the summer evening, one of them, the youngest and most beautiful, would bend her quiet way to the old churchyard; and there, in a green, sunny spot, would calmly sit and work for hours, while the lime-trees waved their leaves above her, and the sunlight, shining through them, danced and sparkled on a little grave.

The man who sets out in life, without any system or rule to be guided by in his intercourse with men in business transactions, cannot expect to acquire what he anticipates, if it is wealth or fame.

THE FIRST-BORN.

The First-born is a fairy child,
A wondrous emanation!
A tameless creature, fond and wild--
A moving exultation!
Beside the hearth, upon the stair,
Its footstep laughs with lightness;
And cradled, all its features fair
Are touched with mystic brightness.

First pledge of their betrothed love--
O, happy they that claim it!
First gift direct from Heaven above--
O, happy they that name it!
It tunes the household with its voice,
And, with quick laughter ringing,
Makes the inanimate rooms rejoice,
A hidden rapture bringing.

Its beauty all the beauteous things
By kindred light resembles;
But, evermore with fluttering wings,
On fairy confines trembles.
So much of those that gave it birth,
Of Father and of Mother:
So much of this world built on earth,
And so much of another!

MY PLAYMATES.

I once had a sister, O fair 'mid the fair,
With a face that looked out from its soft golden hair,
Like a lily some tall stately angel may hold,
Half revealed, half concealed in a mist of pure gold.
I once had a brother, more dear than the day,
With a temper as sweet as the blossoms in May;
With dark hair like a cloud, and a face like a rose,
The red child of the wild when the summer wind blows.

We lived in a cottage that stood in a dell;
Were we born there or brought there I never could tell.

Were we nursed by the angels or clothed by the fays,
Or, who led when we fled down the deep sylvan ways,

'Mid treasures of gold and of silver?

When we rose in the morning we ever said "Hark!"
We shall hear, if we list, the first word of the lark;
And we stood with our faces, calm silent and bright,
While the breeze in the trees held his breath with delight.

O the stream ran with music, the leaves dript with dew,

And we looked up and saw the great God in the blue;

And we praised Him and blessed Him, but said not a word,

For we soar'd, we ador'd, with that magical bird.
Then with hand linked in hand, how we laughed,
how we sung!

How we danced in a ring, when the morning was young!

How we wandered where kingcups were crusted with gold,

Or more white than the light glittered daisies untold,

Those treasures of gold and of silver!

O well I remember the flowers that we found,
With the red and white blossoms that damasked
the ground;

And the long lane of light, that, half yellow, half green,
 Seem'd to fade down the glade where the young fairy queen
 Would sit with her fairies around her and sing.
 While we listen'd, all ear, to that song of the spring.
 O well I remember the lights in the west,
 And the spire, where the fire of the sun seemed to rest,
 When the earth, crimson-shadow'd, laughed out in the air—
 Ah! I'll never believe but the fairies were there;
 Such a feeling of loving and longing was ours,
 And we saw, with glad awe, little hands in the flowers,
 Drop treasures of gold and of silver.

O weep ye and wail! for that sister, alas!
 And that fair gentle brother lie low in the grass;
 Perchance the red robins may strew them with leaves,
 That each morn, for white corn, would come down from the eaves;
 Perchance of their dust the young violets are made,
 That bloom by the church that is hid in the glade
 But one day I shall learn, if I pass where they grow,
 Far more sweet they will greet their old playmate, I know.
 Ah! the cottage is gone, and no longer I see
 The old glade, the old paths, and no lark sings for me;
 But I still must believe that the fairies are there,
 That the light grows more bright, touched by fingers so fair,
 'Mid treasures of gold and of silver.

WEALTH.

The error of life into which man most readily falls, is the pursuit of wealth as the highest good of existence. While riches command respect, win position, and secure comfort, it is expected that they will be regarded by all classes only with a strong and unsatisfied desire. But the undue reverence which is everywhere manifested for wealth, the rank which is conceded it, the homage which is paid it, the perpetual worship which is offered it, all tend to magnify its desirableness, and awaken longings for its possession in the minds of those born without inheritance. In society, as at present observed, the acquisition of money would seem to be the height of human aim—the great object of living, to which all other purposes are made subordinate. Money which exalts the lowly, and sheds honor upon the exalted—money, which makes sin appear goodness, and gives to viciousness the seeming of chastity—money, which silences evil report, and opens wide the mouth of praise—money, which constitutes its possessor an oracle, to whom men listen with deference—money, which makes deformity beautiful, and sanctifies crime—money, which lets the guilty go unpunished, and wins forgiveness for wrong—money, which makes manhood and age respectable, and is commendation, surety, and good name for the young,—how shall it be gained? by what schemes gathered in? by what sacrifice secured? These are the questions which absorb the mind, the practical answerings of which engross the life of men. The schemes are too often those of fraud, and outrage upon the sacred obligations of being; the sacrifice, loss of the highest moral sense, the destruction of the purest susceptibilities of nature, the neglect of internal life and development, the utter and sad perversion of the true purposes of existence. Money is valued beyond its worth—it has gained a power vastly above its deserving. Wealth is courted so obsequiously, is flattered so servilely, is so influential in moulding opinions and judgment, has such a weight in the estimation of character, that men regard its acquisition as the most prudent aim of their endeavors, and its possession as absolute enjoyment and honor, rather than the means of honorable, useful, and happy life. While riches are thus over-estimated, and hold such power in community, men will forego ease and endure toil, sacrifice social pleasures and abandon principle, for the speedy and unlimited acquirement of property. Money will not be regarded as the means of living, but as the object of life. All nobler ends will be neglected in the eager haste to be rich. No higher pursuit will be recognized than the pursuit of gold—no attainment deemed so desirable as the attainment of wealth. While the great man of every circle, is the rich man, in the common mind wealth becomes the synonyme of greatness. No condition is discernible superior to that which money confers; no loftier idea of manhood is entertained than that which embraces the extent of one's possessions.

There is a wealth of heart better than gold, and an interior decoration fairer than outward ornament.—There is a splendour in upright life, beside which gems are lustreless; and a fineness of spirit whose beauty outvies the glitter of diamonds. Man's true riches are hidden in his nature, and in their development and increase will he find his surest happiness.—Portland Eclectic.

A SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

"What is a special Providence?" said a lady to a clergyman, who formed one of a cheerful winter's evening party, seated around a brightly blazing fire, which cast its ruddy light over an antequely wainscotted room in which they were assembled.

"My dear madam," said he, drawing his chair still closer to the hearth, "you have touched upon a subject which perhaps I can better illustrate by anecdote than argument."

"By anecdote?—That will be delightful!" said a chorus of voices.

"The story which I am about to relate," said the clergyman, "although possibly one of the most remarkable of its kind, is yet no less strange than true. About fifteen years ago, I was appointed—I was then a young man—to a curacy in the town of Bradford, in the woollen districts of Yorkshire. Soon after my arrival, the town was electrified by the reports of robberies mysteriously perpetrated at a large mill in the neighborhood; but although of almost daily occurrence, and notwithstanding the most vigilant means were employed, all attempts to discover the guilty party were for a long time of no avail. The article stolen was cloth. The theft was effected by cutting pieces of a yard or so in length from the long rolls in the warehouse. The first intimation which the firm obtained of the robbery, was by the return of a large quantity of goods upon their hands marked 'short lengths.' They felt their honor as men of business involved, and immediately a searching investigation took place. All the 'rolls' in the warehouse were re-measured, and the result proved that nearly one-half of the stock had been tampered with. The 'hands' employed in the warehouse and mill were upwards of a thousand in number, and each was subjected to a long and painful inquiry. Nothing definite, however, was elicited. But although the theft was not brought home to any one, more than fifty persons were discharged on suspicion.

"Notwithstanding these precautions, however, reports of fresh robberies were from time to time circulated, and the thief seemed to bid fair to elude detection; but the daring delinquent was at length discovered. One of the partners in the firm being called by business to Sheffield, saw there, exposed for sale, in the window of a tailor's shop, a waistcoat-piece, of a pattern and quality made only, and that too very recently, by their own house—so recently, indeed, that to be fully prepared for the probable demand, they were still manufacturing, and had not, as yet, sent a single piece into the market. The gentleman immediately communicated with the police authorities; the tailor was waited upon, underwent a long examination, but stated a plain case, saying in few words, that the waistcoat-piece was part of a 'job-lot,' purchased from a man named James Burrows, of Bradford.

"This was sufficient. James Burrows was a confidential warehouse clerk, in the employ of the firm, and positively the last person on whom suspicion would have fallen. He was a professor of religion; a man of some standing among his sect, being a local preacher, Sabbath-school teacher, and class-leader.

"Returning to Bradford that same evening, the gentleman consulted with his partners. He had brought the piece of stolen cloth from Sheffield, and they resolved that, without Burrow's knowledge, every roll of that description should be unwrapped, until, by fitting at the point of severance it was matched with the piece from which it had been cut.

"The whole night was occupied in this manner, but the piece was discovered, and in the morning Burrows was confronted with the proofs of his guilt. Taken quite aback, and finding denial or excuse equally hopeless, he confessed all, acknowledged that, in violation of the trust reposed in him, he had committed all those robberies for which so many of his fellow-workers had been discharged with ruined characters, and pleaded hard for mercy.

"This, however, was out of the question. The firm were justly indignant. Burrows was committed for trial. They prosecuted—pressed the charge—conviction followed, and the judge, after remarking on the flagrant nature of the case, sentenced him to be transported for life.

"Convict discipline was even more severe then than now. Burrows, upon whose destination, doubtless, the summing up of the judge was not without influence, was drafted with a gang of malefactors of the worst possible class, to the extreme penal settlement. Here it was forbidden, under heavy penalties, that he should attempt to hold any communication with living soul, or even to write to his family, for three years. His occupation, and that of the gang, was packing wool, and while pursuing their labors the silent system was strictly enforced.

"Three years passed away. The circumstances of the robbery were fast fading from memory, when one morning, while some laborers were engaged in unpacking a bag of Australian wool at the Bradford mill, where Burrows had formerly worked, a letter, addressed in his handwriting to his wife, was found deep-buried among its contents. The letter was immediately taken to the counting-house. But the strange circumstances under which it was stated to have been found, induced in the minds of the members of the firm suspicions of its authenticity. To unravel the mystery, however, they resolved to open the letter. They did so, and it proved to be a genuine document. It came from Burrows himself. It set forth that he was well—that if he continued to behave himself, he should, in two years from that date be permitted to go to Sydney, where he prayed his wife to try and meet him. It also expressed his contrition for past offences, and his acknowledgment of the justice of his sentence, and his determination to lead a new life for the future."

"What a remarkable circumstance!" exclaimed several voices in concert.

"It was, indeed," continued the clergyman. "The letter was duly handed to Burrows' wife, and taking into consideration the mysterious train of events by which it had been brought in safety to its destination, a subscription was organised, and Burrows' family were sent out, so as to meet him at the time he requested. They duly met, and according to the last reports the man was bidding fair to retrieve his fallen position in society."

"A special Providence, indeed!" remarked the lady who had first started the subject.

"And such an extraordinary illustration," said another of the company.

"It teaches a most important lesson," said the clergyman. "It teaches humility. Reflect that this man, an outcast to society, while packing wool in a remote settlement of the antipodes, promiscuously placed a letter in the heart of one of those packages, which might have been sent to any part of Europe or America, indiscriminately. But, instead of this, after crossing twelve thousand miles of trackless ocean, it not only reaches England, but is forwarded to the very town, consigned to the very firm of whom Burrows was formerly a servant, and thus the letter falls into the hands of his family, for whom it was intended, and answers all the purposes for which it was written. This singular combination of events, I say, appears almost miraculous, yet the result should, while inculcating hope and trust in the Almighty Creator and Dispenser of good, teach the lesson that mercy is neither restricted to rank nor class, and that none of us for our supposed righteousness have a claim upon Heaven for any speciality of favors."

HEROIC WOMEN OF THE OLDEN DAY.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

EDITHA, THE SWAN-NECKED.

England was happy yet and free under her Saxon kings. The unhappy natives of the land, the Britons of old time, long ago driven back into their impregnable fastnesses among the Welsh mountains and the craggy and pathless wilds of Scotland, still rugged and hirsute with the yet uninvaded masses of the great Caledonian forest, had subsided into quiet and disturbed the lowland plains of fair England no longer; and so long as they were left free to enjoy their rude pleasures of the chase and of internal warfare, undisturbed, were content to be debarred from the rich pastures and fertile cornfields which had once owned their sway. The Danes and Norsemen, savage Jarls and Vilings of the North had ceased to prey on the coasts of Northumberland and Yorkshire; the seven kingdoms of the turbulent and tumultuous Heptarchy, ever distracted by domestic strife, had subsided into one realm, ruled under laws, regular and for the most part mild and equable, by a single monarch, occupied by one homogeneous and kindred race, wealthy and prosperous according to the ideas of wealth and prosperity in those days, at peace at home and undisturbed from without; if not, indeed, very highly civilized, at least supplied with all the luxuries and comforts which the age knew or demanded—a happy, free, contented people, with a patriarchal aristocracy, and a king limited in his prerogatives by the rights of his people, and the privileges of the nobles as secured by law.

Such was England, when on the death of Hardicanute, Edward, afterward called the Confessor, ascended the throne by the powerful aid of Earl Godwin, and re-established the old Saxon dynasty on a base which seemed to promise both durability and peace.

Had this Edward been in any sense a man, it is probably that the crown of England would have continued in the Saxon line, that the realm of England would have remained in the hands of an unmixed race, and that the great dominant people—most falsely named by an absurd misnomer Anglo-Saxon, since with the slightest possible coloring of the ancient British blood, they are the offspring purely of an intermingling of Saxon and Norman blood, owing to the former their stubborn pertinacity of will, to the latter their fiery energy, their daring enterprise and quick intellect—would never have sprung into existence to hold the balance of power, if not the absoluteness of sway on each side of the ocean, and in the four quarters of the globe.

But he was not a man, only a monk—a miserable lay monk—a husband of Earl Godwin's lovely daughter, yet a fanatical celibatarian—not fit to be a king—not fit to be a man—not fit even to be a Saxon monk, when monks were men like Becket.

Jealous of his Saxon nobles, he had recourse to Norman favorites, and England was already half a Norman province, and William of Normandy his favorite, until the counter jealousy of his nobles compelled him again to have recourse to Godwin, and his gallant sons, Harold, and Gurth, and Leofwin, who cleared the kingdom of the intrusive Norman courtiers, re-established the Saxon constitution, and nominally as the ministers and deputies of the weak king; but really, as his guardians and governors, ruled England happily, well and lawfully in his stead.

Godwin, meantime, had departed this life, full of years and honors. Edward, the nephew of Edward the Confessor, whom he had invited over from Hungary, and destined to be his successor, had departed also, leaving his son, Edgar Atheling, a minor, heir to his empty expectations and his noble blood. And now what little intellect there was and spirit in the monk-king awoke, and he perceived, with that singular clearness of perception which sometimes seems to visit men, dull before and obtuse of intellect, when they are dying, that his people now would willingly adopt the Norman for a ruler, or submit to the sway of William the Bastard, to whom he had in past days well nigh promised the succession of his kingdom.

Therefore, of late, Harold, the son of Godwin, the flower of the whole Saxon race, and, in fact, heir ruler, as the king's lieutenant and vicergerent, came to be looked upon by the whole Saxon population of the land, as their next Saxon king, in the to be hereafter. The jealousies which had disturbed the mind of Edward had long since passed away; and Harold, whom he once had looked upon almost with the eyes of popular aversion, he now regarded almost as his own son. Yet still the Saxon hostages, Ulfroth, the youngest son of Godwin, and Harold's brother, and the still younger son of Swega—who, in the time of his mad distrust of his own countrymen, his unnatural predilection for the Normans, had been delivered for safe keeping into the hands of William of Normandy—still lingered melancholy exiles, far from the white cliffs of their native land. And now, for the first time since their departure, did the aspect of affairs look propitious for their liberation; and Harold, brother of the one and uncle of the other, full of proud confidence in his own intellect and valor, applied to Edward for permission that he might cross the English channel, and, personally visiting the Norman, bring back the hostages in honor and security to the dear land of their forefathers. The countenance of the Confessor fell at the request, and conscious, probably, in his own heart of that rash promise made in days long past, and long repeated to the ambitious William, he manifested a degree of agitation amounting almost to alarm.

"Harold," he said, after a long pause of deliberation, "Harold, my son, since you have made me this request, and that your noble heart seems set on its accomplishment, it shall not be my part to do constraint or violence to your affectionate and patriotic wishes. Go, then, if such be your resolve, but go without my leave, and contrary to my advice. It is not that I would not have your brother and your kinsman home; but that I do distrust the means of their deliverance; and sure I am, that should you go in person, some terrible disaster shall befall ourselves and this our country. Well do I know Duke William, well do I know his spirit, brave, crafty, daring, deep, ambitious and designing. You, too, he hates, especially, nor will he grant you anything save at a price that shall draw down an overwhelming ruin on you who shall pay it, and on the throne of which you are the glory and the stay. If we would have these hostages delivered at a less ransom than the downfall of our Saxon dynasty, the slavery of merry England, another messenger than thou must seek the wily Norman; be it, however, as thou wilt, my friend, my kinsman, and my son."

Oh! sage advice, and admirable counsel! advice how fatally neglected! counsel how sadly frustrated! Gallant and brave and young, fraught with a noble sense of his own powers, a full reliance on his own honorable purposes, untaught as yet in that hardest lesson of the world's hardest school, distrust of others, suspicion of all men, it is not wonderful that Harold thought lightly of the wisdom of the old in the self-sufficient confidence of youth.

Stranger it is, and sadder, that he thought lightly of the apprehensions, laughed at the doubts, and resisted the tears of one whom he had sworn to love dearer and better and more truly than any other living thing on earth, or in Heaven—whom, as yet, he did love as perfectly as any mortal man may love, who is ambitious—for what is ambition, but the most refined and sublimated of all selfishness? Editha, the swannecked, the fairest, brightest, purest of the Saxon maids of England,—Editha, playmate of his guileless and happy boyhood—betrothed of his promising and buoyant youth—mistress—alas! alas!—though under promise still of honorable wedlock—of his aspiring and ambitious manhood.

For she too had loved not wisely, but too well: she too had fallen not an ignoble nor reluctant victim to man's cupidity, ambition, selfishness and treason—and sad penance did she too, almost lifelong, for that one fatal error, and by most cruel suffering win its absolution.

"Be sure," she said, severely weeping with her fond white arms about his muscular neck, and her luxuriant light brown tresses floating around them both, clasped in that lingering, last embrace, like a veil of orient sunlight; "be sure, Harold, that if you do go on this fatal journey—fatal at once to you, and me and England—we never shall meet more on earth, until we meet ne'er again to sever in the dark grave. Nevertheless, go you will, and go you must; therefore no tears, no prayers of mine shall thwart the purpose which they may not alter, nor shake the spirit which they may not turn from its set will. The weird that is spiced to every man when he is born, he must do it to the end. And my weird is to die for you, as it is yours to die—in vain! in vain!—for England. But it is not our weird ever to be, or here or elsewhere, man and wife. Go your way, therefore, go your way, and God's blessings go with you, and be about you; but you and I have met this time, to meet no more forever!"

They parted; and on the morrow Harold set forth upon his journey, as if it were in pursuit of pleasure, surrounded by a blithe train of gay companions, gallantly mounted, gorgeously attired, with falcon upon fist and greyhound at heel—gaily and merrily he set forth on that serene autumnal morning, for the coast of Sussex. And on the morrow Editha set forth upon her journey, as if it were to the grave, surrounded by her weeping attendants, clad in the darkest weeds, with veiled faces, and crucifixes borne before them—sadly and forebodingly she set forth on that serene autumnal morning, for the sequestered cloisters of the nunnery of Croyland.

Nor had Harold tarried long in the princely court at Avranches, ere all the sad prognostications, alike of the aged monarch and the youthful lady, were made good: for having been induced first to promise in an unguarded hour to aid William in obtaining the possession of the English crown, that wily prince soon inveigled him into swearing to the due performance of that rash and unholy promise, on relics the most sacred that could be collected, which were secretly concealed beneath the altar cloth, and displayed only when the unhallowed oath was plighted. The pledges on both sides were determined. Alice, the Norman's daughter, should be the Saxon's promised bride; Ulfroth, the Saxon's brother, should remain the Norman's hostage until the crown of Edward should bind the brows of William.

So Harold set sail immediately for England, leaving the brother—for whose liberty he came a suitor—ten times more deeply forfeit than he had been before, and to find the woman whom he had so disloyally foresworn, the bride of heaven, sequestered in the nunnery of Croyland.

On his first interview with Edward, he related all that had occurred—even his own involuntary oath! and the old sovereign trembled and grew pale, but manifested nothing of surprise or anger.

"I knew it," he replied, in calm but hollow tones. "I knew it, and I did forewarn you, how that your visit to the Norman should bring misery on you and ruin on your country! As I forewarned you, so has it come to pass. So shall it come to pass hereafter, till all hath been fulfilled. God only grant that I live not to see it."

Nor did he live to see it. But he did live to see Harold, once foresworn to Editha, foresworn again to Alice. For, being sent to suppress a rebellion in the North, raised by Morcar and Edwin, Earls of Northumberland and grandsons of the great Duke Leofric, against his own brother Tostig, he openly took sides with the former, espousing their sister Adelgitha, and pronouncing against Tostig, who fled infuriate to his father-in-law, the Duke of Flanders, soon to raise war against his native land and its kindred usurper.

For worn out with anxiety and sorrow, the feeble monk-king passed away, and was gathered to his fathers, leaving an imbecile heir to his throne of right, in the helpless Edgar Atheling, and two fierce, capable, and mutually detested rivals, in Harold, the Saxon, and the Norman William.

Little time had Harold, who stepped as by right, and of course, into the vacant seat of royalty, to attend now to wife or friend; for scarcely was he seated on the perilous throne, ere the same gale filled the sails of two royal armaments, both hastening to his own shores to dispute his ill-won greatness—one from the cold shores of Norway, bearing the fierce and envious Tostig, backed by Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, with all his wild sea-kings and terrible Berserkers, under the flag of Norseland—the other from the sunny coasts of Normandy and the fair Cotentin, filled with the mailed Norman chivalry, the men who never charged in vain, or couched lance but to conquer, under the banner consecrated by the pope against the perjured and the traitor, led by the mighty bastard.

Still it is said that, false to Editha, false to Alice, he was again false to Adelgitha, and would have recalled his swan-necked beauty from the cold couch of vowed virginity, to the genial marriage bed, from the gray cloister to the gorgeous court, of which she should be the queen. But he met no response, save the most significant of all—silence.

The sinner had repented and become a saint. The weak girl had been ripened through the fire of anguish into the heroic woman.

How Tostig fared with his ally, Harold Hardrada, the gigantic, the bridge of Stamford witnessed; and the raven banner borne down the bloody streams of Derwent to the exulting Ouse, and the Saxon cry of victory! Hurrah for King Harold!

How William fared with his Norman chivalry, the downs of Hastings witnessed, and the heights, known to this day, of Battle, and the consecrated banner high in air, and the Norman cry of victory, "Dex aide les gentils gens de Normandie."

It was the morning after the exterminating fight of Hastings. The banner blessed of the Roman pontiff streamed on the tainted air, from the same hillock whence the Dragon standard of the Saxons had shone unconquered to the sun of yester even! Hard by was pitched the proud pavilion of the conqueror, who, after the tremendous strife and perilous labors of the preceding day, reposed himself in fearless and untroubled confidence upon the field of his renown; secure in the possession of the land which he was destined to transmit to his posterity, for many a hundred years, by the red title of the sword. To the defeated Saxons, morning, however, brought but a renewal of those miseries, which, having yesterday commenced with the first victory of their Norman lords, were never to conclude or even to relax, until the complete amalgamation of the rival races should leave no Normans to torment, no Saxons to endure; all being merged at last into one general name of English, and by their union giving origin to the most powerful, and brave, and intellectual people the world has ever looked upon since the extinction of Rome's freedom. At the time of which we are now speaking, nothing was thought of by the victors save how to rivet most securely on the necks of the unhappy natives, their yoke of iron—nothing by the poor subjugated Saxons, but how to escape for the moment the unrelenting massacre, which was urged, far and wide, by the remorseless conquerors throughout the devastated country.

With the defeat of Harold's host, all national hope of freedom was at once lost to England—though to a man the English population were brave and loyal, and devoted to their country's rights. The want of leaders—all having perished side by side, on that disastrous field—of combination, without which, myriads are but dust in the scale against the force of one united handful, rendered them quite unworthy of any serious fears, and even of consideration to the blood-thirsty barons of the invading army. Over the whole expanse of level country, which might be seen from the slight elevation whereon was pitched the camp of William, on every side might be descried small parties of the Norman horse, driving in with their bloody lances as if they were mere cattle, the unhappy captives, a few of whom they now began to spare, not from the slightest sentiment of mercy, but literally that their arms were weary with the task of slaying, although their hearts were yet insatiate of blood. It must be taken now into consideration by those who listen with dismay, and wonder to the accounts of pitiless barbarity, of ruthless, indiscriminating slaughter on the part of men, whom they have hitherto been taught to look upon as brave, indeed, as lions in the field, but not partaking of the lion's nature after the field was won—not only that the seeds of enmity had long been sown between those rival people, but that the deadly crop of hatred had grown up, watered abundantly by tears and blood of either; and lastly, that the fierce fanaticism of religious persecution was added to the natural rancor of a war waged for the ends of conquest or extermination. The Saxon nation, from the king, downward, to the meanest serf, who fought beneath his banner, or buckled on the arms of liberty, were all involved under the common bar of the pope's interdict!—they were accursed of God, and handed over by His holy church, to the kind mercies of the secular arm! and, therefore, though but yesterday they were a powerful and united nation, to-day, they were but a vile horde of scattered outlaws, whom any man might slay wherever he should find them, whether in arms or otherwise,—amenable for blood neither to any mortal jurisdiction, nor even to the ultimate tribunal to which all must submit hereafter, unless deprived of their appeal, like these poor fugitives, by excommunication from the pale of Christianity. For thirty miles around the Norman camp, pillars of smoke by day, continually streaming upward to the polluted heaven, and the red glare of nightly conflagration, told fatally the doom of many a happy home! Neither the castle nor the cottage might preserve their male inhabitants from the sword's edge, their females from more barbarous persecution! Neither the sacred hearth of hospitality, nor the more sacred altars of God's churches, might protect the miserable fugitives—neither the mail-shirt of the man-at-arms, nor the monk's frock of serge availed against the thrust of such as the land, wherein those horrors were enacted, has never witnessed since, through many a following age.

High noon approached, and in the conqueror's tent a gorgeous feast was spread—the red wine flowed profusely, and song and minstrelsy arose with their heart-soothing tones, to which the feeble groans of dying wretches bore a dread burthen from the plain whereon they still lay struggling in their great agonies, too sorely maimed to live, too strong as yet to die. But, ever and anon, their wail waxed feebler and less frequent; for many a plunderer was on foot, licensed to ply his odious calling in the full light of day; reaping his first, if not his richest booty, from the dead bodies of their slaughtered foemen. Ill fared the wretches who lay there, untended by the hand of love or mercy—"scorched by the death thirst, and writhing in vain"—but worse fared they who showed a sign of life, to the relentless robbers of the dead—for then the dagger, falsely called that of mercy, was the dispenser of immediate immortality. The conqueror sat at his triumphant board, and barons drank his health—"First English monarch, of the pure blood of monarchy." "King by the right of the sword's edge." "Great, glorious, and sublime!"—yet was not his heart softened, nor was his bitter hate toward the unhappy prince, who had so often ridden by his side in war, and feasted at the same board with him in peace, relinquished or abated. Even while the feast was at the highest, while every heart was jocund and sublime, a trembling messenger approached, craving, on bended knee, permission to address the conqueror and king—for so he was already schooled by brief, but hard experience, to style the devastator of his country.

"Speak out, dog Saxon," cried the ferocious prince; "but since thou must speak, see that thy speech be brief, and thou would'st keep thy tongue uncropped thereafter!"

"Great Duke, and mighty," replied the trembling envoy, "I bear you greeting from Elgitha, herewhile the noble wife of Godwin, the queenly mother of our late monarch—now, as she bade me style her, the humblest of your suppliants and slaves. Of your great nobleness and mercy, mighty King, she sues you, that you will grant her the poor leave to search amid the heaps of those our Saxon dead, that her three sons may at least lie in consecrated earth. So may God send you peace and glory here, and everlasting happiness hereafter!"

"Hear to the Saxon slave!" William exclaimed, turning as if in wonder toward his nobles, "hear to the Saxon slave, that dares to speak of consecrated earth, and of interment for the accursed body of that most perjured, excommunicated liar! Hence! tell the mother of the dead dog, whom you have dared to style your King, that for the interdicted and accursed dead, the sands of the sea-shore are but too good a sepulchre!"

"She bade me proffer, humbly, to your acceptance, the weight of Harold's body in pure gold," faintly gasped forth the terrified and cringing messenger; "so you would grant her that permission."

"Proffer us gold!—what gold? or whose? Know, villain, all the gold throughout this conquered realm is ours. Hence, dog and outcast, hence! nor presume e'er again to come, insulting us by proffering, as a boon to our acceptance, that which we own already, by the most indefeasible and ancient right of conquest! Said I not well, knights, vavasours, and nobles?"

"Well, well! and nobly," answered they, one and all. "The land is ours—and all therein is—their dwellings, their demesnes, their wealth, whether of gold or silver, or of cattle—yea! they themselves are ours! themselves, their sons, their daughters and their wives—our portion and inheritance, to be our slaves for ever!"

"Begone! you have our answer," exclaimed the Duke, spurning him with his foot," and hark ye, arbalastmen and archers, if any Saxon more approach us on like errand, see if his coat of skin be proof against the quarrel of the shaft."

And once again the feast went on, and louder rang the revelry, and faster flew the wine-cup round the tumultuous board! All day the banquet lasted, even till the dews of heaven fell on that fatal field, watered sufficiently, already, by the rich gore of many a noble heart. All day the banquet lasted, and far was it prolonged into the watches of the night, when, rising with the wine-cup in his hand, "Nobles and barons," cried the Duke, "friends, comrades, conquerors—bear witness to my vow! Here, on these heights of Hastings, and more especially upon yon mound and hillock, where God gave to us our high victory, and where our last foe fell,—there will I raise an abbey to His eternal praise and glory; richly endowed it shall be from the first fruits of this our land. Battle, it shall be called, to send the memory of this, the great and singular achievement of our race to far posterity—and, by the splendor of our God, wine shall be plentier among the monks of Battle, than water in the noblest and the richest cloister else, search the world over! This do I swear, so may God aid, who hath thus far assisted us for our renown, and will not now deny His help, when it be asked for His own glory!"

The second day dawned on the place of horror, and not a Saxon had presumed, since the intolerant message of the Duke, to come to look upon his dead! But now the ground was needed, whereon to lay the first stone of the abbey William had vowed to God. The ground was needed; and, moreover, the foul steam from the human shambles was pestilential on the winds of heaven—and now, by trumpet sound and proclamation through the land, the Saxons were called forth, on pain of death, to come and seek their dead, lest the health of the conquerors should suffer from the pollution they themselves had wrought. Scarce had the blast sounded, and the glad tidings been announced, once only, ere from their miserable shelters—where they had herded with the wild beasts of the forest, from wood, morass and cavern, happy if there they might escape the Norman spear—forth crept the relics of that persecuted race. Old men and matrons, with hoary heads, and steps that tottered no less from the effect of terror than of age—maiden and youths, and infants, too happy to obtain permission to search amid those festering heaps, dabbling their hands in the corrupt and pestilential gore which filled each nook and hollow of the dinted soil, so they might bear away, and water with their tears, and yield to consecrated ground, the relics of those brave ones once loved so fondly, and now so bitterly lamented. It was toward the afternoon of that same day, when a long train was seen approaching, with crucifix, and cross, and censer, the monks of Waltham abbey, coming to offer homage for themselves, and for their tenantry and vassals, to him whom they acknowledged as their king—expressing their submission to the high will of the Norman pontiff, justified, as they said and proved, by the assertion of God's judgment upon the hill of Hastings.

Highly delighted by this absolute submission, the first he had received from any English tongue, the conqueror received the monks with courtesy and favor, granting them high immunities, and promising them free protection and the unquestioned tenure of their broad demesnes for ever. Nay, after he had answered their address, he detained two of their number, men of intelligence, as, with his wonted quickness of perception, he instantly discovered, from whom to derive information as to the nature of his new-acquired country and newly conquered subjects.

Osgad and Ailric, the deputed messengers from the respected principal of their community, had yet a farther and higher object than to tender their submission to the conqueror. Their orders were, at all and every risk, to gain permission to consign the corpse of their late king and founder to the earth, previously denied to him. But they, for all his courtesy to them, and kindness, churchmen although they were, dared not so much as to mention the forbidden name of their unhappy king—nor was there any hope that any tomb should receive the mangled relics of the last Saxon King of England, although the corpses of his brothers, Leofwin and Gurth, had been found on the hillock whereon the last Saxon blow was stricken, whereon the last Saxon banner floated—found recognized, though sorely mangled, and consigned to the grave with rites of sepulchre so freely granted as might have proved to those craven priests, that the wrath of the conqueror was at end, and that the valiant though fierce Norman was not one to wage war, after the first burst of wrath had blown over, on the gallant dead.

Tidings at length reached Editha, Editha, the swan-necked, who, deserted and dishonored when he she loved had a throne in prospect, had not ceased from her truehearted adoration, but in her joyless home still shared her heart in silence between her memories and her God.

Her envoy won the conqueror's ear, and it is avouched that a tear dimmed his unblenching eye, when he heard her sad tale, received her humble prayer. He swore a great oath as he started from his regal throne, "By the splendor of God's eyes!" he swore, "a true woman! worthy to be the mother of men!" So her request was granted, and to their wonder and delight, Osgad and Ailric heard the mandate that they should seek for, and entomb the poor and fallen clay that so late boasted itself king.

Throughout the whole of the third day succeeding that unparalleled defeat, those old men toiled among the naked corpses, gory and grim, maimed and disfigured, festering in the sun, weltering in the night dews, infecting the wholesome airs of heaven with a reek, as from the charnel-house—toiled, if they might find the object of their veneration. But vain were all their toils—vain all their searchings, even when they called in the aid of his most intimate attendants, ay! of the mother that bore him. Leofwin and Gurth had been recognized with ease, but not one eye, even of those who had most dearly loved him could now distinguish the mutilated features of the king.

But if there was no eye at Hastings, there was a heart at Croyland that could not be deceived, even by the corruption and the worm. Forth from her nunnery in Croyland, whence she had never thought to move again, save to her long last home, Editha, the swan-necked, came. Nine days had elapsed ere she should reach the fatal spot, and the appalling horrors of the search, the awful extent of the pollution, denied the smallest hope of his discovery. Yet she still expressed her full and confident conviction that she could recognize that loved one, so long as but one hair remained upon that head she had once so dearly cherished.

It was night when she arrived on the fatal field, and by the light of torches once more they set out on their awful duty.

"Lead me," she said, "Lead me to the spot where the last blow was stricken, where the last warrior fell."

And they led to the knoll where Leofwin and Gurth had been discovered. It was a hideous pile of pestilential carnage, horses and men, Normans and Saxons, piled on each other, twenty deep, around a shattered pole, which had been once the staff of the Saxon's royal banner.

She sprang down from her palfrey, unassisted, and with an instinct that nothing could deceive went straight to the corpse of Harold. It had been turned already to and fro, many times, by those who sought it. His mother had looked on it, and pronounced it not her son's, but that devoted heart knew it at once, and broke! Whom rank and wealth and honors had divided, defeat, ruin and death made one! and the same grave contained the cold remains of the swan-necked Editha, and the last scion of the Saxon kings of England.

Was not she, then, frail sinner as she was, one not the least heroic of the heroic women of the olden days, and with the truest woman's truest heroism!

THE SECRET.—"I noticed," said Franklin, "a mechanic, among a number of others, at work on a house erected but a little way from my office, who always appeared to be in a merry humor, who had a kind word and a cheerful smile for every one he met. Let the day be ever so cold, or sunless, a happy smile danced like a sunbeam on his cheerful countenance. Meeting him one morning, I asked him to tell me the secret of his constant happy flow of spirits. 'No secret, doctor,' he replied: 'I have got one of the best of wives, and when I go to work she always has a kind word of encouragement for me, and when I go home she meets me with a smile and a kiss, and she is sure to be ready; and she has done many things during the day to please me, that I cannot find in my heart to speak unkind to anybody.' What an influence, then, hath woman over the heart of man, to soften it and make it the fountain of cheerful and pure emotions! Speak gently, then: a happy smile and a kind word of greeting, after the toils of the day are over, cost nothing, and go far toward making a home happy and peaceful."

FAREWELL TO A SISTER.

Go forth to thine appointed rest,
 Beyond the broad sea-foam;
 Go forth, our fairest and our best,
 To thy far island-home!
 With him, thy youthful heart's approved,
 Thy mate for many a year beloved;
 In thy full matron bloom
 Go forth, to act, as fate commands,
 Thy part of life in other lands.

Kind thoughts attend thee, from the place
 Where thou hast been so long
 A daily sight, a household face,
 A mate in work and song;
 A flower to cheer, a lamp to shed
 Soft light beside the sick one's bed:
 To that beloved throng,
 Each act of daily life shall be
 A mute remembrancer of thee.

Full well we know, where'er thy lot,
 Thou canst not be alone;
 For Love, in earth's unkindest spot,
 Will find, or make its own;
 And from the green and living heart
 New friendships still, like buds, will start:
 But yet, wherever thrown,
 No ties can cling around thy mind
 So close as those thou leav'st behind.

And oft, while gazing on the sea
 That girds thy lonely isle,
 Shall faithful memory bring to thee
 The home so loved erewhile;
 Its lightsome rooms, its pleasant bowers,
 The children, that like opening flowers
 Grew up beneath thy smile;
 The hearts that shared from earliest years
 Thy joys and griefs, thy hopes and fears.

The sister's brow, so blithe of yore,
 With early care imprest;
 And she, whose failing eyes no more
 Upon her child may rest;
 And kindred forms, and they who eyed
 Thy beauty with a brother's pride;
 And friends beloved the best,
 The kind, the joyous, the sincere,
 Shall to thine inward sight appear.

And they, whose dying looks on thee
 In grief and love were cast,—
 The leaves from off our household tree
 Swept by the varying blast,— Oft, in the mystery of sleep,
 Shall Love evoke them from the deep
 Of the unfathomed Past,
 And Fancy gather round thy bed.
 The spirits of the gentle Dead.

Farewell! if on this parting day
 Remorseful thoughts invade
 One heart, for blessings cast away,
 And fondness ill repaid;
 He will not breathe them—let them rest
 Within the stillness of the breast;
 Be thy remembrance made
 A home, where chastening thoughts may dwell;
 My own true sister, fare thee well!

If "Do as you would be done by" were made the "Common Law," much less parchment would be used.

THE GREAT BATTLE BETWEEN RIGHT AND WRONG, GOOD AND EVIL.

We are living in the midst of the agitation of great moral questions. Our lot is cast at a time when men's minds are more and more awake and alive to the true bearing and the right decision of these questions. They are questions which pertain to the deepest interests of mankind, to humanity and religion. It is easy to see, from a thousand signs, what a strong hold these subjects are taking of the mind and conscience of the age. Whoever watches the course of events; whoever looks with an observing eye on what is happening about him; whoever reads newspapers or hears common conversation, must know that there are topics now arresting the attention and exercising the thoughts of masses of men, which are destined to work mighty changes in society, in government, and in the church—topics that pertain, not to the outward and temporary condition merely, but to the solid, substantial, and permanent well-being of the human race. He must see that amidst much superficial effort and short-lived pleasure, much eager scheming and toiling for wealth, ambition and display, there is also a far deeper current flowing through the affairs of men—a far stronger tide setting straight toward a higher virtue, liberty and happiness. He will see that there is much sober reflection going on—much earnest feeling kindled and burning—much determined resolve forming in the heart, and prompting hands to work, in behalf of justice, truth, purity and love. He will see that "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," are beginning to be enthroned in that high place that belongs to them in men's minds, the place they held in the Apostles' reasoning and the Saviour's instructions. And whoever does not see this, must have his eyes lamentably blindfolded, either by selfishness or stupidity.

So, for example, while many, too many we admit, are found seeking only how money may be made, at all hazards, and striving by all means to make it, holding that to be the great end of life, and sacrificing all spiritual objects to that; there are others—an increasing number—who are pressing the profounder investigation, how business may be transacted on right principles; how commerce and trade may be reformed and made consistent with fairness and equity; how counting-rooms, shops and brokers' offices, may be cleansed of all deception, overreaching and ungenerous competition; how the acquisition of a livelihood may be conducted without lying and fraud, without oppressing the weak, or taking advantage of the poor, or cheating the ignorant. Those who study and labor for the renovation of the world's traffic, are on the side of right, of good, of the Lord: on whose side are the others, but that of wrong, of evil, of "the world, the flesh, and the devil?"

Again, while many—miserable victims of their sensual appetites—are ever plotting some new indulgence: stimulating their morbid passions, looking forward to the revel, the debauch, or the secret draught, and so enslaving themselves to their own infamy—others, a company of noble-hearted apostles, are devoting themselves with the benevolence of true philanthropists, with the patient faith of martyrs, to redeeming these men from their vile bondage, to restoring them to their better reason, and lifting them up from intemperance, from lust, from the most degraded places of humanity, to self-control, chastity, peace, self-respect and virtue, till the glorious image of God is brought out again with all its native brightness and celestial beauty, in their human souls. These are on the side of Right and Good, and they will eventually triumph. Those who are on the other side, are battling for wrong and sin, trouble and confusion, darkness and decay, destruction and death.

It would be easy to name other points, about which the same vast struggle is going on—the struggle between wrong and right—between evil and good—between iniquity and righteousness—between the darkness of this world and the light of the world as it should be. It is around these high moral questions—questions relating to humanity and spiritual progress—that the great conflicting powers of the age range themselves and do battle.

Now it is the duty of every one to choose his side—to choose it thoughtfully, decisively and conscientiously—to choose it and maintain it like a man, like a Christian. They are questions which admit of no neutrality; no one of us can innocently try to be neutral upon them; whoever undertakes to be neutral must be false; for if your influence goes not clearly and unequivocally for the right, it will be sure to go, in despite of yourself, for the wrong.

Here is the whole frightful matter of intemperance. You see how it is agitating almost every State to its very depths—the whole social fabric, from the topmost pinnacle to the foundation—from institutions of learning to the vulgar frequenters of the foulest dram-shop—you find the topic of earnest conversation and excited discussion. Can any right-minded man or woman, any well-wisher to the best interests of humanity, be indifferent or stand aloof from this great struggle, with impunity? No; every one should choose his course of action, be decided, have his principles and influence established. There is a question of right or wrong—good or evil—to be decided.

Men do not shut their eyes, as before, on the shocking inequalities of the social condition, and on the different degrees of hardship and labor imposed on different classes. It begins to be understood that many of the rich are suffering from too little work, and many of the poor from too much work; and that the bodily, the mental and the spiritual health is impaired on the one hand by idleness and luxury, and on the other by overtasked exertion and privation. It is found that business might be done, and flourish just as well, if tradesmen would allow their clerks a larger share of the evening hours for intellectual improvement and the out-of-door exercise of the body; and indignation has justly begun to stir itself, at finding that some extensive dealers and merchants wring their profits out of the hands of poor sempstresses, whose days and nights of most exhausting toil yield them but a pittance after all. In these matters there is a right and a wrong, and it becomes every one to do battle, in some way, for justice, charity, generosity and humanity.

Again, there is no question about the utter folly and wickedness of war. There is no end to the miseries and the crimes it inflicts on society. Humanity and morality call upon every one to lend a helping hand to put an end to it, once and for ever.

Again, we are in hazard of incurring that fatal mistake—the divorce of Christian morals from the policy of the State. We are on the verge of a wanton defiance of the Ruler among the nations. Let our good men—men of honor and integrity—men of high aims and pure love of country—rouse themselves. Let the nation come back to reverence for God and His will. Let the arm of justice be strengthened. Let mere expediency be vanquished by the right.

The struggle grows deeper, intenser every hour. Which side are we upon—that of Mammon, selfishness, sensuality? or that of purity and spirituality, truth and justice, peace and concord, benevolence and charity? On that side we are safe, and will come off conquerors; on the other, Hell and destruction are ever open.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

AIR IS VISIBLE.—The blue color of the atmosphere on a fine day is well known. In proportion as we rise above the earth, the air becomes less dense, and the beautiful blue tint of the heavens disappears. Hence, travellers who have ascended to great heights, on the tops of mountains, tell us that the sky appears from those lofty elevations, of a greyish or blackish hue. This proves that the blue color does not belong to those portions of space in which the stars and other celestial bodies are placed, but solely and exclusively to the mass of air through which those bodies are seen. The same atmosphere, seen between us and the distant hills, causes the latter to appear blue.

It may, however, be objected, that if air be possessed of this peculiar kind of color, how is it that the air which immediately surrounds us is colorless? This objection is easily answered. There are certain colored bodies which reflect colored light so faintly, that it leaves no impression of color upon our senses. A glass of sea water, for example, if held up to the light, is perfectly limpid and colorless, but when we look at the ocean itself, the water appears green, it being there sufficient in quantity to render its color visible. In like manner, the air which fills an apartment, or which immediately surrounds us, when abroad, is not sufficient in quantity to be perceived; but when we view the immense mass of air in the firmament, when we fathom with our eye the depths of the aerial ocean above us, the blue color of the atmosphere is then distinctly visible. In proportion as the atmosphere is clear and free from vapors, this blue color becomes more intense, whilst it fades into a greyish or whitish hue, as the atmosphere becomes charged with them.

AIR POSSESSES INERTIA.—Inertia is that resistance offered by matter to any change in its condition as to rest or motion. A body at rest, would continue forever at rest; in motion, forever in motion, if altogether uninfluenced by external causes. That a body at rest, a stone or a chair, for instance, cannot put itself into motion, independently of an external cause, is evident, forasmuch as it is borne out by fact and observation. We see that stones, chairs, tables, and other pieces of matter retain their places, and never move from them, unless some external force be applied; nor does any one imagine that they ever will. But, that matter in motion has a tendency to continue forever in motion, is not so evident; people think that it has a natural tendency to come to a state of rest, because they see that a stone or ball, if put into ever so violent motion, soon comes to a stand-still. But, if a little thought be given to the subject, it will be evident that all cessation of motion is to be attributed to the influence of some external cause; and that motion continues in proportion as those external influences cease. A ball, for example, if rolled on the ground, soon stops, owing to the friction of the uneven surface over which it moves; if it be rolled on ice, it continues longer in motion, and rolls much further, the smooth surface of the ice offering less resistance; but then, there is the resistance of the air, and the attraction of the earth; if these could be removed the body would roll forever. Now, that air, in common with solid and fluid matter, possesses this property of inertia, a number of familiar facts abundantly prove.

The resistance which air, in a state of rest, offers to a moving body, is a striking proof of its inertia. When the atmosphere is calm and free from winds, the particles of air maintain their position, and are in a state of rest. If a solid body, presenting a surface, be moved through the air whilst in this condition, a sensible resistance is encountered, arising from the particles of air attempting to maintain their position. The resistance of air, occasioned by its inertia, is felt in running, or when the hand is waved through it, backwards and forwards. The flame of a candle moved rapidly detects it.

Birds are enabled to fly by means of this resistance. In opening their wings, they cut the air by presenting their edge; but in closing they strike the air with their flat surface, like the motion of an oar in water. Birds do not fly above half a mile in height, and seldom more than one hundred yards. At considerable elevations, the atmosphere is too rarified to support them. Hence, those birds which rise to a great height in the atmosphere have large wings; as, for instance, the eagle, by means of which they are enabled to support themselves in the comparatively thin medium in which they move. Were it possible for a bird to live without respiration, in a place void of air, it would no longer possess the power of flight. Birds let go from balloons, at vast elevations in the atmosphere, fall rapidly into the denser strata of air below their surface, where they again recover their power of flight, the air not being sufficiently dense in those elevated regions to offer the necessary leverage or resistance for their wings.

On the deck of a steamer, a breeze is felt blowing from stem to stern, even in the calmest day, when not a zephyr lifts a leaf on shore, which is occasioned by the vessel displacing the air as it passes through it, exactly in the same manner as it displaces the water, and causing, as a consequence, a current of air to flow over the deck. A similar breeze, arising from atmospheric resistance, is felt on the outside of a steam-carriage, and, though formerly accounted a slight obstacle, is now found to be one of the most formidable hindrances to the velocity of the train; for as the resistance of the air increases directly as the ratio of the velocity of the train increases, its power becomes immense.

A cannon ball will travel twenty or thirty miles in vacuo, or in a space without air; but the resistance of the air limits its range to two or three miles.

THE RESISTANCE WHICH AIR IN A STATE OF MOTION OFFERS TO A BODY AT REST, IS ANOTHER MANIFESTATION OF ITS INERTIA.—We have seen that a body at rest would continue forever at rest; in motion, forever in motion, if altogether uninfluenced by external causes. This tendency of bodies to continue in the same state of motion or rest, is termed their inertia. Every example of the power of the wind (for wind is nothing but air in motion) is an example of the inertia of the atmosphere, and the strength of the wind like that of every other moving body, depends entirely upon the quantity of air in motion, and the velocity with which it moves.

When the wind blows one mile an hour, it is hardly perceptible: four, a gentle gale; 20 to 25, very brisk; 30 to 35, a very high wind; 50 to 60, a storm; 80 to 100, a hurricane uprooting the forests and sweeping the earth. The instrument used for measuring the force and velocity of the wind is termed an Anemometer. When the wind is gentle on the surface of the earth, it may be moving at the rate of from 60 to 80 miles an hour, in the higher regions of the atmosphere. This has been determined by the distance travelled by aeronauts, and by observing the shadows of clouds moving along the ground. The aeronaut travelling at the most enormous rate never feels the wind as he moves with it.

AIR IS POSSESSED OF GRAVITY OR WEIGHT.—The weight, or downward pressure of the air, is occasioned by the attraction of the earth, producing what is called atmospheric pressure. This pressure is exerted equally in all directions, the upward pressure of the air being equal to its downward pressure. By the following simple experiments, our readers may convince themselves of the upward pressure of the air.

Experiment 1. Fill a wine-glass with water place a slip of paper on the brim, so as to cover it entirely, and placing the palm of the hand on the paper, invert the glass; on removing the hand, the upward pressure of the atmosphere will cause the paper to adhere to the glass.

Exp't. 2. Close one end of a glass tube, two feet in length and one-sixth of an inch bore, with a cork, fill it with water, and placing one finger on the open end, invert it; on removing the finger, the upward pressure of the atmosphere will keep the water in the tube.

The peculiar gurgling sound which is produced in decanting bottles, is occasioned by the upward pressure of the atmosphere, which forces the air through the water into the bottles, to fill up the vacuum created by the escape of the water. So long as the neck of the bottle is choked up with fluid, the water, in coming out, is intercepted by the entrance of the air, and flows with a gurgling and interrupted sound; but if the bottle be so inverted, that the liquid, in flowing out, only partially fills the neck, the flow of the water will be continuous and uninterrupted and no sound takes place.

It is in like manner owing to the upward pressure of the air that it supports clouds and other vapors which are seen floating in it. This phenomena proves the upward pressure of the air, in the same manner as a piece of floating wood or cork indicates the upward pressure of the water which supports it. On the same property depends the slow fall of light bodies, as paper, feathers, and snow, through the atmosphere, the upward pressure of the air impeding their descent. The upward pressure of the atmosphere in fact controls and modifies the effect of all falling bodies. Were it possible for the clouds to be supported, and the atmosphere to be removed, drops of rain falling from them would descend with the velocity and weight of shot to the earth's surface. This curious fact is finely exemplified by the philosophical instrument called the water-hammer.

The water-hammer is a glass tube, hermetically sealed, containing at one end a vacuum or space, without air, and at the other water. Upon inverting the tube, the water falls through the vacuum to the other end of it, as if it were lead, producing a short clicking sound. This noise is occasioned through the want of air to break the velocity of its fall. The downward pressure of the air may be detected in the following manner:

Exp't. 3. Procure a tin vessel shaped like a common phial, with the bottom full of very small holes; plunge it in water, with its mouth open, and when full, cork it so as entirely to exclude the access of the external air, then remove the vessel from the water. So long as it is kept corked, the upward pressure of the atmosphere will keep in the water; but when the cork is withdrawn, the downward pressure will cause it to stream through the holes at the bottom of the vessel.

Exp't. 4. Boil a small quantity of water in a retort, place a cork in the beak, and condense the steam by plunging the retort in cold water; now put the retort in an upright position, its beak being still below the surface of the water; remove the cork, and the downward pressure of the air on the surface of the water in the vessel, will force it with considerable violence into the retort, which will become immediately nearly filled with water.

This experiment is a very striking manifestation of atmospheric pressure.

It may, however, be objected, that we are not sensible of any weight in the air, which is, in fact, proverbial for its lightness; but science teaches us to rectify the deceptions of the senses. There is no difficulty in disposing of the objection, and this, too, in a very satisfactory manner. The answer is, that the effects of the pressure of the air around us are counteracted by the air that is within us; so that things are in a state of equilibrium. The surface of the body is covered with innumerable pores through which the insensible perspiration passes, which pores communicate with the atmosphere. Free and speedy access is thus given to the air to every part of the body; and hence the body is no more damaged by this pressure than a wet sponge is deranged by being plunged in water.

If, however, by any contrivance, we can cut off the communication between any part of the body and the surrounding atmosphere, then the elastic force of the air in the body will cause it to swell out into the vacuum, as in the operation of cupping, and we shall become powerfully, and even painfully, sensible of the pressure of the atmosphere.

Exp't. 5. Rarefy the air in a wine-glass, by means of a piece of lighted paper conveyed into its inside, and instantly apply it to the palm of the hand, so as to exclude the surrounding atmosphere. The air in the wine-glass will cool and contract in volume, and the pressure of the external air will fasten the glass to the hand, the air in the hand at the same time expanding and causing the soft part of the palm to swell out into the vacuum.

The necessity of some inward æriform fluid, to sustain the outward pressure of the air, is well seen in the collapsing of cylinders and boilers, when, by some accident, the steam in them becomes condensed and a vacuum is formed. A simple experiment will illustrate this.

Exp't. 6. Boil a little water in a tin vessel provided with a stop-cock; when steam issues from the vessel, turn the stop-cock, so as to confine the steam, and pour a quantity of cold water on the sides of the vessel; a vacuum will be formed in the vessel, and its sides will be immediately crushed in by the powerful pressure of the external air. C.

RICH MEN are indispensable for the culture of the fine arts; and it is scarcely possible to find a work of great magnitude and beauty combined that did not originate with them. Sometimes a Prince, for the sake of his soul, and sometimes an old usurer, for a similar reason, devoted the spoils of an ill-spent life for a great public benefit; but in either case it was the rich man who did what the public at large would never have thought of. The Cathedral of Notre Dame, in Paris, was mainly assisted in its construction by the immense fortune of Thibout, an old miser, whose conscience pricked him in the evening of life for the sins of the morning and meridian thereof; and, in making confession to the Archbishop of Paris, he was solemnly advised to make atonement to Heaven by the dedication of his fortune to the services of the Church. He yielded to the reasoning of the pious prelate, and thus arose that venerable building in which the Kings, and Emperors, and Prince Presidents of France, receive their consecration. Would even the French people ever have constructed such a building by subscription, or appropriation of the public revenue? Never.

Education is the proper employment, not only of our early years, but of our whole lives.

LOVE.

Oh! if there is one law above the rest,
Written in Wisdom—if there is a word
That I would trace as with a pen of fire
Upon the unsullied temper of a child—
If there is anything that keeps the mind
Open to angel visits, and repels
The ministry of ill—'tis Human Love!
God has made nothing worthy of contempt.
The smallest pebble in the well of truth
Has its peculiar meanings, and will stand
When man's best monuments wear fast away.
The law of Heaven is Love—and though its name
Has been usurped by passion, and profaned
To its unholy uses through all time,
Still, the external principle is pure;
And in these deep affections that we feel Omnipotent within us, can we see
The lavish measure in which love is given.
And in the yearning tenderness of a child
For every bird that sings above its head,
And every creature feeding on the hills,
And every tree and flower, and running brook,
We see how everything was made to love,
And how they err, who, in a world like this,
Find anything to hate but human pride.

IMAGINARY CURES.

The power of imagination, in the cure of certain diseases, is a fact well known. To aid the imagination, or, to stimulate the patient's faith, certain rites or forms have to be observed. Some of these are curious and ridiculous enough, and none of them are based upon any rational system of cure. In rural districts, agues are frequently cured by this means. The patient is directed to do some out of the way thing, and assured, that if he will strictly follow the prescribed forms, the disease will leave him; and, singularly enough, the result in many cases follows the prediction. In a recent number of "Notes and Queries," we find this statement: "About a mile from Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, on a spot where two roads cross each other, are a few oak trees called cross oaks. Here aguish patients used to resort, and peg a lock of their hair into one of these oaks, then, by a sudden wrench, transfer the lock from their head to the tree, and return home with the full conviction, that the ague had departed with the severed lock. Persons now living, affirm they have often seen hair thus left, pegged into the oak, for one of these trees only was endowed with the healing power. The frequency of failure, however, to cure the disease, and the unpleasantness of the operation, have entirely destroyed the popular faith in this remedy; but that expedients quite as absurd and superstitious, and even more disgusting, are still practised to remove diseases, is fully proved by several instances recorded in "Notes and Queries."

There is, in this city, a gentleman of standing, intelligence, and scientific acquirements, who, curious to try the effect of imagination upon a certain order of minds, gave out, in a quiet way, that he could cure the ague. No very long time passed before his alleged power was put to the test. He was called on by a man or woman, we do not know which, and asked if it were true that he could cure the "chills." He replied, very gravely, in the affirmative. On being told that his visiter was suffering from the disease, and wished to be cured, he requested him (we are not certain that in this we are precisely correct—but it is of little consequence) to place his left fingers on his right pulse; after a few moments, he was told to place his right fingers on his left pulse. "Which pulse beats the strongest?" was now asked, with all imaginable seriousness. It mattered not what reply was made by the patient; the answer was, in all cases, the same. "You will have just two more chills. After that, the ague will leave you." And, curious enough, in many cases, the result was according to the prediction.

In the publication before mentioned, is the following from a correspondent:—"Looking over some family papers, lately, I found the following charm to cure the ague in an old diary: the date on the paper is 1751. I send it to you. 'Charm to cure the Ague.—When Jesus saw ye cross, whercon his body should be crucified, his body shook, and ye Jews asked him had he the ague? He answered and said, 'Whosoever keepeth this in mind or writing, shall not be troubled with Fever or Ague;' so, Lord, help thy servant trusting in thee. Then say the Lord's prayer. This is to be read before it is folded, then knotted, and not opened after."

Not long since, the following charm was practised in an English village, on a poor lad, subject to epileptic fits. Nine shillings were procured from nine virgins ("for which they were to be neither asked nor thanked:") the money was then made into a ring, which the child wore; but with no satisfactory result.

There is matter for thought in the subject here introduced. Some will settle the whole thing by saying they don't believe a cure was ever made by means such as have been instanced; while others will admit the facts, and endeavor to account for them on rational principles. The easy, and common mode by which these phenomena are disposed of, is to say that the imagination does everything. But, this is not quite so satisfactory as many could wish. How does imagination accomplish so singular a work—going, often, in advance of the most experienced physician? There is something, we think, beyond the simple imaginative faculty of the mind. Disease, it has been assumed, and by high authority, is of mental origin. The power of the mind over the body is known. In fact, the body is nothing but the material investiture of the soul, and obedient to it in every thing. Without the soul, it would be mere dead matter. How quickly does bodily ailment follow mental disease! Many a serious spell of sickness has originated in jealousy or from violent passion. If disease has its origin in the mind, then there may be mental cures. In other words, the mind may be brought into a state in which mental action will suspend the activity of disease in the body. Is it very hard to believe this? We think not.

With these remarks on the curious facts above given, we leave the subject with the reader.

A REMARKABLE CAVERN.

The Cincinnati Commercial gives the following sketch of the newly discovered "Wyandotte Cave," in Crawford county, Indiana:—

Near the town of Leavenworth, in the State of Indiana, and not far from the Ohio river, there is an extensive and very remarkable cavern, which, though not possessing all of that diversity of interest exhibited in the great Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, will yet, in many of its features, compare very favorably with the latter, and in some points far exceeds in grandeur and sublimity anything yet discovered there.

The land, upon which the cave is situated, was purchased from the United States Government by Mr. Henry P. Rothrock, the present proprietor. The fact of the existence of a cave here was known by the early settlers in the neighborhood since the year 1820, but it remained almost unexplored until a very short time since. That portion which has been known for many years is now called the "old cave," to distinguish it from the larger and more recently explored part, which is commonly known as the "new cave," and which has been traversed for the first time by white men within only eighteen months past. The exact location of Wyandotte Cave (for such is the name by which it is known) is about six miles east-northeast of the town of Leavenworth, on Blue River, formerly called Wyandotte River, Crawford county, Indiana, and not very far from the boundary line of Crawford and Harrison counties.

After dinner we commenced our preparations for entering the cave:—lamps and torches were prepared, trimmed and filled; these lamps, made of tin, had been manufactured to order in the city, for our special purpose. Some were formed with a socket in the bottom, and carried on the end of a stick five feet long—others, however, of a much more convenient form, were carried with a swinging handle like that of a kettle, a circular shade of the tin being formed about five inches below the hand, that served to keep the offensive lamp-smoke from the bearer, and prevented the glare of the flame from dazzling the eye. Beside the lamps and torches, several of the gentlemen had prepared fire-works of different kinds to illumine the dark halls, lanes and grottoes of the subterranean city. Last of all, we encased ourselves in rough suits, ready for all emergencies, and sallied out. That afternoon our explorations were preliminary and general, but on the next morning we commenced the work in earnest. The entrance of the cave is near the top of a lofty and very extensive hill;—after ascending about one-half a mile from the house by a steep winding path, you will observe the entrance; it is on the west side of this vast hill, and at an elevation of about 120 feet above Blue River. The entrance is about four feet high by seven broad. Just within the mouth we lighted our lamps. Their sickly yellow flame contrasted strangely with the thick blackness of the cavern on the one side, and the radiance of the sunlight without. The storm of the previous day had entirely subsided and died away; and the opening clouds showed the calm blue above, and we felt almost reluctant to bid adieu to nature in her fresh and smiling attire, and descend into these deep, dismal vaults. The damp air comes clinging around your limbs, and you shrink instinctively from the cold chilling embrace of the genius that presides over this sepulchral region.

In all large caverns there is a current of air more or less strong, either blowing out or inward; this depends upon the season of the year, or more properly the temperature of the external air; in winter the external air is inhaled by the cavern, and passes in under a brisk draft, while in the summer the cool air of the cave is breathed out. The mean temperature of the "Wyandotte Cave" during the whole year is 58 or 60 degrees Fahrenheit—it would, consequently, in summer, be cold, and in winter warm. A few feet within the mouth the proprietor has erected a wooden door to prevent the ingress of intruders; this being unlocked we were ushered into a long, low apartment, not remarkable for anything striking or unusually interesting. The ground here (as in a large portion of the cave) is strewn, and in some places entirely covered, with fragments and enormous masses of rock, that have evidently fallen from the roof at some early day; these huge pieces, of many tons in weight, lie in extensive irregular and chaotic heaps, and seem to have been shaken down by some violent convulsion of nature.

It is the unusual exertion and fatigue of clambering over these enormous piles that doubtless cause many travellers greatly to magnify the distances traversed by them in these caves. Now our party, by means of a line 100 feet long, (using a tape of 50 feet for shorter distances,) took some very accurate measurements of the apartments and windings, and were satisfied thereby that the distances in these caves are often very much overrated. It is easy for one entering a cave, for the first time, to be deceived in this respect, where the path is blocked up with heaps of from ten to twenty feet high, and he is to climb over them, or he is obliged to walk thirty or forty yards in a constrained and stooping posture, and then for an equal distance is down upon all fours, crawling along, and then suddenly has to take a steep descent, lamp in hand, cautiously threading his way downward, at the imminent danger, if he does not at each step secure a firm foothold, of losing his balance, and being dashed headlong to the bottom. After all these difficulties, requiring infinite toil and patience, and testing his vigor, he will easily be persuaded that he has travelled at the least a half mile, but let him reduce the distance to actual measurement, and he will be surprised to find that he has scarcely exceeded 1,200 feet. Far beyond the first door is a second, leading to a different branch of the cave. From mere conjecture I supposed that we had come three-fourths of a mile from the first door, yet on reference to our notes I found that we had come only about 1,000 feet! Some portions of the floor of the cave are covered with salt earths, from which large portions of Epsom salt have been manufactured—as many as twelve pounds of salts have been produced from a bushel of earth.

It would fill a volume to give a detail of all, or even most of the objects of curiosity and wonder amid those realms of solitude and darkness that attract the eye of the traveller at almost every step, invite his investigation or speculation, and fill him with emotions of delight and astonishment. One of the grandest and most stately of these is "Monument Mountain," which rises in the centre of "Wallace's Grand Dome." This dome is about 300 feet in length, by 150 broad. The immense mass of rock composing the mountain is vaulted over by the roof of the cavern itself, that spans the whole, and rises at this point from the base of the mountain to an altitude of 150 feet. Upon the top of the mountain are three beautiful stalagmites, formed by the slow dripping of the water through the limestone roof; their snowy line contrasts strongly with this thick gloom around; their beautiful forms, from this circumstance, are revealed to the eye even by the feeble ray of a single lamp; they are each about four feet high, and about six inches in thickness, and exceedingly white. Upon the top of the mountain, and alongside of these stalagmites, we lighted one of our largest Bengal lights: it emitted a very brilliant red flame, and burning for several minutes, afforded a gorgeous illumination—the effect was grand and ineffably sublime; until this moment we had discerned but half the wildness, and beauty and grandeur of the spot—but now the dazzling and intense light penetrated every crevice and cranny, and filled the vast dome as with the brightness of noonday, and revealed to our astonished vision the full glory of the scene—it was a terrific page in nature's volume that had been unclasped before us—we were contemplating her awful mysteries down deep in the caverns of the earth; and upon this page a flood of light had been poured that we might see and feel the power and glory of nature's Great Architect. At this spot we discovered a white-oak pole—this was found here on the side of the mountain, upon the first entrance, a year ago, of any white man into this part of the cave. It bears evident marks of having been cut at the end by some rude instrument. The probability is that it was brought in and left here by the Indians, and that the marks and attempt at sharpening the end of the pole was made by a stone hatchet. The difference of the mark left by the iron axe of the white man and the Indian stone hatchet, cannot be well mistaken.

Of smaller dimensions, and of far less imposing appearance, are "Concert Hall" and "Odd Fellows' Lodge." In the former is an echo—there we remained a short time for resting, burned one of our blue Bengal lights, and enjoyed the mellow tones of a flute that discoursed of the "Banks and braes of bonnie Doon," "Rory O'Moore," &c. Odd Fellows' Lodge is a spacious hall, about 250 feet in length by 100 in diameter, with an arched roof, 60 feet high. Between these two apartments, yet not contiguous to either, is a small cascade, produced either from the overflow of some subterranean stream, or by the water permeating through the bed of rock from the surface above. There our eyes were greeted with the sight of one of the most beautiful stalactites that we ever beheld. It is called the "Epaulette," from its almost perfect resemblance to that military ornament or insignia. It projects from the side of a rock and is about six feet above your head. The trickling lime-water has first formed the shoulder-piece about three feet wide, and then dividing itself into a score or more of little streams, and falling over, leaves the pendent fringe or bullion—the water slightly discolored by the yellow earth, gives to the whole a bright golden hue. These stalactites assume various and fantastic shapes; but I have never seen one that surpasses this in beauty of form or color, and that bears a more appropriate name. The proprietor carefully guards it against the ruthless hand of the spoiler and seeker after "specimens."

I have taken you, reader, by a very sudden digression, from "Monument Mountain" through these three last named localities. This has been by way of an episode. Descending the mountain, and just at the foot, we came to the Sulphur Spring: jaded and tired, we sat down to enjoy its cool and grateful waters: we all drank copious draughts: the flavor is mild and pleasant. After a heavy rain, the sulphur is less perceptible than at other times. The dryer the season the more proportionably strong is the sulphurous taste of this spring: so that at times it has very much the taste and smell of the Blue Lick, sold by the druggists in the city. Leaving the spring, we were looking around to see how we should proceed next, for our pathway seemed completely blocked up. Behind us was the steep mountain, with its peak capped by the three snowy monuments, reaching far up into the impenetrable gloom above, while before us rose the scowling blackened rocks that supported the great dome itself. To the inquiry where we were to go: "There," said our guide, "through that auger-hole," pointing down not far from our feet to a small aperture that appeared more like some fox's hole than anything else. At first I was really at a loss to know whether the old gentleman was quizzing us or not—and even after we were assured that he was in earnest, it was some time before all the gentlemen could make up their minds and determine to make the essay. Those of the party who were portly and elderly declared that they could not if they would, get through such a crevice, on account of their corpulence—that it was impossible to force themselves through the narrow chink beneath them, and even if they should succeed in squeezing in, what guarantee did they have that they should be able to get out? The rocks around and inside of the passage were wet and slippery from the overflowing water of the adjacent spring, that formed puddles about, and everything was covered with a soft, viscid clay that made the entrance more unpleasant. In short, there was no other alternative than for each one either to return and ingloriously "back out," or else to get down flat upon the back or stomach in the mud and water and "back in" to this "auger-hole."

At last, while we stood deliberating, one of the party, a slender young gentleman, of some sixteen years of age, laid down his lamp and disappeared through the hole. We all looked in, and by the aid of our lights saw him peering up through the little dark passage that proved to be about six feet in length. Thus encouraged, another and another of the party severally passed through—those behind passing down to those who had preceded them, the lamps, baskets, lines, &c. But when the turn of the stout gentleman and the broad-shouldered young man arrived, then came "the rub"—the latter declared emphatically that he had "stuck," and the former called to his comrades for assistance and "to lend a hand." After our party had all effected a safe passage through the "auger-hole," we found ourselves in a very low chamber that gradually widened and prolonged itself into an avenue.

We must necessarily pass over and omit several highly interesting spots and curiosities that we met in these dark windings and labyrinthine passages. Among these I may mention incidentally here the "Chapel"—a low, little crypt, containing two or three remarkable stalagmites of a brown color, formed, doubtless, centuries ago; the ground here had become perfectly dry, with no recent indications of moisture whatever. Toiling over hill and dale for many an hour, toward noon we entered "Rothrock's Promenade." This spacious avenue, extending about a third of a mile in length, presents a smooth footway with no obstructions of rock, and probably may have been the channel of some stream in primitive times, as it wears all the unmistakable marks, along its sides and roof, indicative of the flow and passage of water. The tired pedestrian finds great relief in its pleasant and uniform level and roominess.

In a distant part of this "promenade," or what is probably a continuation of it, the floor is strewn with heaps of infinitely small crystallizations or glittering particles of carbonate of lime, having the appearance, when first perceived by torch-light, of an innumerable quantity of the finest needles. These minute particles extend along the pathway for a distance of over 200 feet.

In still another part of this avenue, there are to be seen the foot-prints of the red men, who visited this place before its discovery by the whites. In one spot you may distinctly trace in the soft path the tracks of four persons—two wearing moccasins and two barefooted. They are known to have been four in number from there being four different lengths of the feet. The Indian habit of walking, too, so different from the white man's step, is plainly discernible here, one foot being placed straight and immediately in front of the other.

Another of the remarkable features of "Rothrock's Promenade" is found in the crystalline formations exhibited there; one portion of its sides being completely fretted over or encrusted with the richest and most delicate crystallization of carbonate of lime that we had ever beheld. They appeared like so many sparkling gems "of purest ray serene" that nature had scattered here with lavish profusion. Some of these crystals were of snowy whiteness, others were of a very light pink or cream color; some assumed the shape of a full-blown rose; some were fashioned like the tulip, others like some sprouting forms of vegetable life, while others were of variously quaint and fantastic shapes. Several of these specimens of rare and exceeding beauty were presented to us by the worthy proprietor.

We began now to scale and clamber over the most rugged and arduous way that had even yet presented itself since our first entrance; and by-and-by we approached "Pluto's Chasm." This, as its name may indicate, is a terrific gap, or fissure, yawning open before the traveller, having an abrupt and almost sheer descent of nearly or quite 200 feet. The downward path, from both the opposite sides, to the bottom of this deep cleft, through which every one must pass, is very difficult, requiring considerable care and caution to avoid the danger of a fall. Here the rock-ribbed edifice seems to have been rended in twain by some earthquake, and instead of the roof falling, as is the case in other portions of the cave, the solid body of rock seems to have been violently riven asunder, leaving a steep and dangerous pass through the midst of this hideous chasm. Our Bengal lights were again brought into requisition. Some of our party witnessed the sublime exhibition from the heights above, while others posted themselves in the gulf below. I can only say that the scene presented was surpassingly grand, and baffles all my efforts adequately to describe. Towering up on each side of us rose the crags of jagged rock to an amazing height; and meeting overhead, formed an irregularly grained roof; around stood the gigantic forms and huge masses of rock that had remained fixed for ages in silence, solitude and darkness, mute witnesses of the dread catastrophe that had been there enacted. Standing at the bottom of the abyss, and looking up among the craggy heights, I beheld the figures of some of our party looking down upon the scene. The pale blue glare of our Bengal light gave a ghastly hue to their countenances, and they seemed more like some wild supernatural beings who had been disturbed from their dens, by the unwonted clamor and blaze of light, than like one of us.

Ascending from this gap, you continue for a considerable distance on an upward course, until the path, growing more and more narrow, seems at last to terminate in the ceiling; but, clambering up, you discern a small aperture, called the "Screw," about large enough for the bulk of an ordinary man's body. Fortunately for themselves, the portly and elderly members of our party, on account of extreme fatigue and indisposition, had returned. By a little patient twisting, the younger and smaller gentlemen succeeded in squeezing through this crevice. Just at this point we discovered a small living centipede—the only sign of animal existence that we had discovered within these cheerless dominions of nature, unless we except the withered skeletons of some bats found in the other parts of the cave. On account of the narrow aperture the centipede was swept away by some of the party, and we were unable to preserve it; but, from the presence of this little insect, and the fact that we were surrounded by a large bed of clay, some nine feet in thickness, we conjectured that this portion of the cave could not be far below the surface of the earth.

Having extricated ourselves from this confined passage, and passing on by a somewhat wider and downward path, we came to the "Circle of the Union." This is an immense vaulted hall, or, if it were not more elliptical than circular in its form, might be called a rotunda, being of a magnitude and height that is truly stupendous. You necessarily approach this vast area by a narrow passage that terminates about half way between the floor and the roof; thence you descend by a steep course to the floor. In the centre rises up like a mountain, an enormous mass of rock, and upon the top of this huge structure stands the stately and august "Pillar of the Constitution," supporting the overarching roof above. This magnificent column is a vast concretion of fibrous or satinspar, some portions being of an immaculate whiteness, and the rest of a light orange color. It varies from 12 to 16 feet in diameter, and is about 45 feet in circumference. There it is, the slowly natural work of centuries, ay, of ages. Its shape reminds you of some vast jet d'eau, or fountain, whose falling waters seem, as by some spell, suddenly congealed or petrified. Every object here is of colossal proportions—the noble shaft stands conspicuous in the centre—a heavy pall of gloom is contained around—silence reigns supreme, and everything conspires to fill the beholder with the most sublime ideas and the profoundest sensations of awe.

THE WAR OF 1812.

A DIALOGUE FOR THE YOUNG.

BY E. KENNEDY.

Tommy. What do people mean, papa, when they talk about the "Late War?"

Papa. O, they mean the war of 1812.

T. I thought that was it; but it isn't a very late war, I'm sure, for it happened thirty years ago, and more too.

P. Well, I presume there was more propriety in the name as used by our fathers than as used by us; but the phrase has come into use, and it would be a hard thing to change it now.

T. Can't you

"Tell me all about the war,
And what they killed each other for,"

as the poem has it that we read in our school books. I believe the Americans didn't gain much glory in that war, did they?

P. O yes, a good deal of what they call "glory," though I hardly think it deserving of the name. 'Tis true they met with many reverses at first, but they were abundantly successful after a while. You know of the victories of our ships of war upon the ocean, I am sure, and everybody is, or ought to be familiar with the "glorious 8th of January," or Jackson's victory at New Orleans.

T. What did the quarrel begin about at first?

P. O it was an old grudge. You must know that the first symptoms of it broke out within five-and-twenty years after the old Revolutionary war closed. The ancient dispute had not been fully and fairly settled, nor indeed could it well be in the lifetimes of those who had been the actors in the ugly strife that lasted from 1775 till 1783. England never ceased to abuse us all the while, and for years after; and we, on our part—I mean our fathers—never got reconciled in heart to terms of peace and amity. But you want to know what led immediately to the breaking out of the war of 1812?

T. Yes, sir.

P. Well, I'll tell you: During the years 1804, '5, '6 and 7, the British cruisers would board our merchant vessels and help themselves to every stout sailor they took a fancy to, under the appellation—a false one—of British seamen.

T. Do you mean, papa, that their ships overhauled our ships, and that they seized upon our men and carried them off?

P. I mean that very thing. It certainly was very ugly of John Bull to do so, but it was nevertheless a fact. And these outrages became so common, that scarcely any of our vessels were safe upon the ocean, and any handsome, tall, well-made man, was, at any time, upon the high seas, liable to being seized as prey by these gentlemen in red coats. I think as many as six or seven hundred of our men were "pressed" in this manner into the British service, during the few years immediately preceding the war. 'Tis true some of these men may have been Englishmen born, but the great majority of them were American citizens.

T. Well, even if they had been Englishmen, I can't see how it would have been right to carry them off without their consent.

P. It wasn't right, neither could such a system be tolerated for an hour in these, our days,—I mean that of "pressing" men into the service, or kidnapping them, as it might more appropriately be termed. England, too, has always claimed a right over her native born citizens, nor to this hour can an Englishman ever get loose from his allegiance to the crown; and the plea they always urged in stopping our vessels, and searching them, was to find property that belonged to them, they said. And being also very much in want of good seamen, it was quite convenient to claim any able-bodied man they took a fancy to, as a native born subject of King George, whether he was so or not. This was called by a very odious name—the right of search.

T. And hadn't Americans the same right of search, too?

P. I don't know why they should not have had it, only that England claimed to be both mistress of the seas and master of the ocean, and insisted on certain high-handed rights purely on the score of might alone.

T. I don't wonder that it led to war if that was the case: 'tis just like it is at school sometimes—some big boy crows over the little ones, and abuses them and knocks them about, until some spunky little fellow gives him a flogging, and then he behaves himself.

P. That is not a bad illustration, and it will enable you to understand this matter all the better. In the year 1807, the British ship-of-war Leopard fired upon one of our frigates, the Chesapeake, on account of a refusal to submit to "search;" and Commodore Barron had then to give way, and allow his vessel to be overhauled and examined. Many people thought that Commodore Barron ought to have fought, and bled, and died, before he should have submitted to such a disgrace to our national flag: and Commodore Decatur was one of those who expressed themselves so freely upon the subject; and he was called to account for it in a duel which was fought about a dozen years after.

T. O yes; and Commodore Decatur was killed by Commodore Barron!—

P. Exactly: I'm glad you remember these circumstances. It was for having questioned Commodore Barron's prudence and courage in this "affair of the Chesapeake," that in 1820 a duel was fought, and sad to say, the gallant Decatur, who was sometimes called by the sailors, the "Mainmast of the Navy," was killed. But matters went on so and got no better, but worse, until in 1812, when there was a DECLARATION OF WAR.

T. England declared war, I suppose?

P. O no. It was America that first showed fight, and resolved—boldly resolved, I think—upon a redress of heavy grievances. Mr. Madison was President at the time, and he was both a man of peace and a peace-loving man; but he considered that the honor of the country was at stake.

T. I suppose the people all thought as he did about it?

P. Not all of them: but the war was sustained and carried on by a majority of the American people. Mr. Madison being re-elected President by so large a majority, after the war had begun, was sufficient evidence that the people supported him, or would support him in it. You know that the distinguished Henry Clay, who has recently died, so full of years and so full of honor, was a great supporter of the war. That Representative Hall where Congress sits, has oftentimes, in years gone by, been made ring with the piercing notes of his stirring eloquence.—A whole generation has passed away since that critical period of our country's history, and we now look back with an unprejudiced eye, and we see that the war was a just one—that is, if any war can be accounted just. As the world is organized, men sometimes must contend for their rights, and they must even compel others to respect them; and in this view I regard the war of 1812—the "late war," or "Madison's war," or by whatever name you may fancy to call it, as a just and a necessary war.

T. And how with the Mexican war?

P. O, that I'm not so sure about; neither have we time to discuss that now.

INTERESTING VARIETIES.

"COLUMBUS AND THE EGG" ANTICIPATED.—Brunelleschi was the discoverer of the mode of erecting cupolas, which had been lost since the time of the Romans. Vasari relates a similar anecdote of him to that recorded of Columbus; though this has unquestionably the merit of being the first, since it occurred before the birth of Columbus. Brunelleschi died in 1446; Columbus was born in 1442.

A council of the most learned men of the day, from various parts of the world, was summoned to consult and show plans for the erection of a cupola, like that of the Pantheon at Rome. Brunelleschi refused to show his model, it being upon the most simple principles, but proposed that the man who could make an egg stand upright on a marble base should be the architect. The foreigners and artists agreeing to this, but failing in their attempts, desired Brunelleschi to do it himself; upon which he took the egg, and with a gentle tap broke the end, and placed it on the slab. The learned men unanimously protested that any one else could do the same; to which the architect replied, with a smile, that had they seen his model, they could as easily have known how to build a cupola.

The work then devolved upon him; but, a want of confidence existing among the operatives and citizens, they pronounced the undertaking to be too great for one man, and arranged that Lorenzo Ghiberti, an artist of great repute at that time, should be co-architect with him. Brunelleschi's anger and mortification were so great on hearing this decision, that he destroyed, in the space of half an hour, models and designs that had cost him years of labor, and would have quitted Florence but for the persuasions of Donatello. It is almost unnecessary to add that the cupola was completed with perfect success by Brunelleschi; since then, St. Peter's, at Rome, and St. Paul's, in London, were formed upon the model of his dome at Florence.

EFFECT OF CLIMATE ON CONSUMPTION.—The Medical Faculty are beginning to question the opinion which has so long prevailed among medical men, that a change of climate is beneficial to persons suffering with the consumption. Sir James Clark, of England, has assailed the doctrine with considerable force, and a French physician named Carriere, has written against it; but the most vigorous opponent of it is a Dr. Burgess, of whom a recent article in Chamber's Edinburgh Journal, gives an account. Dr. Burgess contends that climate has little or nothing to do with the cure of consumption, and that if it had, the curative effects would be produced through the skin, and not the lungs. That a warm climate is not in itself beneficial, he shows from the fact that the disease exists in all latitudes. In India and Africa, tropical climates, it is as frequent as in Europe or Northern America. All the curative resorts, now in fashion, are productive of consumption than any locality of Great Britain. Naples, Florence, Nice, Genoa, Venice, all generate more consumption than London, Liverpool, Edinburgh and Manchester. Madeira, the chosen paradise of pulmonary patients, is more unfavorable to the disease than England. Aix and Montpelier are no better, if not worse. Pisa is worse than all; so that Italian climate for consumption-cure, is pronounced an errant "humbug." Change of air, in the same climate, is the sanative theory of Dr. Burgess, deduced from the most expansive observations and industrious experiments in "climatology." "Give me Italy, or I perish," "Give us a warm climate," which is now the fashionable cry of rich patients, will soon be changed "to change of air at home," in the opinion of Dr. Burgess, whose new theory will bring consolation, if not cure, to every poor person who labors under this afflictive malady, and cannot take a voyage to Italy.

THE RESORT OF THE EIDER-DUCKS.—The little island of Vidoe, says Ader Pfeiffer, in her journey to Iceland, about a mile from Reikjavick, is generally mentioned by travellers as the principal resort of the eider-ducks. On the 8th of June, I visited the place, and found myself greatly disappointed in the number of birds assembled there; for although I saw many sitting quietly on their nests on the slopes of the meadows, and between the rocks, so far from being in thousands, I doubt if there were in all more than a hundred or a hundred and fifty nests. The tameness of the eider-duck, while brooding, is very extraordinary. I had always looked upon the wonderful stories I had heard on this subject as fables, and should do so yet, if I had not been an eye-witness to the fact myself. I approached, and laid my hands on the birds while they were sitting: yes, I could even caress them without their attempting to move from their nests; or, if they left them for a moment, it was only to walk off for a few steps, and remain quietly waiting till I withdrew, when they immediately returned to their station. Those whose young were already hatched, however, would beat their wings with violence, and snap at me with their bills when I came near, them rather allowing themselves to be seized than desert their broods. In size they resemble our common duck; their eggs are of a greenish gray, rather larger than hens' eggs, and of an excellent flavor. Each bird lays about eleven eggs. The finest down is that with which they line their nests at first; it is of a dark gray, and is regularly carried off by the Icelanders, with the first eggs. The poor bird then robs itself of a second portion of its down, and lays a few more eggs, which are also seized; and it is not till the nest has been filled for the third time that the ducks are left unmolested to raise their young brood. The down of the second, and particularly that of the third hatching, is much lighter than the first, and of an inferior quality. I was so cruel as to appropriate some of the down and a few eggs myself. I had no opportunity of seeing the down and eggs collected from between the inaccessible rocks and cliffs, where they are only reached by the peasants by means of ropes, and at the peril of their lives.

"THAT WILL DO," is a phrase of modern invention. The ancients knew of no such expression, or the Egyptians would never have raised the pyramids, nor the Greeks and Romans displayed that love of the beautiful which led them to impart a poetic grace even to the meanest utensils for household use, as the remains of Pompeii fully testify. "That will do," is the excuse of mediocrity, unable to soar to better things. "That will do," is the self-dispensation given by the lazy painter, who glosses over the want of anatomical correctness by a showy coloring. "That will do," is the besetting sin of architects who lay their short-comings to the want of a favorable site or an Italian climate. "That will do," is the precept held in veneration by most servants. "That will do," makes your sloven and your slattern. A man who adopts this motto with regard to dress does not mind being seen with a dirty shirt, and a beard of two days' growth—while the same fatal saying allows a woman to go about the house with curl papers, and slippers. "That will do," applied to household matters, is equally bad, and more annoying to friends than when applied to dress. You may expect ill-cooked dinners in any house where the heads adopt this maxim—to say nothing of shabby carpets, faded paint, dirty muslin curtains, &c. "That will do," has conjured up a host of inefficient teachers, and a still larger proportion of imperfect scholars. "That will do," has sunk many a ship—caused the downfall of scaffolding holding hundreds of human beings—occasions at least half the fires that take place, and is at the bottom of most railway disasters. "That will do," is the enemy to all excellence, and would sap the conscience of the most virtuous man alive, if he hearkened to its dictates. The only persons to whom we recommend it are drunkards, gamblers, and spendthrifts, who may very properly exclaim—"That will do!" All should bear in mind that nothing will "do" but the very best in point of excellence.

THE ELGIN MARBLES.—Grace Greenwood, in her "Leaves from over the Sea," now appearing in the National Era, speaking of the Elgin Marbles, in the British Museum, says:—"The Elgin marbles and other ancient statuary were not to me all I expected them to be—or rather the woful unsuitableness of the place for such grand fragments of art, the want of all their natural surroundings, made the sight more painful than pleasurable, far. And yet I had hardly realized that the olden, immortal grace could so triumph over mutilation and decay, and compel the homage of even the inartistic gazer, as it does through these defaced and dilapidated divinities, these armless graces and legless heroes, these tailless horses and headless riders. So noble are those forms in the great power yet perfect symmetry of their full physical development, so free in action, so grand in repose, so beautiful in half-barbaric grace, that one sighs at the thought of a humanity so glorious having passed away, and sees a sort of sublime pathos in the long struggle of art with Ruin and Time, to preserve for it even this broken immortality."

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.—One fountain there is, says Miss Brengle, whose deep-lying vein has only just begun to bubble up its silver drops among mankind—a fountain which will allay the thirst of millions, and will give to those who drink from it, peace and joy. IT IS KNOWLEDGE—the fountain of intellectual cultivation—which gives health to mankind: makes clear the vision; brings joys to his life, and breathes over his soul's destiny a deep repose. Go and drink therefrom, thou whom fortune has not favored, and thou wilt soon find thyself rich. Thou mayst go forth into the world and find thyself everywhere at home; thou canst enjoy thyself in thy own little chamber; thy friends are everywhere around thee; nature, antiquity, heaven, are accessible to thee!

Though we may have a hard pillow, yet it is only sin that can plant a thorn in it—and even though it may be hard and lonely, yet we may have sweet sleep and glorious visions upon it. It was when Jacob was lying upon a stone for a pillow, that he had glorious visions of a ladder reaching to Heaven.

TWO WAYS TO LIVE ON EARTH.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

There are two ways to live on earth;—
 'Two ways to judge—to act—to view;—
 For all things here have double birth,
 A right and wrong—a false and true!

Give me the home where kindness seeks
 To make that sweet which seemeth small;
 Where every lip in fondness speaks—
 And every mind hath care for all!

Whose inmates live in glad exchange
 Of pleasures, free from vain expense;
 Whose thoughts beyond their means ne'er range,
 Nor wise denials give offence!

Who in a neighbor's fortune find
 No wish—no impulse—to complain;
 Who feel not—never felt—the mind
 To envy yet another's gain!—

Who dream not of the mocking tide
 Ambition's foiled endeavor meets;—
 The bitter pangs of wounded pride;
 Fallen Power, that shuns the streets.

Though Fate deny its glitt'ring store,
 Love's wealth is still the wealth to choose;
 For all that Gold can purchase more
 Are gauds—it is no loss to lose!

Some beings, wheresoe'er they go,
 Find naught to please—or to exalt;
 Their constant study but to show
 Perpetual modes of finding fault.

While others, in the ceaseless round
 Of daily wants, and daily care,
 Can yet cull flowers from common ground;
 And twice enjoy the joy they have!

Oh, happy they who happy make!—
 Who being—still themselves are blest!—
 Who something spare for others' sake—
 And strive—in all things—for the best!

LOVE THE OLD.

I love the old, to lean beside
 The antique, easy chair,
 And pass my fingers softly o'er
 A wreath of silvered hair;
 To press my glowing lips upon
 The furrowed brow, and gaze
 Within the unken eye, where dwells
 The "lights of other days"

To fold the pale and feeble hand
 That on my youthful head
 Has lain so tenderly, the while
 The evening prayer was said.
 To nestle down close to the heart,
 And marvel how it held
 Such tomes of legendary lore,
 The chronicles of Eld.

Oh! youth thou hast so much of joy
 So much of life, and love,
 So many hopes; Age has but one—
 The hope of bliss above.
 Then turn awhile from these away
 To cheer the old, and bless
 The wasted heart-spring with a stream
 Of gushing tenderness.

Thou treadest now a path of bloom,
 And thine exulting soul
 Springs proudly on, as tho' it mocked
 At Time's unfelt control.

But they have marched a weary way,
 Upon a thorny road,
 Then soothe the toil-worn spirits, ere
 They pass away to God.

Yes, love the aged—bow before
 The venerable form,
 So soon to seek beyond the sky
 A shelter from the storm.

Ay, love them; let thy silent heart,
 With reverence untold,
 As pilgrim, very near to Heaven,
 Regard and love the old.

THE MOTHER'S RESOLVE.

It was late tea-time at Mr. Merwyn's pleasant back parlor, in his commodious and comfortable house, in Boston. Mrs. Merwyn was sitting by the fire awaiting the return of her husband from his store. William and Anne, the children, were rudely racing round the room, overturning chairs and stools, and threatening every moment to upset the tea-table. "Stop, children, this moment," said Mrs. Merwyn. "Anne, open the door for your father; Willie, ring the bell for Bridget."

"Father has a night-key, and he can open the door for himself," said Anne; upon which she commenced a desperate struggle with Willie, to recover a toy he had snatched from her.

Mr. Merwyn entered the room with a jaded, tired look, and sat down by the fire. Soon after, Bridget came in with a plate of toast in one hand and a cream-pitcher in the other. The children, quite beside themselves in the eagerness of their quarrel, ran against her, knocked the dish of toast from her hand, and its contents were spread on the carpet. Mrs. Merwyn ran to them, and, seizing them each in turn, boxed their ears soundly, accompanying her castigation with severe reproaches. "I never saw anything like it! You are the worst-behaved children I ever beheld! You are the plagues of my life! I wish you were, both of you, a hundred miles off! I am sure I cannot imagine how I came to have such bad children. Go to the table this minute, and see if you can behave yourselves. You make it very pleasant for your father, who has been working for you all day, to come home and find the house in such an uproar, and the carpet spoiled, and the toast gone." With such expressions, she drove the children to the table.

They were really pretty children, though pale and delicate; but now, with their unnaturally flushed faces, dishevelled hair, and angry looks, their appearance was anything but agreeable. They began to eat in moody silence. The parents were silent also. At length Mrs. Merwyn said, "Willie, don't eat so much of that rich cake; take some bread and butter; and, Anne, stop helping yourself to sweetmeats; you have eaten two saucers full already."

"I don't like bread and butter," said William, in a surly tone, "and I can't eat what I don't like."

Anne, with a look of contempt at her mother, coolly helped herself to the last of the preserves, and eat them.

The evening passed as uncomfortably as it had begun. When the tea-things were cleared away, the study table was set out, for the children had lessons to recite on the morrow which must be learned in the evening. But they were cross and ill-natured to each other, and their father, after trying for half an hour to read a pamphlet which he had brought home with him, threw it aside, and seated himself with a heavy sigh by the fire.

"I say, mother," said Willie, "where's Turin?"

"I don't know exactly; look it out on the map."

"I can't, there's such a crowd of little names here; and, what is more, I won't. I don't care if I do miss in my lesson. I have got so low in my class now, I would as lief be at the foot as anywhere else."

"Mother, is good a noun or an adjective?" inquired Anne.

"How should I know?" replied the mother. "Can you not tell from the way in which it is used?"

"No, I can't," said Anne.

"Study your rules, then, and do not tease me about it," said the mother.

The books were put away. Nine o'clock came, and the children left the room for bed; Anne complaining of a headache, and upbraiding Willie for breaking her glass bird.

After sitting silent for half an hour, looking steadily into the fire, Mr. Merwyn turned round to his wife, who was seated near the table with her head upon her hand: the needle-work had fallen upon the floor. "Helen," said he, "why do our children behave in the way they do? I want a cheerful, pleasant, orderly home. I have built this house, and furnished it handsomely, and I am sure I supply you liberally with every means of comfort, and yet how uncomfortable we are. And it all comes of those unruly children."

Mrs. Merwyn looked up half angrily. "If the children are bad, is it not partly your fault, James? Do you govern them as you ought?"

"How can I?" replied the husband. "Am I not at my work all day? And must I spend the time in which I need a little relaxation, in reducing a couple of rebellious children to order? They love me little enough now. It is seldom that I get the slightest caress, or even a respectful word from either of them; and how would it be if I spent my evenings in checking and scolding them? I took tea at our old friends, the Westons, last evening. Weston is as busy as I am, and the whole charge of their five children falls upon his wife; but, oh! Helen, it made my heart ache to see them; such happy cheerful faces, such intelligent looks, such pleasant, winning ways; so quiet and obedient, and yet so loving and affectionate to their parents and to each other! I used to hope my children would grow up so; but I have no such hope now—they grow worse as they grow older. I desire you will let them have another room to pass their evenings in, for I want to have them out of my sight." Having thus spoken, with a heavy sigh, the father left the room for his chamber.

When he was gone, Mrs. Merwyn burst into a passion of tears. The fountains of feeling seem stirred to their inmost depths. At first she pitied herself; she was angry with her husband and her children. She called to mind the fact that she was married at seventeen to a husband considerably older than herself. "And how could it be expected," thought she, "that I should know anything about bringing up children? I was a petted, indulged, half-educated girl, myself; where was I to get the strength, and the self-denial, and the perseverance necessary for this most difficult task? Was it to be expected that I should give up every pleasure of youth, and think and work entirely for others?" As these thoughts passed through her mind, she wept the more.

Mrs. Merwyn, it is true, was married too early; she had begun wrong. But she was a woman of deep feelings, and earnest, though unformed and undeveloped purposes. Having exhausted her self-commiseration, her thoughts took another turn. "But I love my children, and I love my husband. I am their mother. I am his wife; and do not nature and God and my own heart urge me to a higher and better discharge of duty than I have ever yet practised? Oh! how happy I should be if I could reclaim my children, reform them, and establish a mother's influence over them; if I could make my husband happy and his home delightful! What would I not sacrifice for this?" Her face beamed as she indulged these bright visions, but reflection brought discouragement. "I am thirty years old," murmured she; "Anne is twelve and Willie ten. Even if I could change myself, how can I alter them? Ah! I fear it is a hopeless case."

Mrs. Merwyn had never made a profession of religion, though she had for some time entertained a kind of doubtful hope of her spiritual state, and had practised an earnest but irregular habit of secret prayer. She now sunk upon her knees, and laid all her sorrows, wishes, hopes and half-formed resolutions, before the great Helper and Comforter; praying for wisdom and strength, as Solomon prayed when entrusted with the kingdom; for she felt, more deeply than ever before, that she, too, had a high and holy mission to fulfil, and that strength and guidance from above were absolutely necessary to enable her to perform her duty. She rose with a feeling new to herself: a calmness, a resolution, a determination, which inspired her with hope and confidence.

The next morning she went to her old friend, Mrs. Weston, and made her the confidant of her new feelings and plans. Mrs. Weston was a large-hearted, strong-minded, pious woman. She listened with generous interest, she encouraged, she advised; and, after a conference of three hours, Mrs. Merwyn returned home. That evening, after her husband and children had retired, she took her writing-desk and wrote the following schedule of resolutions:

"Resolved, That the first duty of the day performed by me shall be a prayer to Almighty God, and especially for strength and wisdom, properly to instruct, guide and govern my children.

"Resolved, That I will never permit either of my children, with impunity, wilfully to disobey me, or treat me with disrespect.

"Resolved, That I will earnestly strive never to act from an impulse of passion or resentment; but will endeavor to preserve my judgment cool and my feelings calm, that I may clearly see, and truly perform my duty to my children.

"Resolved, That I will devote a certain portion of my leisure to daily self-instruction, in order to be able properly to instruct my children.

"Resolved, That I will watch over my own temper at all times, cultivate a habit of cheerfulness, and interest myself in the little matters of my children, that I may thereby gain their love.

"Resolved, That I will break off the habit of lounging; that I will give up the reading of novels, and that I will attend fewer large parties, and devote the time which I shall thus gain, especially to pursuits which will increase the comfort and happiness of my husband, and forward the interests of my children.

"Resolved, That I will especially study the health of my children, reading on the subject, and asking advice of those who are more experienced than myself.

"Resolved, That I will not yield to discouragement from failure in my first attempts at reform; but will persevere, putting faith in the promises of God to all those who earnestly and faithfully endeavor to do their duty."

These resolutions looked very cold and formal to the mother when she had done writing them. The writing was nothing; they were in her heart; but she folded the paper and locked it in her desk, as a memento, if she should ever feel herself falling into old habits of indolence and self-indulgence.

The next morning the family took their breakfast as usual, Anne and Willie coming in just as their father was about leaving the table. He was going to leave home this morning, to be absent four weeks; but there was no respectful salutation, no pleasant parting kiss, from these ill-behaved children, for the father who had spent his days in toiling for their welfare. "Bring me something handsome!" and "Bring be something nice!" they exclaimed, as they took their seats at the table.

"Where's my cup of coffee?" said Willie. "This white stuff isn't coffee."

"No," said his mother, "it is milk and water. I prefer that you should drink it for your breakfast."

"And I prefer the coffee," said Willie, in a very determined tone, "and I am determined to have it." And he stretched his hand toward the coffee-pot to help himself.

"Take the coffee away, Bridget," said Mrs. Merwyn. It disappeared.

"Where's my buttered toast and sausages?" said Anne.

"You will have neither this morning. There is good bread and butter, and you can have a mutton chop or a boiled egg, just which you prefer."

"I don't prefer either; I want sausages. If I can't have what I want, I won't eat anything."

"As you please," replied the mother, coolly.

The children looked at their mother and at each other. They did not know what to make of this resolute resistance to their wishes. They begged, teased and fretted; but it was of no use. They finally, with sullen looks, condescended to eat what was before them. "But I know one thing," said Willie, "if I can't have what I want for my dinner, I'll starve. And I have not washed myself all over for a week, and I don't intend to any more. And I shan't go to school this afternoon: father's gone, and I mean to stay at home and play; won't you, Anne?"

Anne declared her readiness to join in this plan, and with this bravado they left the room.

The dinner was still more stormy and uncomfortable than the breakfast had been. The children went to school in the afternoon, but with red eyes and angry tempers. Nor was it much better at tea. They were moody and discontented, and as indulgence had hitherto been the mother's only means of management, she could not alter the state of things. A cheerful word or a kind smile was met with sullenness or indifference; it had no value.

After a wild, romping game, which the mother did not attempt to check, the study table was drawn out; but, before the books were taken, she placed her children in two chairs, and seated herself opposite to them. Her eye was moist and her voice trembled a little as she began to speak to them; but, as she proceeded, the strength of an earnest purpose soon dried the one and gave firmness to the other.

"My children," said she, "I love you dearly. I love you, and your father loves you, because you are our children. We wish to make you good, that we may love you better. We wish you to be happy, which you cannot be unless you are good. God has given you to us, and has commanded us to train you up in the way in which you should go. He has commanded children to love and obey their parents. You are old enough to feel and understand how right this is. I was a very young mother, my dear children, when you were given to me. I was not twenty years old when the youngest of you was born. I was ignorant, indolent and careless. I am older now. I have seen the evils of carelessness and over-indulgence. I have observed, have read, and I have thought. I am now resolved to strive to train you in the right way, and as the first step and foundation, I am determined that you shall obey me. I do not think you love me or your father, as children generally love their parents; perhaps you never will; but you must obey us and treat us with respect."

The children had often seen their mother in a passion from their provoking ways, and had often felt the weight of her hand upon their ears; but they now felt that a new principle was at work. They were silent as she proceeded.

"I am not going to give you a long lecture, or to reproach you with the past. Our business is with the present and with the future. Many things, which you have till now indulged in, will, from this time, be entirely changed. I shall be changed. I shall not be the same mother I was a week ago; I hope I shall be a better one. Anne and William, I speak seriously to you; you are both old enough to understand me. If you fall into the right way at once, it will save trouble and make me very happy."

"Mother," said Willie, looking at her half in wonder, "I'm almost glad at what you've been saying. I love you better than you think for, and I am not half so bad as you suppose I am; but somehow the naughty feelings always seemed to come because you let them. I've told Anne fifty times that I wished you would make us mind."

Anne said nothing for some time, but seemed to be in deep thought. At last she said, "I've often wished that I could be like Alice Weston; but I don't know how I am ever going to learn to be good. I know I shall be cross and angry fifty times a day; I can't help it."

"There is One who can help us all, if we truly seek His help, my children. Let us ask it now."

They knelt, and the mother, with streaming eyes, prayed for that assistance which the great Father of all has kindly promised to those who sincerely seek His aid. The children were unusually thoughtful, and learned their lessons in silence. At bed-time, Mrs. Merwyn had usually asked her children for a kiss. Sometimes it was carelessly given, sometimes not; always considered rather as a favor from the children. This evening she did not ask them for a kiss, but kindly bade them good-night.

The very next morning, this awakened mother began upon her new plan. She rose early, and went to her children's room to see that they were bathed and rubbed, and to teach them how best to do it for themselves; and she required them to be ready for breakfast punctually at the hour. She excluded from the table everything which she considered unwholesome. Some rich, high-seasoned dishes, which had been favorites, were banished forever, and food plainer, yet excellent in its kind, was substituted. Mrs. Merwyn sent her children out to run and play half an hour before going to school, and the same on their return; and she fitted up a large spare room with every convenience for exercise when the weather should be stormy. She examined into her children's studies, and reduced their number. She procured the same books, and spent two hours a day in making herself thorough mistress of their contents, keeping constantly a little ahead of them in their lessons. She procured various books of reference, and learned, not only the text, but whatever she could find relating to it in compends, dictionaries and encyclopedias; and it was surprising to see how the respect of her children increased, when they found that their mother knew, not only more than they did themselves, but, in many instances, more than their teachers.

All this was easy. It was a plain path, requiring nothing but ordinary judgment, and a little extraordinary energy. Not so with the moral self-culture and training of her children, which this mother had now in earnest undertaken. It was not so easy to supply proper motives to children who had always looked to some outward, sensual indulgence, as the reward, not only of mental exertion, but for being good. It was not easy for one who had lavished caresses indiscriminately, merely to gratify her own feelings or to coax them to her purpose, to give a value in her children's eyes to a smile, a caress, a word of praise, to make them motives and rewards for good conduct. It was not easy to curb the stubborn and long-indulged will, to check the impatient temper, to change rude manners into respectful politeness. And yet it was wonderful to behold the progress, even here; so much is there in a resolute determination, in sustained and unflagging effort.

The early rising and the evening prayer had not been discontinued; and though the mother devoted so much more time than formerly to her children, she found she had more leisure for household occupation, general reading, and social enjoyment, than ever before. The energy called up for a particular purpose, extended itself into every department, and gave firmness and confidence to one who had hitherto been thought rather a weak woman. Her friends remarked a depth and earnestness about her, which they had never observed before; and she was gratified to perceive an increase of respect and consideration in all around her. These things, however, came later. Our business is with the first steps of this change; to show that it is possible to stem an erring course, to retrace a mistaken path in the outset of life. Notwithstanding the involuntary admission of Anne and Willie, that it would be better for them to be well governed, they had, both from nature and habit, become too fond of having their own way, readily to give it up. During the first week of her trial, especially, if this young mother had not brought to her support every power of her nature, and every motive suggested by conscience: love and hope,—if she had not been sustained by constant prayer and a daily increasing sense of duty,—she would many times have yielded, and the old state of things would have been established more firmly than ever. Many were the struggles with her children, but still more frequent were her self-wrestlings. To be firm without severity; to inflict a necessary pain when her heart was overflowing with love; to teach an impulsive disposition to examine, wait and weigh; and finally, to require the penalty of strict justice; to inflict the exact degree of punishment which the case required; all this demanded painful effort. And still more painful was it to withhold the caresses which she had been in the habit of bestowing upon her children whenever they would condescend to receive them. Mrs. Merwyn had the good sense, in forming her new system of discipline, to strive to avoid a habit of petty fault-finding. Many trifles were passed without reproof, many disagreeable habits unnoticed, in the hope and belief that when the great principle of filial obedience was established, its healthy stimulus would naturally produce a better growth.

One evening the children had been impolite to each other while at supper. The mother took no notice. At the study table Anne had her slate and pencil, which Willie wanted. "I will have it," said Willie; "I want it for my sums. I am not going away up to my room for my slate and pencil, while yours is lying here doing nothing."

They both seized the slate and struggled. Anne, being the stronger, gained possession, whereupon Willie struck her. She struck back again. Their mother had observed it all.

"Children," said she, put down the slate, and come to me."

Her voice was deep and sad, but calm and resolved. They did not dare to disobey. Each, however, according to custom, began to accuse the other in very strong terms.

"Be silent," said the mother. Her voice was lower and slower than usual, yet it was obeyed. "Anne, look me in the face, and tell me every circumstance of this quarrel; see that you tell it exactly. Anne felt that she must tell the exact truth, and she did so.

"Willie, now let me hear your account." Willie stated the facts exactly.

"My children," said the mother, "you are both to blame. You both deserve punishment; but I long for the time to come when we need not resort to punishment. Yesterday, for one fault, you forfeited a pleasant ride, which your uncle had offered to give you. Last evening, I was obliged to put you in separate rooms, and sit here alone by myself. This morning you each received five severe strokes upon the hand. It is painful for me to punish you; but this fault must be atoned for. Sit down at opposite sides of the table, and think. See if you cannot devise some way of getting along this time without punishment."

"Mother," said Willie, "I know what you mean; but it is the very worst punishment I could have. Must I ask sister's pardon?"

He looked at Anne, and she at him. He was naturally of a generous disposition, and there was something in his sister's countenance which touched a chord long unused to vibrate.

"Anne," he stammered out, "I do beg your pardon. Will you forgive me? I was most in the wrong."

"I did wrong, too," said Anne.

"Mother, will you forgive us?" said they both, with one impulse.

"I will," said she. "Now go to your lessons."

She was obliged to go to another room to conceal her emotion at this first conquest of her children over themselves; this first-fruits of her new system of training. "Help me, O, help me to persevere!"

And in the prayer with her children, before retiring to rest, she thanked Him for putting good, kind and gentle thoughts into their young hearts; and prayed that this spirit might grow more and more, until Love should "Through all their actions run."

That night, the children looked and lingered, before retiring to rest, as if in want of something; but no kiss, no caress, was offered by their mother, though her heart was yearning for it.

The next day was passed without the call for punishment. The evening was cheerful and happy. When Willie had looked ten minutes in vain to find a certain place in the south of Europe, on the map, his mother came and pointed it out to him, giving him at the same time some interesting particulars of its history and principal manufactures. "Thank you, mother," said Willie: "how much you do know!"

"Anne had a piece of poetry to commit to memory, in which Circe and the Cyclops, and the Syrens were mentioned.

"How many thousand such make-believe beings our books are full of!" exclaimed she. "Where did the stuff all come from? 'Don't you think it all nonsense to study about them, mother?'"

Mrs. Merwyn took the opportunity briefly to explain the ancient mythology. She gave a short account of Homer, repeating Byron's beautiful lines, and afterward a little sketch of Ulysses, as detailed in the Odyssey.

"How interesting!" said Anne. "How I should like to read the Odyssey! After all, though I don't believe a word of these old stories, it must be very pleasant to know all about them; for we are meeting with something or other about them in almost every book we see."

That evening, the children seemed more closely drawn to their mother than ever before. Her steady government, and her newly-discovered stores of information, had raised her wonderfully in the opinion of her children, and their love seemed to keep pace with their respect. And this evening her manner had been so kind, her voice so gentle; she had given up her own occupations to attend to them; she had refused a pleasant invitation in order to pass the evening with them. A good and gentle influence had seemed to settle upon them, tuning their minds to love and harmony. But bed-time came. The children looked wistfully at their mother. At last, Willie said, "Mother, you never kiss us, now. Won't you kiss us to-night?"

"Yes, my children. This has been a happy day to me, because you both have been good children." Upon this, she kissed them fondly.

"Won't you always kiss us, when you think we have been good enough?" said Willie: "and then we shall know what you think about it."

"Yes, I will, Willie."

"Mother," said Anne, "when is father coming home?"

"In a week."

"I thought," said Anne, hesitating, "that fathers always governed the children. Father never governs us."

Mrs. Merwyn took that opportunity to explain to her children how dearly their father loved them, how constantly he exerted himself for their welfare, how worthy he was of their highest respect and love, and how much he would be gratified if they should strive in every way to improve themselves.

The week passed happily away. The children, finding they could gain no end by opposing their own will to the determination of their mother, ceased attempting it, while her judicious praise, whenever they really deserved it, gave them a pleasure so new and sweet as greatly to stimulate their efforts and increase their love.

On the expected evening, just at tea-time, the father came. The room was bright and clean. The fire was blazing. Extra lights burned on the mantle. A little feast was spread upon the table. The lessons had been learned beforehand, and the books put away. The mother had on a handsome new cap, and the children had asked permission to put on their holiday clothes. Mr. Merwyn entered as he had left, with a pale and rather sad countenance. "My dear husband!" said the wife, with a beaming face.

"My dear, dear father!" cried both the children, kissing him.

Willie drew his arm-chair to the fire. Anne took his overcoat and gloves, and carried them to the table. Then she smoothed his hair and brushed the dust from his coat, after which they both stood and waited till he should be warm and ready to go to the table. While at the table they were quiet and polite.

In the evening, the children amused themselves together with joining maps and puzzles, while Mr. Merwyn gave his wife the particulars of his journey. At bed-time, they came to their mother for a kiss, which she gave them. They then somewhat timidly approached their father. "Won't you kiss us, father?" said Anne; "mother says we have been good to-day." The father kissed them with glistening eyes.

When they were gone, he said to his wife, "Helen, how you are changed! How much brighter and happier you look than you did a month ago! and not only that, but you have grown suddenly taller, higher in mind and body. And the children—what has come over them? They are not the children I left; they are good, gentle, well-behaved. How is this?"

Then the wife, amid tears and smiles, poured into the ear of her listening husband the history of a month, her new-born resolutions, her trials, and now her beginnings of success.

"And have you accomplished so much in a month, Helen? It seems impossible."

"I have, to be sure, exerted every power of my nature. I resolved to make a change before your return, if it was in the power of human effort to do it. I trust I have made a beginning. I have discovered affections and capabilities in our children, which I never suspected. My dear husband, let us join together, let us persevere; and who knows but we may yet deserve and enjoy the blessing promised to faithful parents?"

"My Helen, I thought of little else during my long journey. I came home with my mind full of it. I had determined to alter many things in my business and domestic habits, entirely with reference to the best interests of my children, though, I confess, I was not sanguine in the hope of any thorough and radical improvement."

Hours passed, while the husband and wife communed of the future, making resolutions and forming plans to carry out, in the best manner, the reformation in their children, so happily begun.

It would be interesting to trace the steps by which these parents, now thoroughly awakened to a sense of duty, and the importance of the trust committed to their care, gained an influence over their children, which resulted in beautiful developments of character, and, finally, by the blessing of God, in a well-founded hope of happiness in a future life. It would be interesting to trace the progress of self-culture and self-improvement, by which they were enabled to do this; we can only record a brief conversation which took place about a year after the events we have been detailing occurred. Mrs. Weston, the good friend mentioned in the beginning of this story, had for several months been confined to the house by the protracted illness of one of her daughters. Her husband, coming in rather late, one evening, told her that he had been to take tea with the Merwyns.

"And how did you find them?" asked Mrs. Weston. "It is long since I have been able to see them."

"And I," rejoined Mr. Weston, "have kept away from them on purpose. They used to be always in trouble with their children. Their house was a very uncomfortable place."

"Is it better now?"

"Better! you would not know the children; you would scarcely know the parents. In the first place, the children have lost the pale, puny look they used to have; they were blooming with health and overflowing with spirits, yet they were not rude. I watched them. They were kind to each other, polite to me, and obedient to a word or a look from their parents. When I went in they were studying their lessons, which they were anxious to finish before tea. When they were in difficulty they called upon their mother, and she gave them just that degree of help and encouragement which would make them think for and exert themselves. They had as good manners at the table as I ever saw in children. At eight o'clock, a company of young people came in, and I found it was a kind of regular Thursday evening soiree. Charades were acted, games were introduced; Merwyn and his wife occasionally joining, at the request of Annie or Willie, who seemed delighted when father and mother would take a part; mother, especially, was often called upon, and I could see the children's eyes sparkle with pleasure when she guessed right. The children evidently think there is nobody in the world like their mother."

"At ten o'clock, the young people went away. The children came for the good-night kiss, and I heard Willie whisper, as he put his arms round his mother's neck, 'Have I been good, dear mother? Do you love me?' I could not help asking about it. It seems that, about a year ago, they came to a determination to do their duty as parents. Helen says you helped her at the outset. Since that time Merwyn has never once omitted daily prayer. Never once have the children been permitted to disobey with impunity. The modes by which they have induced habits of veracity, of kindness, of self-denial, of politeness, of mental exertion, would be a pattern to most parents. Merwyn does not go to his counting-room after tea; he devotes himself to his family. And once a week, the children's holiday, they all go off to some country place, pick-nicking, flower-gathering, nutting, landscape-hunting, something to improve mind and body. Mrs. Merwyn has almost given up large parties; but she cultivates a circle of pleasant friends, and encourages social visiting. Pray, go to see her, my dear, now Alice is better, and take the children."

"I will, my dear."

"Helen and you will agree exactly. Your notions are alike; but Merwyn is far, far ahead of me. My children love me, but they do not cling to me as Merwyn's do. I have cared for their outward and temporal welfare, but how little have I done for their higher and better interests! The burden has all been thrown upon you. I have not done my part. I am ashamed of myself. I am provoked—"

"Provoked to good works, I hope," said Mrs. Weston, with a kind smile. "That is the way friends should provoke each other. I am delighted with what you tell me, and I also will become a learner. It is never too late to improve. If parents generally would follow the example of these Merwyns, if they would with prayer and resolution act to reform their children, instead of repining and wrongfully accusing Providence, a blessing would fall upon their homes and their hearts. There would be light in their dwellings. Instead of the spirit of heaviness there would be joy and peace; and, at the last, they would hear the joyful words, 'Well done, good and faithful servant!'"—Ladies' Album and Family Manual.

ANECDOTES OF BIRDS.

We select from Francis C. Woodworth's entertaining volume, "Stories about Birds," the following anecdotes:—

Jesse, in his "Tales of Animal Instinct," mentions a singular proof of the robin's love for its young. "A gentleman," he says, "in my neighborhood, had directed one of his wagons to be packed with sundry boxes, intending to go with it to Worthing, a place at some distance from his residence. For some time, his going was delayed, and he directed that the wagon should be placed in a shed in his yard, packed as it was, till it should be convenient to him to send it off. In the mean time, a pair of robins built their nest among the straw in the wagon, and had hatched their young before it was sent away. One of the old birds, instead of being frightened away by the motion of the wagon, only left its nest occasionally, for the purpose of flying to the nearest hedge for food for its young; and thus, alternately affording warmth and nourishment to them, it arrived at Worthing. The affection of this bird having been observed by the wagoner, he took care, in unloading, not to disturb the robin's nest; so that the robin and its young returned in safety to Walton Heath, the place whence they were taken. The distance the wagon went, in going and returning, could not have been less than one hundred miles."

A friend of mine, whom I met in the city of Washington, some two years since, and who is a very close observer of the lower animals, related to me the following anecdote: "Six or eight years ago," said he, "I was passing the mouth of an alley leading into a vacant lot, when my attention was drawn to a group of very young children, laughing vociferously. I entered the alley, to see the cause of their mirth, and soon ascertained it to be a large white goose, with a narrow strip of tin bent into a hoop, and thrown over the head of the fowl, by one of the urchins. The poor goose seemed much annoyed by the shining necklace, and ran about, in every direction, trying to shake it off. I found that it was the sight of these antics, which had so much amused the little ragged juveniles. I stopped to see if the goose would unyoke herself; and, while watching her, I observed some ducks in another part of the yard; and very soon a drake from among them made a great quacking, and started off toward the embarrassed goose. When near, the latter stretched her neck out horizontally, and, to my very great astonishment and admiration, the drake seized the lower part of the tin collar in his beak, the goose withdrew her head from it, and the drake immediately dropped it upon the ground; when the air rang with the plaudits of the children and the gabbling of the fowls."

A gentleman of veracity, who recently collected a number of different specimens of the humming bird in Mexico, tells an interesting story about the manner in which birds, belonging to one of the smallest of this family, were in the habit of catching the flies that had got entangled in a spider's web. "The house I resided in for several weeks," he says, "was only a story high, enclosing, like most of the Spanish houses, a small garden in the centre, the roof projecting some six or seven feet from the walls, covering a walk all round, and having a small space only between the tiles and the trees which grew in the centre. From the edges of these tiles to the branches of the trees in the garden, multitudes of spiders had spread their webs, so closely and compactly that they resembled one vast net. I frequently watched, with much amusement, the cautious manœuvres of the humming bird, who, advancing under the web, entered the various cells in search of flies. As the larger spiders did not tamely surrender their prey, the thief was often compelled to retreat. Being within a few feet of the parties, I could notice distinctly all they did. The active little bird generally passed once or twice round the court, as if to reconnoitre his ground, and then commenced his attacks by going carefully under the nets of the wily insect, and seizing, by surprise, the smallest or feeblest of the flies that were entangled in the web. In ascending the traps of the spider, great care and skill were required. Sometimes he had scarcely room for his little wings to perform their office, and the least deviation would have entangled him in the machinery of the web, and caused his ruin. It was only the works of the smaller spider that he dare attack, as the largest rose to the defence of their citadels, when the cunning enemy would shoot off like a sunbeam, and could only be traced by his shining colors. The bird usually spent about ten minutes at a time, in this enterprise, after which he would always alight on a tree near by, and rest himself awhile."

It seems that the snow bird is a very affectionate little creature. Some years ago, one of them flew into a house, where, finding itself quite welcome, it remained over night. By accident, however, it was killed; and, in the morning, one of the servants threw it into the yard. In the course of the day, one of the family witnessed a most affecting scene in connection with the dead body. Its mate was standing beside it, mourning its loss. It placed its bill below the head of its companion, raised it up, and again warbled its song of mourning. By and by, it flew away, and returned with a grain or two of wheat, which it dropped before its dead partner. Then it fluttered its wings, and endeavored to call the attention of the dead bird to the food. Again it flew away, again it returned, and used the same efforts as before. At last, it took up a kernel of the wheat, and dropped it into the mouth of the dead bird. This was repeated several times. Then the poor bereaved one sang in the same plaintive strain as before. But the scene was too affecting for the lady who witnessed it. She could bear the sight no longer, and turned away. I always loved the snow bird; but I have loved him more than ever since I heard this story.

That ardent admirer of nature, Mrs. Child, tells a pretty anecdote about a family of swallows which she was acquainted with. "Two barn swallows," she says, "came into our wood-shed in the spring-time. Their busy, earnest twitterings, led me at once to suspect they were looking out a building spot; but as a carpenter's bench was under the window, and very frequently hammering, sawing, and planing were going on, I had little hope that they would choose a location under our roof. To my surprise, however, they soon began to build in the crotch of a beam over the open door-way. I was delighted, and spent more time watching than 'penny-wise' people would have approved. It was, in fact, a beautiful little drama of domestic love. The mother bird was so busy, and so important; and her mate was so attentive! Never did any newly-married couple take more satisfaction with their first nicely arranged drawer of baby clothes, than they did in fashioning their little woven cradle.

"The father bird scarcely ever left the side of the nest. There he was all day long, twittering in tones that were most obviously the outpourings of love. Sometimes he would bring in a straw, or hair, to be interwoven in the previous little fabric. One day, my attention was arrested by a very unusual twittering, and I saw him circling round, with a large downy feather in his bill. He bent over the unfinished nest, and offered it to his mate with the most graceful and loving air imaginable; and when she put up her mouth to take it, he poured forth such a gust of gladsome sound! It seems as if pride and affection had swelled his heart till it was almost too big for his little bosom.

"When the young became old enough to fly, anybody would have laughed to watch the manoeuvres of the parents! Such a chirping and twittering! Such diving down from the nest, and flying up again! Such wheeling round in circles, talking to the young ones all the while! Such clinging to the sides of the shed with their sharp claws, to show the timid little fledglings that there was no need of falling! For three days all this was carried on with increasing activity. It was obviously an infant flying school. But all their talking and fussing was of no avail. The little things looked down, then looked up, but alarmed at the infinity of space, sunk down into the nest again. At length, the parents grew impatient, and summoned their neighbors. As I was picking up chips one day, I found my head encircled by a swarm of swallows. They flew up to the nest, and jabbered away to the young ones; they clung to the walls, looking back to tell how the thing was done; they dived, and wheeled, and balanced, and floated in a manner perfectly beautiful to behold. The pupils were evidently much excited. They jumped on the edge of the nest, and twittered, and shook their feathers, and waved their wings, and then hopped back again, saying, 'It's pretty sport, but we can't do it.' Three times the neighbors came and repeated their graceful lesson. The third time, two of the young birds gave a sudden plunge downward, and then fluttered and hopped till they lighted on a small upright log. And oh, such praises as were warbled by the whole troop! The air was filled with their joy! Some were flying around, swift as a ray of light; others were perched on the hoe handle, and the teeth of the rake; multitudes clung to the wall, after the fashion of their pretty kind, and two were swinging, in most graceful style, on a pendent hoop. Never, while memory lasts, shall I forget the swallow party."

Great stories are told about the nest-building of the orchard starling. Wilson, who, all must admit, is pretty good authority in matters of this kind, gives a very particular account of the way in which the nest is put together. He says the bird commonly hangs its nest from the twigs of an apple tree. The outside is made of a particular kind of long, tough grass, that will bend without breaking; and this grass is knit or sewed through and through in a thousand directions, just as if done with a needle. The little creature does it with its feet and bill. Mr. Wilson says that he one day showed one of these nests to an old lady, and she was so much struck with the work, that she asked him, half in earnest, if he did not think that these birds could be taught to darn stockings? Mr. Wilson took the pains, too, to draw out one of these grass threads, and found that it measured thirteen inches, and in that distance the bird who used it had passed it in and out thirty-four times.

The following anecdote I relate on the authority of Wilson:—"A box," he says, "fitted up in the window of the room where I slept, was taken possession of by a pair of wrens. Already the nest was built, and two eggs laid; when, one day, the window being open, as well as the door, the female wren, venturing too far into the room, was sprung upon by the cat, and destroyed. Curious to know how the surviving wren would act in the circumstances, I watched him carefully for several days. At first, he sang with great spirit. This continued for an hour or two. After this, becoming uneasy, he went off for an hour. On his return, he chanted again, as before, and went to the top of the house, stable and weeping willow, so that his mate would hear him; but seeing nothing of her, he returned once more, visited the nest, ventured cautiously into the window, gazed about with suspicious looks, his voice sinking into a low, sad tone, as he stretched his neck in every direction. Returning to the box, he seemed for some minutes quite at a loss what to do, and soon went off, as I thought, altogether, for I saw no more of him that day. Toward the afternoon of the second day, he again made his appearance, in company with another female, who seemed exceedingly shy, and, though not until after a great deal of hesitation, entered the box. At this moment, the little widower seemed as if he would warble his very life out with joy. They afterward raised a brood of seven young ones, all of whom left the nest, at the proper time, in safety."

A laughable story of some carrier pigeons is told in an Antwerp newspaper. The editor of a celebrated journal, published in that city, sent a reporter to Brussels for the king's speech, and with him a couple of carrier pigeons, to take back the document. At Brussels, he gave the pigeons in charge to a waiter, and called for breakfast. He was kept waiting for some time, but a very delicious fricassée atoned for the delay. After breakfast, he paid his bill, and called for his carrier pigeons. "Pigeons!" exclaimed the waiter, "why you've eaten them!"

HOME LIGHTS AND HOME SHADOWS.

"What a quiet man Mr. Mason is, and what nice children he has; I never hear any noise when I go there."

What strange notions people have of nice, quiet people, thought I, as I heard the foregoing observation from a man, whose kindly disposition and cheerful face were a perfect preventive of the quiet, nice order that reigned in Mr. Mason's house. When he came home, the cheerful smile on his lip, the kind inquiry, or some pleasantly related piece of news, set all the lips to smiling and all the tongues to talking around his table, and the very noise he seemed to have deprecated, was the music to which his life was happily gliding on, of which he himself was the key-note—a perfect contrast to the gloomy order that reigned in the house of the quiet Mr. Mason.

I will give you a short sketch of this gentleman. He was, in the estimation of the world, and his own, also, one of the best of men. By careful industry, he had acquired some property, among which was a nice dwelling, wherein his mother, himself, and only sister lived. As his means increased, he furnished it very nicely. His mother was very industrious, and his sister very tasty; and many inventions of their needles gave an air of elegance, to what, in other hands, would have appeared plain. In the course of time, the mother died. I forgot to say, that, although Mr. Mason was always spoken of as one of the best of sons and brothers, the family always appeared uneasy until his opinion of what they may have done, was known. When it was asked if he did not disapprove, they inferred it pleased him, for "he was one that never praised." "It will do well enough," was the warmest encomium he ever used. The brother and sister were left together. Poor girl! her mother had been her only companion—her brother had never seemed to care for society. Of a warm, cheerful temper, and with ardent affections, her whole heart now turned to her brother; and he, tender from grief for the loss of his mother, seemed to throw off for awhile, that cold quietness, that is more depressing to an affectionate disposition than active unkindness. When he came home, he would tell her of some of the doings of the world in which he mixed, and of which she only knew the exterior. Again the color came to her cheek, and her buoyant laugh had something like the merry ring it used to have in her mother's lifetime. Occasionally it appeared to startle her brother; but he thought of the many hours she had been alone, and he could not find it in his heart to reprove her.

But soon the old habit of fault-finding returned. Anything that did not exactly suit him, was sure to render him cold and silent; and often a meal passed without anything but monosyllables. If she would try to entertain him with any little incident that came under her observation, "he took no interest in such trifles." Her joyous laugh was repressed with the observation—"That it was too boisterous, the neighbors would hear her." The house was soon quiet enough after that. Alone, without any one to speak to, while her brother was at his business, you would not have known when he was home, from any signs of life that were about the house.

I loved Betty Mason, and could not help pitying the orphan girl, for I knew how truly her mother had been "all the world to her;" and often took my sewing and went in to sit with her. I knew she was devotedly attached to her brother, and therefore did not think it strange she should be so anxious that everything she did should please him. But one thing puzzled me, and that was, that she appeared to be far more cheerful for two or three months after her mother's death, than afterwards. She appeared more depressed, and complained more of her loss, when from the time that had elapsed, she would have become reconciled to it. I soon penetrated the secret, for I found, that in her brother's presence she was not the same impulsive, warm being, but acted with a precision and quietness that was not natural to her character; and, when on the plea that she thought she ought not to be a burden to her brother, she told me she was going to accept a situation in a fine school, I admired the good sense and independence of my friend.

I asked her brother what he thought of Betty's plan. He said he "saw no necessity for her doing anything for a living; but she was her own mistress; she could do what she pleased." My cheeks burned at the cold indifference of this speech. I knew that with one quarter the physical, and only healthful mental exertion, she was going to obtain a genteel independence. She would be absent from home from Monday till Friday. She left the house in the charge of a good servant, and once a week gave it a good regulating. She soon recovered the tone of her spirits; and her brother, who really missed her presence, was too glad of her weekly return, to find fault with her now buoyant spirits, for, like most persons of a peevish, fault-finding disposition, he was rather wavering; and her decision of character, now fully developed by intercourse with the world, and a sense of independence, overruled his foolish notions, and compelled him to be happier than he ever was.

But such a girl as Betty Mason was not born to "blush unseen;" and a fine man of congenial character sought and won her. George Edgar it was, who, at the beginning of our story, had just returned from a visit to his quiet brother-in-law's, and was so much admiring the quietness of his household.

After Betty's marriage, Edward Mason had married a gentle, timid girl, and thought he would be very happy; but his querulous disposition, and the habit of irritability at the slightest thing that did not please him; and worse than all, omitting to commend anything, no matter how great an effort had been made by his wife to consult his taste and conform to his wishes, depressed the timid creature by his side into ill-health. His children were sickly, quiet little things, without energy enough for a hearty laugh or health-giving romp; and he was constantly fretting about doctor's bills and medicine, and telling his friends how much more fortunate they were, than he had been with his children; never suspecting that he poisoned the spring of his own happiness at the source.

Why did he not show a cheerful face to his wife and warm her heart with a sense of duty fulfilled, instead of grudging the slightest word of praise? Why did he repress the joyous laugh of childhood, and make his house so quiet and dull, that one always felt, on leaving, as if just escaped from a sick chamber.

O, give me the man that will smile a warm, genial, heartfelt-smile when I please him, even though he frown when I don't; and keep me far from the one that "will never praise."

PARLOR MAGIC.

TO RENDER BODIES LUMINOUS IN THE DARK, SO AS TO GIVE A SUFFICIENT LIGHT TO SHOW THE HOUR ON THE DIAL OF A WATCH AT NIGHT.—If a four or six ounce phial, containing a few ounces of liquid phosphorus, be unstopped in darkness, the vacuum space in the bottle emits a sufficient light for showing the hour of the night, by holding a pocket watch near it. When the phial is again corked, the light vanishes, but reappears instantly on opening it. In cold weather it is necessary to warm the bottle in the hand before the stopper is removed; without this precaution it will not emit light. Liquid phosphorus may likewise be used for forming luminous writings, or drawings; it may be smeared on the face or hands, or any warm object, to render it luminous; and this is in nowise hazardous.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE PRODUCTION OF GAS-LIGHTS.—To imitate in miniature the production of gas-lights, put common coal into the bowl of a tobacco-pipe; cover the coal closely with clay, made into a stiff lute, or paste, with water; and when the clay is dry, put the bowl of the pipe into the fire, and heat it gradually. In a few minutes a stream of carburetted hydrogen gas will issue from the end of the tobacco-pipe, accompanied with an aqueous fluid, and a tenacious oil or tar. The gas may be set fire to with a candle, and will burn with a bright flame. When no more gas is disengaged, there will be found in the bowl of the pipe the coal, deprived of its bituminous matter, or coke.

TO PROVE THAT SUGAR IS A COMPOUND OF CHARCOAL AND WATER.—Place about half an ounce of powdered white sugar in a glass tumbler, then pour upon it as much strong oil of vitriol (sulphuric acid) as will cover it, and stir the mixture with a piece of wood, or a glass rod. In a minute or so the sugar will blacken; the mixture will become hot; steam (that is, water) will be evolved, and charcoal be deposited in the glass. This "sweet experiment" is an apt illustration of the simplicity of composition of organic substances produced by plants. Sugar, starch, and gum, produce similar effects when treated in the same manner; they are, in fact, all compounds of charcoal and water, in different proportions.

TO EAT A PECK OF PAPER SHAVINGS, AND CONVERT THEM INTO RIBBON.—Shouts of laughter generally arise from the audience while the magician "stows away" down his bottomless throat the heaps of paper before him; but when he "brings up" yards upon yards of ribbon, as a proof of his bad digestion, the "splitting sides burst with applause." This, like all the best illusions, is exceedingly simple; but, to carry it off well, requires a little gesticulation and comic spirit in the Illusionist. Procure fifteen separate yards of different colored ribbon, of that width as is sold at a penny a yard, sew them together to form one length, joining the contrasting colors; then roll it up neatly round itself, and it will be about the size of four half-crowns put together. Now obtain two penny worth of white paper shavings from a bookbinder; shake them up lightly, and they will look like a bushel. When you begin the trick, take the roll of ribbon in the left hand, which with a few shavings is effectually hidden, then "set to" and eat your paper; as you feed, by pretending to thrust an extra handful down the throat from time to time, you can easily manage to withdraw the masticated portions unseen and carry them down to the ground, as you lift other "tit bits" to the mouth. After this has continued long enough, that is, when your visitors have laughed "till their sides ache," the shavings are now and then pressed up, which gives the appearance of diminished quantity; finally a last effort is made "to finish it," and you then pop the roll of ribbon in the mouth, and throwing the remaining shavings on the floor, you take hold of the end of the ribbon, and begin to unwind it; by drawing it gradually from the mouth it will appear as though it came from the stomach; the teeth must be kept close enough to prevent the entire roll from being pulled out all together. When cleverly performed, this trick is one of the best pieces of fun which the magician exhibits.

Dickens, in "Bleak House," aptly designates pawnbrokers' duplicates as "turnpike tickets on the road to poverty."

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

Under guise of the following little story, the Trenton True American teaches a most valuable lesson to housekeepers and young beginners in life:—Mr. Bones, of the firm of Fossil, Bones & Co., was one of those remarkable money-making men, whose uninterrupted success in trade had been the wonder, and afforded the material for the gossip of the town for seven years. Being of a familiar turn of mind, he was frequently interrogated on the subject, and invariably gave as the secret of his success, that he minded his own business.

A gentleman met Mr. Bones on the Assanpink bridge. He was gazing intently on the dashing, foaming waters as they fell over the dam. He was evidently in a brown study. Our friend ventured to disturb his cogitations.

"Mr. Bones, tell me how to make a thousand dollars."

Mr. Bones continued looking intently at the water. At last he ventured a reply.

"Do you see that dam, my friend?"

"I certainly do."

"Well, here you may learn the secret of making money. That water would waste away and be of no practical use to anybody but for the dam. That dam turns it to good account, makes it perform some useful purpose, and then suffers it to pass along. That large paper-mill is kept in constant motion by this simple economy. Many mouths are fed in the manufacture of the article of paper, and intelligence is scattered broadcast over the land on the sheets that are daily turned out; and in the different processes through which it passes, money is made. So it is in the living of hundreds of people. They get enough money. It passes through their hands every day, and at the year's end they are no better off. What's the reason? They want a dam. Their expenditures are increasing, and no practical good is attained. They want them dammed up, so that nothing will pass through their hands without bringing something back—without accomplishing some useful purpose. Dam up your expenses, and you'll soon have enough occasionally to spare a little, just like that dam. Look at it, my friend!"

A gentleman of the name of Lowe, having got Dr. Johnson to write a letter for him, was on the point of taking his leave, when Boswell, who had come in while the Doctor was writing the letter, followed Mr. Lowe out. "Nothing," says Mr. Lowe, "could surprise me more. Till that moment, he had so entirely overlooked me, that I did not imagine he knew there was such a creature in existence, and he now accosted me with the most overstrained and insinuating compliments possible. 'How do you do, Mr. Lowe? I hope you are very well, Mr. Lowe. Pardon my freedom, Mr. Lowe, but I think I saw my dear friend, Dr. Johnson, writing a letter for you.' 'Yes, sir.' 'I hope you will not think me rude; but if it will not be too great a favor, you would infinitely oblige me if you would just let me have a sight of it; everything from that hand, you know, is inestimable.' 'Sir, it is my own private affairs, but——' 'I would not pry into a person's affairs, my dear

Mr. Lowe, by any means; I am sure you would not accuse me of such a thing; only if it were no particular secret——' 'Sir, you are welcome to read the letter.' 'I thank you, my dear Mr. Lowe, you are very obliging, I take it exceedingly kind.' Having read,—'It is nothing, I believe, Mr. Lowe, that you should be ashamed of.' 'Certainly not.' 'Why then, my dear sir, if you would do me another favor, you render the obligation eternal. If you would but step to Peele's Coffee-house with me, and just suffer me to take a copy of it, I would do anything in my power to oblige you.' I was overcome, (said Lowe,) by this sudden familiarity and condescension, accompanied with bows and grimaces. I had no power to refuse; we went to the coffee-house, my letter was presently transcribed, and as soon as he had put the document in his pocket, Mr. Boswell walked away, as erect and as proud as he was half an hour before, and I ever afterwards was unnoticed; nay, I am not certain, (added he, sarcastically,) whether the Scotsman did not leave me, poor as he knew I was, to pay for my own dish of coffee."

The vanity of Pope Julius II. had prompted him to order Michael Angelo to give him a design for his tomb; which that great artist made upon so grand a scale, that the choir of old St. Peter's Church could not contain it. "Well, then," replied the Pope, "enlarge the choir." "Ay, holy father, but we must then build a new church, to keep up the due proportion between the different parts of the edifice." "That we will then do," replied the pope; and immediately gave orders for the sale of indulgences to carry on the erection of this noble fabric.

Some of the figures intended for the pope's mausoleum; the famous figure of Moses sitting in St. Pietro da Vinculi at Rome; and two or three of the slaves at the Hotel de Richelieu in Paris, are preserved. The original design of the tomb is engraved in Vasari; it has much of stately Gothic grandeur in it, and was to have been decorated with thirty-two whole length figures of prophets and apostles.

Late letters from Constantinople relate an anecdote of the Sultan, which is quite worthy of the "Arabian Nights." A rich Armenian had lost a portfolio, containing four hundred thousand piastres, and for which he offered a reward of forty thousand. The portfolio was found, and the reward claimed by a very honest and poor old man; but the Armenian, in order to escape payment, then declared that the portfolio also contained a very valuable ring, which the old man must have stolen. The affair was brought before the Sultan, who, having ascertained the honesty of the old man, and the well-known avarice of his adversary, decided that, as the Armenian declared that his portfolio contained a ring, this could not be the one he had lost, and that he had better return it to the old man, and continue to advertise for his own!

The Yankees assert that all their children are born geniuses, and to verify this, they say that when a baby is not sleeping or eating, it is rolling its eyes about, thinking how to improve its cradle.

ELOQUENCE OF THE PASSIONS.—Cromwell was one day engaged in a warm argument with a lady on the subject of oratory, in which she maintained that eloquence could only be acquired by those who made it their study in early youth, and their practice afterwards. The lord protector, on the contrary, maintained that there was an eloquence which sprang from the heart; since, when that was deeply interested in the attainment of any object, it never failed to supply a fluency and richness of expression, which would, in the comparison, render vapid the studied speeches of the most celebrated orators. It happened, some days after, that this lady was thrown into a state bordering on distraction, by the arrest and imprisonment of her husband, who was conducted to the Tower as a traitor to the government. The agonized wife flew to the lord protector, rushed through his guards, threw herself at his feet, and, with the most pathetic eloquence, pleaded for the life and innocence of her injured husband. His highness maintained a severe brow, till the petitioner, overpowered by the excess of her feelings, and the energy with which she had expressed them, paused; then his stern countenance relaxed into a smile, and, extending to her an order for the immediate liberation of her husband, he said, "I think all who have witnessed this scene will vote on my side of the question, in a dispute between us the other day, that the eloquence of the heart is far above that mechanically acquired by study."

MRS. SIDDONS AND THE BAS BLEU!—At the time when Mrs. Siddons had just reached her high theatrical fame, and had acted some of her principal characters to the admiration of all who had beheld her, a formal assembly of learned ladies, consisting of Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Carter, Miss Hannah More, and sundry other members of the bas bleu, met, and prevailed upon Mrs. Siddons to be of the party. The object was to examine her, and to get from her the secret how she could act with such wonderful effect. Mrs. Montague was deputed to be the prolocutress of this female convocation. "Pray, madam," said she to Mrs. Siddons, addressing her in the most formal manner, "give me leave to interrogate you, and to request that you will tell us, without duplicity or mental reservation, upon what principle you conduct your dramatic demeanor. Is your mode of acting, by which you obtain so much celebrity, the result of certain studied principles of art? Have you investigated, with profound research, the rules of elocution and gesture, as laid down by the ancients and moderns, and reduced them to practice? or do you suffer nature to predominate, and only speak the untutored language of the passions?"

"Ladies," said the modern Thalia, with great diffidence, but without hesitation, "I do not know how to answer so learned a speech; all I know of the matter, and all I can tell you, is, that I always act as well as I can."

watch-chain suspended from a bullet in his fob. Having the curiosity to investigate the fact, he walked purposely by him, one morning, and said, "Why, corporal, you are a brave fellow to have saved enough to buy a watch." "Sire," said the corporal, "I flatter myself I am brave, but as for my watch it is of little signification." Pulling out his splendid gold watch, the king continued: "By my time-piece it is five; what is it by yours?" The corporal pulling out his bullet with a trembling hand, replied: "My watch tells me neither five nor six; but shows me clearly that I must be ready at any time to die for your majesty." A smile lighted up the unusually stern countenance of the king. "Keep, then, your time-piece," said he, "since it reminds you of your duty; and accept mine also," throwing the chain over his neck, "in token that your king appreciates and can reward the loyalty and devotion of a gallant soldier."

WELL-TIMED SPEECH BY A MECHANIC.—At the time when Sir Richard Steele was preparing his great room in York Buildings for public orations, he happened to be pretty much behindhand in his payments to the workmen; and coming one day among them to see what progress they made, he ordered the carpenter to get into the rostrum and make a speech, that he might observe how it could be heard. The fellow mounted, and scratching his poll, told Sir Richard that he knew not what to say, for he was no orator. "O," cries the knight, "no matter for that; speak anything that comes uppermost." "Why, then, Sir Richard," says the fellow, "here we have been working for your honor these six months, and cannot get one penny of money. Pray, sir, when do you design to pay us?" "Very well, very well," said Sir Richard, "pray come down. I have heard quite enough. I cannot but own you speak very distinctly, though I don't much admire your subject."

BURNS AND THE SICK LADY.—Burns called to see a young lady who was rather indisposed. "Well, Jessie," said he, "how do you do to-day?" "Very poorly; Mr. Burns, I want you to write my epitaph." "O, you are not likely to die yet, Jessie." "Well, be it as it may, you must write my epitaph." Getting the pen, ink, and paper, at the time, he then penned these lines:—

"Say, sage, where's the charm on earth
Can turn death's dart aside?
It is not purity or worth—Else Jessie had not died."

CLEARNESS AND DISTINCTNESS OF SPEECH.—Mr. Jones, in his Life of Bishop Horne, speaking of Dr. Hinchcliffe, Bishop of Peterborough, says, that in the pulpit he spoke with the accent of a man of sense, such as he really was in the superior degree; but it was remarkable, and, to those who did not know the cause, mysterious, that there was not a corner of the church in which he could not be heard distinctly. The reason which Mr. Jones assigned was, that he made it an invariable rule to do justice to every consonant, knowing that the vowels would speak for themselves. And thus he became the surer and clearest of speakers; his elocution was perfect, and never disappointed his audience.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

The best cough drop for young ladies is to drop the practice of dressing thin, when they go into the night air.

The newspapers are full of advertisements for plain cooks. We suppose pretty cooks have no occasion to advertise at all.

"No pains will be spared," as the quack said, when sawing off a poor fellow's leg to cure him of the rheumatism!

Punch desires to know "if figs are sold at sixpence a pound by the drum, how should they be sold by the trumpet?"

A young gentleman of Detroit, who has of late been much afflicted by palpitation of the heart, says he found considerable relief by pressing another palpitating heart to his bosom.

A barber, in New York city, has erected a sign bearing the following words: "George Washington Jones, Physiognomic Operator, and Professor of the Tonsorial Art."

"Papa, what is that picture over the mantel-piece?" The vain father answered, "Why that's papa's arms, my darling!" "Then, why don't you have your legs put up, too?" was the reply.

A shoemaker, with one eye, who works in this neighborhood, complained that one of his lamps did not burn. One of his shopmates, who is a genuine son of the Emerald Isle, with astonishment, exclaimed, "Faith, and what do you want of two lamps? Ye haven't but one eye!"

When the merchants of Breslau once applied to Frederick the Great for "protection" against the ruinous competition of Jewish dealers, the monarch asked how the Jews managed to draw business into their hands. The answer was that they were up early and late, always travelling about, lived very economically, and were contented with small gains on rapid returns. "Very well," said the enlightened monarch, "go and be Jews, too, in the conduct of your business."

A city miss, newly installed as the wife of a farmer, was one day called upon by a neighbor of the same profession, who, in the absence of her husband, asked her for the loan of his plough for a short time. "I am sure you would be accommodated," was the reply, "if Mr. Stone was only at home—I do not know, though, where he keeps his plough; but," she added, evidently zealous to serve, "there is the cart in the yard—couldn't you plough with that till Mr. Stone gets back?"

"I was travelling," says M. Blaze, "in a diligence. At the place where we changed horses, I saw a good-looking poodle dog (chien caniche), which came to the coach door, and sat upon its two hind legs, with the air of one begging for something. 'Give him a sou,' said the postilion to me, 'and you will see what he will do with it.' I threw to him the coin; he picked it up, ran to the baker's, and brought back a piece of bread, which he ate. The dog had belonged to a poor blind man, lately dead; he had no master, and begged alms on his own account."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

The more we help others to bear their burdens, the lighter our own will be.

Surely some people must know themselves; they never think about anything else.

Nobody ever sees an action as very wrong when under the excitement of doing it.

Love is like honesty—much talked about, and but little understood.

Habit uniformly and constantly strengthens all our active exertions.

He who says there is no such thing as an honest man, you may be sure is himself a knave.

If you would not have affliction to visit you twice, listen at once to what it teaches.

Time past is contracted into a point, and that the infancy of being. Time to come is seen expanding into eternal existence.

Pain, poverty, or infamy, are the natural products of vicious and imprudent acts; as the contrary blessings are of good ones.

Medical writers all agree that gluttony conducts more people to the grave than drunkenness. The old adage is true, that "many people dig their graves with their teeth."

Sir Walter Scott and Daniel O'Connell, at a late period of their lives, ascribed their success in the world principally to their wives. Were the truth known, theirs is the history of thousands.

If you would relish your food, labor for it; if you would enjoy the raiment, pay for it before you wear it; if you would sleep soundly, take a clear conscience to bed with you.

Fine sensibilities are like woodbines, delightful luxuries of beauty to twine round a solid, upright stem of understanding; but very poor things if they are left to creep along the ground.

We see so darkly into futurity, we never know when we have real cause to rejoice or lament. The worst appearances have often happy consequences, as the best lead many times unto the greatest misfortunes.

There is a large and fertile space in every life, in which might be planted the oaks and fruit trees of enlightened principle and virtuous habit, which, growing up, would yield to old age an enjoyment, a glory and a shade.

With a double vigilance should we watch our actions, when we reflect that good and bad ones are never childless; and that, in both cases, the offspring goes beyond the parent—every good begetting a better, every bad a worse.

There is a sacredness in tears. They are not the mark of weakness, but of power! They speak more eloquently than ten thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition, and of unspeakable love.

What a serious matter our life is!—how unworthy and stupid it is to trifle it away without heed! What a wretched, insignificant, worthless creature any one comes to be who does not as soon as possible lend his whole strength, as in stringing a stiff bow, to doing whatever task lies first before him!

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

A WORD WITH THE READER.

The "Home Magazine," of which you have here the first number, will present certain features and attractions not fully possessed by any of our many excellent monthly publications. Its name implies its character. For all tastes the editor will not attempt to cater; but, for the thousands and tens of thousands who love what is good and true and beautiful; who have an interest in all that is genial in humanity; who, like the wise bee, are ever seeking to gather the honey of life as they walk steadily and hopefully onward; the "Home Magazine" will come, we trust, as a valued friend and pleasant visitor, and leave the minds of all who read it refreshed and strengthened.

We offer our readers no meagre feast. In our eighty large and closely printed pages will be found an amount and variety of reading, in kind and quality not, we believe, to be obtained any where else for the same money.

And now, with this brief greeting, we leave our Magazine with you, trusting that you will find it fully equal to your expectations.

A correspondent of the New York Musical World, who says that he has looked over the account current of Barnum with Jenny Lind, avers, that it is a most "remarkable document," and ought to be published "for the astonishment and edification of the world generally, and singers particularly." According to his statement, Barnum and Jenny averaged over $3000 a-piece on each concert. After all expenses were paid, Barnum received on the whole engagement, the handsome sum of $308,000, and the Nightingale $302,000. This was coining sweet sounds into gold at a rate unheard of before. Large as the sum paid for these concerts, we presume there are few who had the pleasure of listening to Jenny Lind who now consider the money they paid for the privilege, a foolish expenditure. Her wonderful tones, that seemed, at times, like echoes of heavenly music, still linger, and will linger through life, in the ears of thousands. Like "a thing of beauty," such sounds are "a joy forever."

Miss Harriet Hosmer, a young woman of 20 years of age, residing at Watertown, Mass., has, it is said, recently produced a piece of sculpture in marble, which evinces talent of a high order, and promises to render her prominent as an artist. She calls the bust which she has completed, "Hesper, the Evening Star." It has the face of a lover-maiden gently falling asleep with the sound of distant music. Her hair is gracefully arranged and intertwined with capsules of the poppy. A star shines on her forehead, and under her breast lies the crescent moon. The conception of the subject of the whole work was her own, men having been employed only to chop off some of the large pieces of marble, as the work was in progress. The bust is exhibited in Boston. Miss Hosmer proposes to visit Rome for a few years, with a view of becoming a sculptor by profession.

Madame Sontag arrived in New York on Sunday, 5th inst., in the steamer Arctic. Sontag, or the Countess Rossi, stands unrivalled as a singer, in the exquisite taste and originality of her style. She closed her dramatic career in 1830, but her husband having lost his property in the revolution of 1848, she returned to the public practice of her art (in concerts only) to retrieve his pecuniary disasters. All who have heard her in Europe, agree, that little or no change in her brilliant vocalization has taken place since her retirement from the position of a public singer, more than twenty years ago. Lowell Mason, who heard her in Berlin, speaks of her singing in terms of unqualified praise. She comes to us, a fit successor to Jenny Lind, though she cannot rob the fair Swede of a single laurel. Both are pre-eminent—comperees, not rivals. They are the queens of song. As a woman, Madame Sontag stands before the world without a blemish. In all domestic virtues, her fame is spotless.

It is stated in the Musical World, that Messrs. Hall & Son, of New York, pay to William Vincent Wallace, the sum of one hundred dollars for every original composition or arrangement he furnishes them, of whatever kind or length;—even if it be only a two-page polka, the sum is paid. At this high rate, the Messrs. Hall have a contract for ten years, and if Mr. Wallace is as prolific in the future as he has been in the past, he will receive in that time, it is estimated, over one hundred thousand dollars. For this contract, the publishers have refused fifty thousand dollars. From his London and Paris publishers, Mr. Wallace receives, it is stated, more than twice as much as he gets from Messrs. Hall & Son—in all about six hundred dollars for each composition. This is adding up figures pretty rapidly; and it may be all so: but it is not strange if there should arise in the mind a doubt as to the accuracy of some of the figures given.

"On Friday evening last," says Lowell Mason, writing from Paris to the editor of the New York Musical Review, "we attended the regular service at the Jewish synagogue. There was a congregation of perhaps three hundred men, occupying the lower part of the house, and a few scattering women were seen in the gallery. The men all sit or stand with heads covered; and although four of us, Americans, took off our hats when we entered, we were told to put them on again, and obeyed orders. There was very little appearance of reverence or solemnity; indeed, none that could be observed. The appearance of the assembly was somewhat like that of a New England town meeting, after having been called to order by the chairman. There was a choir of about twelve or fourteen boys, with men for tenor and bass, and the harmony parts were sung. All the service was chanted, in a responsive manner, by priest or priests, choir and people, with the exception of two airs or melodies, which were sung by the choir. These were both modern, and even the chants did not seem to come from David or Solomon, but were more like the common chant, somewhat modified by a kind of recitative or declamatory manner of utterance. On the whole, the Jewish service here was not one of much interest, considered either religiously or musically."

A writer from San Francisco says:—"Theatricals are at a low ebb in this country. In this city, especially, the public have become remarkably indifferent in respect to dramatic performances. This is owing, in a great measure, as well to the inferior character of the companies that have played, as to the high prices of admission demanded to the theatres. There is, therefore, but one house, the American, now regularly open in San Francisco, and that is doing a very meagre business. The principal theatre, the Jenny Lind, has been purchased by our Common Council for a City Hall. Our Fathers paid for it, for reasons they can doubtless explain, the precious little sum of two hundred thousand dollars, fully double the amount that any person, not immediately and personally interested, ever imagined it to be worth. Our press, without an exception, cried out lustily against this prodigal expenditure of the people's money, and the people themselves held a giant mass meeting, to arrest the action of the Council on this subject; but all this was of no avail. The building was bought, and at least fifty thousand dollars more must now be expended to make it fit for the object for which it has been obtained."

In one of his letters to the Musical Review, Lowell Mason mentions a brief visit paid to the Monument of Beethoven. He says:—"On our way down the Rhine, we made a stop at Bonn, just long enough to see a little of the place where the great modern composer was born, and to look upon the monument which art has here erected to the memory of one of the greatest of artists. The monument stands upon a public square, and consists of a fine bronze statue of the symphonist, holding an open sheet of paper in the left, and a pencil in the right hand. Our little company, together with a few strangers who went to see it at the same time, stood under the deep shady trees by which it is surrounded, and gazed upon it for a few moments in perfect silence, and with intense interest. No musician who is able to bring up to his imagination the wonderful original, can look upon this statue without a deep feeling of reverence and admiration, amounting as nearly to worship or adoration as may be rendered to the highest manifestations of human genius."

In a prize essay by C. M. Cady, on "Music in America," we find the following observations on congregational and choir singing:

"The growth and progress of congregational singing in the Protestant churches on the continent, has been steady and uniform. It now prevails to a great extent in Germany and other parts of Europe; and Mr. Lowell Mason, in recent letters, describes this part of divine worship as being, artistically, very incorrect, but still inconceivably grand and powerful in its devotional effect. In England we find that where congregational singing has entirely superseded the use of choirs, and efforts have been remitted to instruct the people in musical science, the performance has degenerated till it has become intolerable, and choir-singing has taken its place; as was also the case in the Puritan churches of New England about 1721. In some of the Protestant churches of England, congregational singing is now in a good condition, while in others it has become exceedingly bad; but the public feeling seems, if we can judge from the tone of their Reviews and Journals, to be strongly in favor of improving and reinstating it. We see, then, that these two forms of church music, once severally indicative of Popery and Protestantism, are now both used in the Protestant churches of Europe, while in this country choir-singing is exclusively used, except in a few churches where congregational singing is being introduced. Congregational singing must be regarded, in accordance with the sentiments not only of the Reformers, but of all spiritual Christians, as the truly devotional style of church music. On the other hand, choir-singing is, we think, fully proved by its past history to be the impressive style, and needed in connection with the congregational style, to keep the latter from degeneracy.

"The true ideal of church music is then, we think, realized only in the union of these two styles. We would have a well-drilled choir to perform motets, designed to induce a devotional frame of mind in the assembled audience, to perform all the chants used, and sing all psalms and hymns of a hortative character, as well as those of a meditative caste which require to be sung to tunes of a delicate nature, and to lead the whole congregation once or twice during each service, in singing a devotional psalm or hymn to an appropriate, plain choral tune. Experience shows that these styles are not to be blended in the same piece. The congregation should not sing on choir music; in choral music all should sing; else the effect of both is marred."

An enquiry made in "Notes and Queries," (a London periodical intended as a medium of intercommunication between literary men, artists, antiquarians, and others), as to the origin of our National flag, has been answered by Mr. T. Westcott, of Philadelphia. He says:—

Jarltzburg wishes to know the origin of the stars and stripes in the American flag. His query might be answered briefly by stating that the American Congress, on the 14th of June, 1777, "Resolved that the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternately red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation." But your correspondent wishes to know the origin of the combination, and who first suggested the idea. Some have supposed that it might have been derived from the arms of General Washington, which contains three stars in the upper portion, and three bars running across the escutcheon. There is no means of knowing at this day, whether this conjecture is correct, but the coincidence is rather striking. There were several flags used before the striped flag by the Americans. In March, 1775, "a union flag with a red field" was hoisted at New York upon the liberty pole, bearing the inscription "George Rex, and the liberties of America," and upon the reverse "No popery." On the 18th of July, 1778, Gen. Putnam raised, at Prospect Hill, a flag bearing on one side, the Massachusetts motto, "Qui transtulit sustinet," on the other "An appeal to Heaven." In October of the same year the floating batteries at Boston had a flag with the latter motto, the field white with a pine-tree upon it. This was the Massachusetts emblem. Another flag, used during 1775 in some of the colonies, had upon it a rattle-snake coiled as if about to strike, with the motto "Don't tread on me." The grand union flag of thirteen stripes was raised on the heights near Boston, January 2, 1776. Letters from there say that the regulars in Boston did not understand it; and as the king's speech had just been sent to the Americans, they thought the new flag was a token of submission. The British Annual Register of 1776 says: "They burnt the king's speech and changed their colors from a plain red ground, which they had hitherto used, to a flag with thirteen stripes, as a symbol of the number and union of the colonies." A letter from Boston about the same time, published in the Pennsylvania Gazette for January, 1776, says: "The grand union flag was raised on the 2d, in compliment to the united colonies." The idea of making each stripe for a State, was adopted from the first; and the fact goes far to negative the supposition that the private arms of General Washington had anything to do with the subject. The pine tree, rattlesnake, and striped flag were used indiscriminately until July, 1777, when the blue union, with the stars, was added to the stripes, and the flag established by law. Formerly a new stripe was added for each new State admitted to the Union, until the flag became too large, when, by act of Congress, the stripes were reduced to the old thirteen: and now a star is added to the Union at the succession of each new State.

We have received from the publisher, Mr. George W. Childs, corner of Fifth and Arch streets, a proof copy of Mr. Welsh's admirable engraving of Stuart's original portrait of Washington, in the Boston Athenæum, and we regard it as in every way worthy the subject. The noble head of the Father of his Country has never been transferred to steel with greater skill and truthful power, than in this instance, by Mr. Welsh. It is a picture that should be hung up in the dwelling of every American citizen. Mr. Whipple, of Boston, says of the engraving: "I have compared it with the original in the Athenæum, and am surprised at the perfection of the copy, even to the nicest points of expression in Stuart's great picture." Jared Sparks says of it:—"Being familiar with the original portrait by Stuart, in the Boston Athenæum, I may perhaps be allowed to speak with some degree of confidence of Mr. Welsh's success. The features and the expressions appear to me to be exhibited in the engraving with remarkable exactness, and there is, throughout, a close and striking resemblance to the original."

We add but one more testimony in regard to this splendid portrait. It is from the President of the United States. He says, in a note to the publisher, acknowledging a copy of the portrait: "The Executive Mansion is adorned with two paintings; one a full-length portrait of Washington, and the other of Bolivar. I shall add this elegant engraving to the number, and leave it as an heir-loom to my successors."

We do not know the author of the following pleasant poem, which we find in a recent number of the Musical Review. A sweeter fancy of the "Indian Summer," we have never seen.

There is a time, just ere the frost
Prepares to pave old Winter's way,
When Autumn in a reverie lo't,
The mellow daytime dreams away;
When summer comes, in musing mind,
To gaze once more on hill and dell,
To mark how many sheaves they bind,
And see if all is ripened well.

With balmy breath she whispers low,
The dying flowers look up and give
Their sweetest incense ere they go,
For her who made their beauties live.
She enters 'neath the woodland shade,
Her zephyrs lift the lingering leaf,
And bear it gently where are laid
The loved and lost ones of its grief.

At last old Autumn, rising, takes Again his sceptre and his throne,
With boisterous hand the trees he shakes,
Intent on gathering all his own.
Sweet Summer, sighing, flies the plain,
And waiting Winter, gaunt and grim,
Sees miser Autumn hoard his grain,
And smiles to think it's all for him.

Lowell Mason, now in Europe, writes that it has become fashionable in England, and to some extent on the continent, to omit the interlude—or playing between the stanzas—by the organ, in singing hymns.

A striking instance of presence of mind is related of a little boy who saved his mother's life, at the time the boiler of the Hudson River steamboat, the Reindeer, exploded. She, in her terror, was about to spring overboard, when he caught her apron, and winding it around a railing, held her fast, until a passenger came and drew her back from her dangerous position.

A poet once was walking with M. de Talleyrand in the street, and at the same time reciting some of his own verses. Talleyrand perceiving, at a short distance, a man yawning, pointed him out to his friend, saying: "Not so loud, he hears you!"

With every exertion, the best of men can do but a moderate amount of good: but it seems in the power of the most contemptible individual to do incalculable mischief.

THE PINNATED GROUSE AND THE RUFFLED GROUSE.

BY C. W. WEBBER,

AUTHOR OF "OLD HICKS," "THE HUNTER NATURALIST," &c. &c.

The red-man is not the only aboriginal race upon our continent, concerning whom it might have been pathetically prophesied: the places which knew them once, shall know them no more; many numerous races of birds and animals have disappeared along with their original foes. Step by step they have been driven from the haunts they once frequented, and over vast districts once all their own. They now retain possession of small and isolated spots, where they continue to look back with lingering longing over the fair domain, from which they have been ruthlessly driven.

Such has been peculiarly the case with the Prairie Hen, which, in the strong resemblance of its fate, and in many of its habits, may be properly styled the feathered prototype of the North American Indian. They once swarmed over a vast proportion of the Northern and Middle Districts. Like the Indians, they were so indomitably fixed and wild in their habits, that extermination or flight before the encroaching power of the white race, has been their only alternative. Like them, they held in fee simple the wide nut-bearing woods, with all the privileges and perquisites thereof, since time immemorial. Like them, they have lingered long round the graves of their feathered forefathers, and wherever a nook of refuge has been gained, where the destroyer might not reach them, they yet haunt the scenes of by-gone prosperity. As, for instance, although there is scarcely a Pinnated Grouse to be met with in any of the Atlantic States, where the Puritans found them covering the earth, except among the mountains; yet in Martha's Vineyard, one of the Elizabeth Islands, they continue to be found in sufficient numbers to justify the annual resort of a limited party of sportsmen, to hunt them. Nashawenna, a small island on which they are kept as a sort of preserve, is the only other one of the group on which they are found. They also frequent such dense or barren places as the "brushy" plains of Long Island, Mount Desert Island, in the State of Maine, and other rough and inaccessible localities in that State and in New Jersey. In Southern Kentucky, where I can just remember them in my boyhood, as abundant—that is, sufficiently so to afford good sport—they were not to be found at all by the time I had reached manhood; and yet I have often heard my parents tell of their numbers when they first settled in Hopkinsville. They came into the gardens of the town, destroyed their fruit trees and vegetables, and even carried their audacity so far as to come down into the house-yards and fight with the domestic fowls. Boys and negroes killed great numbers of them with sticks and stones, while very few thought them worth shooting at at all, except to drive them away for mischief. They were regarded as pests and nuisances, and caught in traps and pens, in immense quantities, to be thrown to the hogs.

In spite of these almost incredible numbers, how short a time has it taken to despoil them even of this, the "Garden of the West;" yet here, too, they still linger, and, as if in affectionate reluctance to leave so lovely a home; they may now occasionally be startled from the vicinity of the beautiful groves or timber islands, scattered over the flowery plains of the rich "Barrens."

The Ruffled Grouse, or the Partridge, as it is miscalled at the North, and Pheasant, as it is known at the West, still retains almost undisputed possession of these favorite feeding grounds since the abdication of its former rival and conqueror.

These two birds have been strangely confounded even by sportsmen—and there are a great many intelligent men among them—North and South, who persist in getting the names of the birds wrong, one way or another. The case seems to be about this:—the Puritans found the Ruffled and Pinnated Grouse in the woods and plains of the new country. The Ruffled Grouse, the plumage of which is lighter at the North, reminded them most of the Grey Partridge of Great Britain. Not having much idle time to spare for careful ornithological classification, they christened the bird Partridge, off-hand, in memory of the old country, and, Partridge it has been called ever since by their descendants, except when they in their hurry have confounded it with the Prairie Hen or Pinnated Grouse, to which it bears nothing more than the general family resemblance. Since the gradual disappearance of the Prairie Hen, this confusion has become worse confounded—it being pretty generally understood that the name Partridge has been misapplied to one of the two common species of Grouse—but which becomes the question?

Specimens of the Prairie Hen have become so difficult to obtain for the purposes of comparison, that the whole subject has been left pretty much to conjecture, and the Ruffed Grouse still holds its place and its name of Partridge at the North. Now, this name is just as appropriate as that applied to the same bird west of the Alleghanies. There, from the darker color which its plumage assumes, toward the Southwest it has been called the Pheasant. We have but one species of Pheasant on the Continent, called the American Pheasant, and that is a very rare inhabitant of the Rocky Mountains, so that it is hardly necessary to go far to show that such an application of the name is an absurd misnomer. We have the same ridiculous jumble of names in the instance of the Virginian Partridge, which in the Northeastern and Middle Districts is called Quail, as a sort of diminutive of their supposed Partridge—however, they have the name right in the South and West, where it is known as the Partridge. It is quite amusing to hear the epicures from the different sections, correcting each other over a dish of so common a bird.

Now, once for all, let us set this matter straight—1st. The proper name of the Partridge of the North and Eastern States is the Ruffed Grouse, which is also improperly called Pheasant west of the Alleghanies, the American Pheasant being our only species. 2d. The proper name for the Pinnated Grouse is not Partridge either, but its common name is Prairie Hen. 3d. The Virginian Partridge is the only one of the species we have on the Continent, and it is improperly called a Quail, of which we have not a single variety! We have two or three other varieties of the Grouse, which are, however, less noted, and are so exclusively confined to the high Northern regions, that they are not likely to much increase the confusion which exists with regard to the nomenclature of this family—the principal of these are the Willow Grouse, which is found in the deep forests and mountain fastnesses of Maine, north, to the swamps of Labrador—and the Spotted or Canada Grouse, which is found also in the heart of the dark pine swamps of much the same general localities—but the Ruffed and Pinnated Grouse are the most generally sought, and, of course, interesting varieties, and we shall, therefore, principally endeavor to illustrate the differences between these two.

The most curious peculiarities of these Grouse, consist in their different and fierce modes of adjusting matters in the love season, and the extraordinary sounds produced by the males at this period. As the most striking marks of distinction between them, we will quote here accurate accounts of their ferocious love scenes, and of the mode in which the sounds referred to are produced by both birds. No naturalist has been more absolutely faithful than J. J. Audubon in such descriptions. We quote him concerning the Pinnated Grouse:

“As soon as the snows have melted away, and the first blades of grass issue from the earth, announcing the approach of spring, the Grouse, which had congregated during the winter in great flocks, separate into parties of from twenty to fifty or more. Their mating season commences, and a spot is pitched upon to which they daily resort. The male birds, before the first glimpse of day lightens the horizon, fly swiftly and singly from their grassy beds, to meet, to challenge, and to fight the various rivals led by the same impulse to the arena. The male is at this season attired in his full dress, and enacts his part in a manner not surpassed in pomposity by any other bird. Imagine them assembled, to the number of twenty, by daybreak: see them all strutting in the presence of each other, mark the consequential gestures, their looks of disdain, and their angry pride as they pass each other. Their tails, spread out and inclined forwards, to meet the expanded feathers of their necks, like stiffened frills, lie supported by the globular orange-colored receptacle of air, from which their singular booming sounds proceed. Their wings, like those of the Turkey Cock, are stiffened and declined so as to rub and rustle on the ground, as the bird passes rapidly along. Their bodies are depressed towards the ground, the fire of their eyes evinces the pugnacious workings of the mind, their notes fill the air around, and at the very first answer from some coy female—the battle rages. Like Game Cocks they strike, and rise in the air to meet their assailants with greater advantage. Now many close in the encounter; feathers are seen whirling in the agitated air, or falling round them tinged with blood. The weaker begin to give way, and one after another seeks refuge in the neighboring bushes. The remaining few greatly exhausted, maintain their ground, and withdraw slowly and proudly as if each claimed the honors of the victory. The vanquished and the victors then search for the females, who, believing each to have returned from the field in triumph, receive them with joy.

“It not unfrequently happens that a male, already mated, is suddenly attacked by some disappointed rival, who unexpectedly pounces upon him after a flight of considerable length, having been attracted by the cacklings of the happy couple. The female invariably squats near to and almost under the breast of her lord, while he, always ready for action, throws himself on his daring antagonist, and chases him away never to return.

“In such places in the Western country as I have described, the ‘Prairie Hen’ is heard ‘booming’ or ‘tooting,’ not only before break of day, but frequently at all hours from morning till sunset; but in districts where these birds have become wild in consequence of the continual interference of man, they are seldom heard after sunrise: sometimes these meetings are noiseless, their battles are much less protracted, or of less frequent occurrence, and their beats or scratching grounds are more concealed. Many of the young males have battles even in the autumn, when the females generally join, not to fight, but to conciliate them, in the manner of the Wild Turkeys.

“The curious notes emitted in the mating season are peculiar to the male. When the receptacles of air, which, in form, color and size, resemble a small orange, are perfected inflated, the bird lowers its head to the ground, opens its bill, and sends forth, as it were, the air contained in these bladders in distinctly separate notes, rolling one after another from loud to low, and producing a sound like to a muffled drum. This done, the bird immediately erects itself, refills its receptacles by inhalation, and again proceeds with its tootings.

"I frequently observed in these Prairie Hens, a number of which I had tamed at Henderson, that after producing the noise, the bags lost their rotundity, and assumed the appearance of a burst bladder, but that in a few seconds they were again inflated. Having caught one of the birds, I passed the point of a pin through each of its air-cells, the consequence of which was that it was unable to toot any more. With another bird, I performed the same operation on one only of the cells, and next morning it tooted with the sound one, although not so loudly as before, but could not inflate the one which had been punctured. The sound, in my opinion, cannot be heard at a much greater distance than a mile. All my endeavors to decoy this species, by imitating its curious sounds, were unsuccessful, although the Ruffed Grouse is easily deceived in this manner. As soon as the strutting and fighting are over, the collapsed bladders are concealed by the feathers of the ruff, and during autumn and winter are much reduced in size. These birds, indeed, seldom, if ever, meet in groups on the scratching grounds after incubation has taken place; at all events, I have never seen them fight after that period; for, like the Wild Turkeys, after spending a few weeks apart to recover their strength, they gradually unite, and as soon as the young are grown up, individuals of both sexes mix with the latter, and continue in company till spring. The young males exhibit the bladders and elongated feathers of the neck before the first winter, and by the next spring have attained maturity, although, as in many other species, they increase in size and beauty for several years."

To this concise and accurate account of Mr. Audubon's, we would only add that on the prairies of the North-west, of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, &c., where they still abound in innumerable flocks, the scenes described above occur on a much grander scale, and are attended even with considerable carnage. The strange "booming" of these birds, heard far and near on every side, confounds the stranger unutterably, and he is with difficulty made to understand that sounds of such volume are made by a comparatively small bird. Indeed, it may be remarked that the habits of the bird are most essentially changed, as well as the color of its plumage, by a residence on the great plains of the West. The most extraordinary phenomenon produced by the necessities of the climate, as a protection against the terrible winds which sweep over these apparently illimitable levels, at the approach of winter, consists, in the assembling of these birds, from a distance of many miles around, to roost on the same spot, something after the manner of the Wild Pigeon. This fact seems to have escaped Mr. Audubon's notice.

At the opening of winter, a spot is selected, on the open prairies, in the upper part of the Missouri country, which is more sheltered than the surrounding region, by the character of the ground, from the biting force of the north-west winds. Here the Prairie Hens begin to assemble early in the evening, and by the time dusk comes on immense numbers are collected. They approach the scene in small flocks, in a leisurely manner, by short flights. They approach the place of gathering silently, with nothing of that whirr of wings, for which they are noted when they are suddenly put up, but they make ample amends when they arrive; as in the Pigeon roost, there is a continual roar, caused by the restless shifting of the birds, and sounds of impatient struggle emitted by them, which can be heard distinctly for several miles. The numbers collected are incalculably immense, since the space covered by them sometimes extends for over a mile in length, with a breadth determined by the character of the ground.

This is a most astonishing scene. When approached in the early part of the night on horseback, the hubbub is strangely discordant, and overwhelmingly deafening. They will permit themselves to be killed in great numbers with sticks, or any convenient weapon, without the necessity of using guns. They, however, when frequently disturbed in the first of the season, will easily change their roosting-place, but when the heavy snows have fallen, by melting which by the heat of their bodies, and by trampling it down, they have formed a sort of sheltered yard, the outside walls of which defend them against the winds, they are not easily driven away by any degree of persecution. Indeed, at this time, they become so emaciated as to afford but little inducement to any human persecutors, by whom they are seldom troubled, indeed, on account of the remoteness of their locations; from foxes, wolves, hawks, and owls, &c., their natural enemies, they have, of course, to expect no mercy at any time.

The noise of their restless cluckings, flutterings and shiftings begins to subside a few hours after dark. The birds have now arranged themselves for the night, nestled as close as they can be; wedged, every bird with his breast turned towards the wind that may be prevailing. This scene is one of the most curious that can be imagined, especially when they have the moonlight on the snow to contrast with their dark backs. At this time, they may be killed by cartloads, as only those in the immediate neighborhood of the aggressor are disturbed, apparently. They rise to the height of a few feet, with a stupefied and aimless fluttering, and plunge into the snow, within a short distance, where they are easily taken by the hand. In these helpless conditions, such immense numbers are destroyed that the family would be in danger of rapid extermination, but that the fecundity of the survivors keeps pace with the many fatalities to which they are liable.

Wherever they may be found, this propensity to collect in numbers, smaller or greater, during cold weather, to roost in low spots of ground, has been observed, and Mr. Audubon mentions the circumstance of his having caught a great many of them—which he had observed resorting to the long grass of a bit of low, marshy land near his house—by simply making his negroes, each with a torch in hand, carry down a drag fishing net to the marsh, which they dropped over the right spot, which had been carefully marked.

They naturally throng together to obtain mutually the benefit of the heat of their bodies against the cold, and in proportion as the cold becomes excessive in those districts where they most abound, does the necessity of these assemblages increase, until they become gradually developed into the curious phenomenon we have attempted to convey an idea of above.

But, to continue the proposed distinction between the two varieties of Grouse:—The Ruffed Grouse roosts upon trees, except during the snow, when it sometimes finds a shelter, singly, by burying itself beneath it, as is done by the Northern Hare. It resorts most to the thickets and dense groves—both winter and summer—for breeding, roosting and feeding; while the Pinnated Grouse keep on the plains and open country, for all these purposes. The “drumming” of the Ruffed Grouse is a very different affair from the “tooting” of the Prairie Hen. Hear, likewise, a description of this curious proceeding from the source we have already quoted:—

“Early in April, the Ruffed Grouse begins to drum immediately after dawn, and again towards the close of day. As the season advances, the drumming is repeated more frequently at all hours of the day; and where these birds are abundant, this curious sound is heard from all parts of the woods in which they reside.—The drumming is performed in the following manner:—The male bird, standing erect on a prostrate decayed trunk, raises the feathers of its body, in the manner of a Turkey Cock, draws its head towards its tail, erecting the feathers of the latter at the same time, and raising its ruff around the neck, suffers its wings to droop, and struts about on the log. A few moments elapse, when the bird draws the whole of its feathers close to its body, and stretches itself out, beats its sides with its wing, in the manner of the Domestic Cock, but more loudly, and with such rapidity of motion, after a few of the first strokes, as to cause a tremor in the air not unlike the rumbling of distant thunder. This, kind reader, is the ‘drumming’ of the Pheasant. In perfectly calm weather it may be heard at the distance of two hundred yards, but might be supposed to proceed from a much greater distance. The female, which never drums, flies directly to the place where the male is thus engaged.”

We have now an outline of the principal points of difference between the birds. I will only say in conclusion—that shooting the Ruffed Grouse is very precarious sport, except when the snows are very deep, and then they soon become too lean and helpless to escape. Though a very robust bird, they are frequently thinned off very much by the severities of the Northern winters. The most common mode of hunting them by those who kill them for market, or for the love of slaughter, is with a sharp, active cur dog, whose vehement barking causes them to take to a tree close at hand, where they sit still and permit the approach of the gunner. But, this is only half the battle: they usually fly into the tops of the trees, and straightening themselves up, they smooth down the feathers of the body close to the body, and as they remain perfectly motionless, they are astonishingly difficult to distinguish—so perfectly does their color blend with that of the trunk or boughs. When once discovered, they are easily shot—even to the great part of the flock that may have been flushed. The sport of shooting the Pinnated Grouse is now so curtailed in the North-eastern Districts, as not to furnish sufficient general interest for a detailed description—while that of slaughtering them by wholesale in the North-west, where they so greatly abound, is hardly a theme which will bear dwelling upon with pleasure.

THISTLE-DOWN.

CHAPTER I.

There is no time like these clear September nights, after sunset, for a reverie. If it is a calm evening, and an intense light fills the sky, and glorifies it, and you sit where you can see the new moon, with the magnificent evening star beneath it, you must be a stupid affair, indeed, if you cannot then dream the most heavenly dreams!

But Rosalie Sherwood—poor young creature, is in no dreaming mood this lovely Sabbath night. Her heart is crushed in such an utter helplessness, as leaves no room in it for hope; her brain is too acutely sensitive, just now, for visions. The thistle-down, in beautiful fairy-like procession, floats on and up before her eyes, and as she watches the frail things, they assume a new interest to her; she feels a human sympathy with them. Like the viewless winds they come, from whence she knows not; and go, whither? none can tell. They are homeless, and she is like them; but she is not as they—purposeless.

If you could look into her mind, you would see how she has nerved it to a great determination; how that, mustering visions and hopes once cherished, she had gone forward to a bleak and barren path, and stands there very resolute, yet, in the first moment of her resolve, miserable; no, she had not yet grown strong in the suffering; she cannot this night stand up and bear her burden with a smile of triumph.

Rosalie Sherwood was an only child, the daughter of an humble friend, Mrs. Melville had known from girlhood. She, poor creature, had neither lived nor died innocent.

On her death-bed, Cecily Sherwood gave her unrecognized child to the care of one who promised, in the sincerity of her passion, to be a mother to the unfortunate infant. And during the eighteen years of that girl's life, from the hour of her mother's death to the day when she was left without hope in the world, Rosalie had found a parent in the rigid but always kind and just Mary Melville.

This widow lady had one son; he was four years old when her husband died, which was the very year that the little Rosalie was brought to Melville House. The boy's father had been considered a man of great wealth, but when his affairs were settled, after his decease, it was found that the debts of the estate being paid, little more than a competency remained for the widow. But the lady was fitted, by a life of self-discipline, even in her luxurious home, to calmly meet this emergency. With the remnant of an imagined fortune, she retired to an humbler residence, where, in quiet retirement, she gave her time to managing household affairs, and superintending the home education of the children.

Her son Duncan, and the young Rosalie, had grown up together—until the girl's twelfth birthday, constant playmates and pupils in the same school. No one, not even the busiest busy-body, had ever been able to detect the slightest partiality in Mrs. Melville's treatment of her children; and, indeed, it had been quite impossible that she should ever regard a child so winningly beautiful as Rosalie, with other than the tenderest affection. Under a light and careless rein, the girl had been a difficult one to manage, for there was a light little fire in her eyes, that told of strong will and deep passions; and besides, her striking appearance had won sufficient admiration to have completely spoiled her, if a guardian the most vigilant as well as most discerning, had not been ever at hand to speak the right word to and do the right thing with her.

Mrs. Melville was a thoroughly religious woman, and seriously conscious of the responsibility she incurred in adopting the infant. She could not quiet her conscience with the reflection that she had done a wonderfully good thing in giving Rosalie a home and education; the chief pity she felt for the unfortunate orphan, led her to exercise an uncommon care, that all tendency to evil should be eradicated from the heart of the brilliant girl while she was yet young; that a sense of right, such as should prove abiding, might be impressed on her tender mind. And her labor of love met with a return which might well have made the mother proud.

There had been no officious voice to whisper to Rosalie Sherwood the story of the doubtful position which she occupied in the world. She was an orphan, the adopted child of the lady whom she devoutly loved with all a daughter's tenderness; this she knew, and it was all she knew; and Mrs. Melville was resolved that she should never know more.

The son of the widow had been educated for the ministry. He was now twenty-two years old, and was soon to be admitted to the priesthood. In this he was following out his own wish, and the most cherished hope of his mother, and it seemed to all who knew him, as though the Head of the Church had set his seal upon Duncan from his boyhood. He was so mild and forbearing, so discreet and generous, so earnest and so honest,—meek, and holy of heart, was the thought of any one who looked upon his placid, youthful face. Yet, he had, besides his gentleness, that without which his character might have subsided into a mere puerile weakness; a firmness of purpose; a reverence for duty; a strict sense of right, equal to that which marked his mother among women. Duncan Melville's abilities were of a high order; perhaps not of the very highest, though, if his ambition were only equal to his powers, they would surely seem so to the world.

His voice had a sweet persuasive tone, that was fitted to win souls, yet it could ring like a clarion, when the grandeur of his themes fired his soul. With the warmest hopes and the deepest interest they, who knew the difficulties and trials attending the profession he had chosen, looked on this young man.

Duncan and Rosalie had long known the nature of the tie which bound them together—members of one family—and they never called themselves brother and sister, after the youth came home a graduate from college. For, from the time when absence empowered him to look as a stranger would look on Rosalie, from that time he saw her elegant and accomplished, and bewitching, as she was, and other than fraternal affection was in his heart for her.

And Rosalie, too, loved him, just as Duncan, had he spoken his passion, would have prayed her to love him. She had long ago made him the standard of all manly excellence; and when he came back, after three years of absence, she was not inclined to revoke her early decision; therefore was she prepared to read the language of Duncan's eyes, and she consecrated her heart to him.

During the years which followed his return from college, till he was prepared for ordination, as a priest, he did not once speak to her of his love, which was growing all the while stronger and deeper, as the river course that, flowing to the ocean, receives every day fresh impetus and force from the many tiny springs that commingle with it. Duncan Melville never thought of wedding another than Rosalie Sherwood.

It was, as I said, near the time appointed for his ordination, when he felt, for the first time, as though he had a right to speak openly with her of all his hopes. He asked her, then, what, in soul language, he had long before asked, a question, which she had as emphatically, in like language, answered—to be his partner for life, in weal or woe.

He had tried to calmly consider Rosalie's character as a Christian minister should consider the character of her whom he would make the sharer of his peculiar lot; and setting every preference aside, Duncan felt that she was fitted to assist, and to bear with him. She was truthful as the day, strong-minded and generous; humane and charitable: and though no professor of religion, a woman full of reverence and veneration. He knew that it was only a fear that she should not adorn the Christian name, that kept her back from the altar of the church, and he loved her for that spirit of humility, knowing that she was "on the Lord's side," and that grace, ere long, would be given to her, to proclaim it in doing all His commandments.

It was certainly with a joyful and confident heart that, after he had spoken with Rosalie, Duncan sought his mother, to tell her of the whole of that bright future which opened now before him.

How then was he overcome with amazement and grief when Mrs. Melville told him it was a union to which she could never consent! Then, for the first time in his life, the astonished young man heard of that stain which was on the name poor Rosalie bore.

He heard the story to the end, and, with a decision and energy that would have settled the matter with almost any other than his mother, he declared—

"Yet for all that, I will not give her up."

"It would not be expected that you would fulfil the engagement. Rosalie herself would not allow it, if she knew the truth of the matter."

"But she need not know it. There is no existing necessity. Is it not enough that she is good and precious to me? She is a noble woman, whose life has been, thanks to your guidance, beautiful and lofty."

"God knows, I have striven to do my duty by her, but I know what I should have done if I had ever thought you would wish to change your relations with her, Duncan."

"The world has not her equal! It is cruel—it is sinful—in you, mother, to oppose our union."

"She is a lovely woman; but, my son, there are myriads like her."

"No—not one! Tell me you will never breathe a word of what you have told me to her!"

"Never."

"Oh! thank you! thank you! mother—you could not wish another daughter."

"But for that I have told you, I could not wish another."

"Then I say you must not work this great injustice on us. Rosalie loves me. She has promised to be mine. You will break my heart."

"You are deluded and strongly excited, my son, or you would never speak so to me," said the mother, with that persisting firmness with which the physician resorts to—a desperate remedy for a desperate disease. Then she spoke to him of all the relations in life he might yet be called upon to assume; of the misery which very possibly might follow this union in after days. Hours passed on, and the conference was not ended, until, with a crushed heart, and a trembling voice, Duncan arose, abruptly, while his mother yet spoke, and he said:

"If the conclusion to which you have urged me, in God's sight, is just, He will give me—He will give Rosalie, too—strength to abide by it. But I can never speak to her of this, and I must find another home than yours and hers. You must speak for me, mother; and let me charge you, do it gently. Do not tell her all. Let her think what she will—believe as she must—that I am a wretch, past pardon; but do not blight her peace by telling all."

"I promise you, Duncan," was the answer, spoken through many tears, and in the deepest sorrow.

An hour after, he was on the way from the village that he might spend the coming Sabbath in another town.

And, after he was gone, the mother sought her younger, her dearly loved child. Rosalie heard that familiar step on the stairway—she had seen Duncan hurrying away from the house, and she knew the conference was over; but she had no fear for the result. So she hushed the glad tumultuous beating of her heart, and tried to veil the brightness of her eyes as she heard the gentle tapping at her door that announced the mother coming.

As for Mrs. Melville, her heart quite failed her when she went into the pleasant room, and sat down close by Rosalie. In spite of all the strengthening thoughts of duty which she had taken with her as a support in that interview, she was now at a sore loss, for it had been a bitter grief to her kind heart when, of old, for duty's sake, she made her children unhappy. How then could she endure to take away their life's best joy—their richest hope? It was a hard thing; and many moments passed before she could nerve her strong spirit to utter the first word. Rosalie, anxious and impatient, too, but unsuspecting, at last exclaimed:

"What can it be that so much troubles you, mother?"

Then Mary Melville spoke, but with a voice so soft and sad, so faint with emotion, that it seemed not all her voice. She said:

"I want you to consider that what I say to you, dear child, has given me more pain even to think of than I have ever felt before. Duncan has told me of your engagement to marry with him; and it has been my duty—my most sorrowful duty, oh! believe me—to tell him that such a tie must never unite you. He can never be your husband—you can never be his wife."

She paused, exhausted by her emotion—she could not utter another syllable. Rosalie, who had watched her with fixed astonishment as she listened to the words, was the first to speak again, and she tried to say, calmly:

"Of course, you have a reason for saying so. It is but just that I should know it."

"It cannot be known. If I had ever in my life deceived you, Rosalie, you might doubt me now, when I assure you that an impediment, which cannot be named, exists to the marriage. Have I not been a mother to you always?" she asked, appealingly, imploringly: "I love you as I love Duncan, and it cuts me to the heart to grieve you."

"Has Duncan given you an answer?"

"Yes, Rosalie."

"And it——?"

"He has trusted to his mother!" she said, almost proudly.

"Rather than me," quickly interrupted Rosalie.

"Rather than do that which is wrong—which might hereafter prove the misery of you both, my child."

"Where is he? Why does he not come himself to tell me this? If the thing is really true, his lips should have spoken it, and not another's."

"Oh! Rosalie, he could not do it. I believe his heart is broken. Do not look so upon me. Is it not enough that I bitterly regret, that I shall always deplore, having not foreseen the result of your companionship? Say only that you do believe I have striven to do the best for you always, as far as I knew how. I implore you, say it."

"Heaven knows I believe it, mother. When will Duncan come home again?"

"Monday—not before."

When Monday morning came, on the desk in Rosalie's room this letter was found:

"I cannot leave you for ever, Duncan,—I cannot go from your protecting care, mother, without saying all that is in my heart. I have no courage to look on you, my brother, again. Mother! our union, which we had thought life-lasting, is broken. I cannot any longer live in the world's sight as your daughter by adoption. I would have done so. I would have remained in any capacity—as a slave, even, for I was bound by gratitude for all that you have done for me, to be with you always,—at least so long as you could wish. If you had unveiled the mystery, and suffered me to stand before you, recognising myself as you know me, I would have stayed. I would have been to you, Duncan, only as in childhood—a proud yet humble sister, rejoicing in your triumphs, and sharing by sympathy in your griefs. I would have put forth fetters on my heart—the in-dwelling spirit should henceforth have been a stranger to you. I know I could have borne to even see another made your wife—but in a mistaken kindness you put this utterly beyond my power. Too much has been required, and I am found—wanting! If even the most miserable fate that can befall an innocent woman; if the curse of illegitimacy were upon me, I could bear that thought even, and acknowledge the justice and wisdom that did not consider me a fit associate for one whose birth is recognised by a parent's pride and fondness.

"But, dear Mrs. Melville, I must be cognizant of the relation, whatever it is, that I bear you. I cannot, I will not, consent to appear nominally your daughter, when you scorn to receive me as such.

"Mother—in my dear mother's name, I thank you for the generous love you have ever shown me: for the generous care with which you have attended to the development of the talents God gave me. For I am now fitted to labor for myself. I thank you for the watchful guardianship that has made me what I am, a woman—self-reliant and strong. I thank you for it, from a heart that has learned only to love and honor you in the past eighteen years. And I call down the blessings of the infinite God upon you, as I depart. Hereafter, always, it will be my endeavor to live worthily of you—to be all that you have, in your more than charity, capacitated me to be. Duncan, you will not forget me?

"I do not ask it. But pray for me, and live up to the fullness of your being—of your heart and of your intellect. There is a happy future for you. I have no word of counsel, no feeble utterance of encouragement to leave you—you will not need such from me. God bless and strengthen you in every good word and work—it shall be the constant hope of the sister who loves you. Mother, farewell!"

This letter was written on the Sabbath eve on which our story opens—written in a perfect passion—yes, of grief, and of despair. The anger that Rosalie may at first have felt, gave way to the wildest sorrow now, but her resolution was taken, and her heart was really strong to bear the resolution out.

After the sudden and most unlooked for disappearance, the mother and son sought long, and I need not say how anxiously, for Rosalie. But their search was vain, and, at last, as time passed on, she became to the villagers as one who had never been. But never by the widow was she forgotten; and oh! there was in the world one heart that sorrowed with a constant sorrow, that hoped with a constant hope for her.

He had lost her, and Duncan sought for no other love among women. When all his searching for Rosalie proved unavailing, the minister applied himself with industry to the work of his calling, and verily he met here with his reward; for as he was a blessing to the people of his parish, in time they almost adored him. He was a spiritual physician whom God empowered to heal many a wounded and stricken heart; but there was a cross of suffering that he bore himself, which could not be removed. It was his glory that he bore it with martyr-like patience—that he never uttered a reproachful word to her through whom he bore it.

As years passed away, the gifted preacher's impassioned eloquence, and stirring words, bowed many a proud and impenitent soul with another love than that he wished to inspire, still he sought not among any of them companionship, or close friendship. They said, at last, considering his life spent in the most rigid performance of duty, that "he was too high-church to marry,"—that he did not believe such union consonant with the duties of the cloth! But the mother knew better than this—she knew a name that was never spoken now in Rosalie's old home, that was dearer than life to the heart of her son; and desolate and lonely as he oft-times was, she never dared ask him to give to her a daughter—to take unto himself a wife.

CHAPTER II.

In a splendid old cathedral a solemn ceremony was going forward, on the morning of a holy festival. A bishop was to be consecrated.

A mighty crowd assembled to witness the ceremony, and the mother of Duncan Melville was there, the happiest soul in all that company, for it was on her son that the high honor was to be laid.

How beautiful was the pale, holy countenance of the minister, who, in the early strength of his manhood, was accounted worthy to fill that great office for which he was about to be set apart! He was a man "acquainted with grief,"—you had known it by the resigned, submissive expression of his face; you had known that the passions of mortals had been all but chilled in him, by the holy light in his tranquil eyes. Duncan had toiled—he had borne a burden!

A thousand felt it, looking on the noble front where religion undefiled, and peace, and holy love, and charity, had left for themselves unmistakable evidences: and, more than all, one being felt it who had not looked upon that man for years—not since the lines of grief and care had marked the face and form of Duncan Melville. There was reason for the passionate sobs of one heart, crushed anew in that solemn hour; there was pathos such as no other voice could give to the prayers which went up to God from one woman's heart, in the great congregation, for him. Poor, loving, still-beloved Rosalie! She was there, her proud, magnificent figure bent humbly from the very commencement to the close of the ceremonial; there, her beautiful eyes filled with tears of love, and grief, and despair, and pride; there, crushed as the humblest flower—that glorious beauty!

And the good man at the altar, for whom the prayers and the praise ascended, thought of her in that hour! Yes, in that very hour he remembered how one would have looked on him that day, could she have come, his wife, to witness how his brethren and the people loved and honored him. He thought of her, and as he knelt at the altar, even there he prayed for her; but not as numbers thought upon the name of Rosalie Sherwood that day; for she also was soon to appear before a throng, and there were a myriad hearts that throbbed with expectancy, and waited impatiently for the hour when they should look upon her.

Bishop Melville had retired at noonday to his study, that he might be for a few moments alone. He was glancing over the sermon he was to deliver that afternoon, when his mother, his proud and happy mother, came quickly into the room, laid a sealed note on the table and instantly withdrew, for she saw how he was occupied. When he had finished his manuscript, the bishop opened the note and read—could it have been with careless eyes?

"Duncan, I have knelt in the house of the Lord, to-day, and witnessed your triumph. Ten years ago, when I went desolate and wretched from your house, I might have prophesied your destiny. Come, to-night, and behold my triumph—at—the opera-house!

"Your sister, ROSALIE."

Do you think that, as he read that summons, he hesitated as to whether he should obey it? If his bishopric had been sacrificed by it, he would have gone; if disgrace and danger had attended his foot-steps, he would have obeyed her bidding! The love which had been strengthening in ten long years of loneliness and bereavement, was not now to stop, to question or to fear.

"Accompany me, dear mother, this evening; I have made an engagement for you," he said, as he went, she hanging on his arm, to the cathedral for afternoon service.

"Willingly, my son," was the instant answer, and Duncan kept her to her word.

But it was with wondering, with surprise that she did not attempt to conceal, and with questions which were satisfied with no definite reply, that Mrs. Melville found herself standing with her son in an obscure corner of the opera house that night. Soon all her expressions of astonishment were hushed, but by another cause than the mysterious inattention of her son: a queenly woman appeared upon the stage; she lifted her voice, and sobbed the mournful wail which opens the first scene in —.

For years there had not been such a sensation created among the frequenters of that place, as now, by the appearance of this stranger. The wild, singular style of her beauty made an impression that was heightened by every movement of her graceful figure, every tone of her rich melodious voice. She seemed for the time the very embodiment of the sorrow to which she gave an expression, and the effect was a complete triumph.

Mary Melville and her son gazed on the debutante—they had no word, no look for each other:

for they recognized in her voice the tones of a grief of which long ago they heard the prelude—and every note found its echo in the bishop's inmost heart.

"Come away! let us go home! Duncan, this is no place for us—for you. It is disgrace to be here," was the mother's passionate plea, when at last Rosalie disappeared, and other forms stood in her place.

"We will stay and save her," was the answer, spoken with tears and trembling, by the man for whom, in many a quiet home, prayers in that very hour ascended. "She is mine now, and no earthly consideration or power shall divide us."

And looking for a moment in her son's face steadfastly, the lady turned away sighing and tearful, for she knew that she must yield then, and she had fears for the future.

A half-hour passed and the star of the night reappeared, resplendent in beauty, triumphing in hope;—again her marvellous voice was raised, not with the bitter cry of despair that was hopeless, but glad and gay, angelic in its joy.

Again the mother's eyes were turned on him beside her—and a light was on that pale forehead—a smile on that calm face—a gladness in those eyes—such as she had not seen there in long, long years; but though she looked with a mother's love upon the one who stood the admiration of all eyes, crowned with the glory-crown of perfection in her art, she could not with Duncan hope. For, alas! her woman-heart knew too well the ordeal through which the daughter of her care and love must have passed before she came into that presence where she stood now, who could tell if still the mistress of herself and her destiny? who could tell if pure and undefiled?

That night and the following day, there were many who sought admittance to the parlors of Rosalie Sherwood: they would lay the homage of their trifling hearts at her feet. But all these sought in vain; and why was this? Because such admiring tribute was not what the noble woman sought,—and because, ere she had risen in the morning, a letter, written in the solitude of night, was handed to her, which barred and bolted her doors against the curious world.

"Rosalie! Rosalie! look back through the ten years that are gone; I am answering your letter of long ago with words—I have a thousand times answered them with my heart, till the thoughts which have crowded there, filled it almost to breaking. We have met—met at last—you and I! But did you call that a triumph when you stood in God's house, and saw them lay their consecrating hands upon me? Heaven forgive me! I was thinking of you then—and thinking, too, that if this honor was in any way to be considered a reward, the needful part was wanting—you were not there! Yet you were there, you have written me; ah! but not Rosalie, my wife, the woman I loved better than all on earth—the acknowledged woman, her whose memory I have borne about with me till it was a needful part of my existence. You were by when the people came to see me consecrated—and I obeyed your call; I saw you when the people anointed you with the tears of their admiration and praise. If you read my heart at all, to-day, you knew how I had suffered—you saw that I had grown old in sorrow. Was I mistaken to-night in the thought that you, too, had not been unmindful of our past—that you were not satisfied with the popular applause—that you, also, have been lonely, that you have wept—that you have trodden in the path of duty with weariness?

"There is but one barrier now in the wide world that shall interpose between us—Rosalie, it is your own will. If I was ever anything to you, I beseech you think calmly before you answer, and do not let your triumph, to-night, blind you to the fact which you once recognized, which can make us happy yet. I trust you as in our younger days: nothing, nothing but your own words could convince me that you are not worthy to take the highest place among the ladies of this land. Oh, let the remembrance that I have been faithful to you through all the past, plead for me, if your pride should rise up, to condemn me. Let me come and plead with you, for I know not what I write."

The answer returned to this letter was as follows:

"I learned long ago, the bar that prevented our union—it is in existence still, Duncan. Your mother only shall decide if it be insurmountable. I have never, even for a moment, doubted your faithfulness—and it has been to me an unspeakable comfort to know that none had supplanted me in your affections. In the temptations, and struggles, and hardships, I have known, it has kept me above and beyond the world, and if the last night's triumph proves to be but the opening of a new life for me on earth, the recollection of what you are, and that you care for me, will prove a rock of defence, and a stronghold of hope always. Severed from, or united with you, I am yours for ever."

Seven days after there was a marriage in the little church of that remote village, where Duncan Melville and Rosalie Sherwood passed their childhood. Side by side they stood now, once again, where the baptismal service had long since been read for them, and the mother of the bishop gave the bride away!

FASHIONABLE EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

BY ELIZABETH BLACKWELL, M. D.

The instruction given at school, is almost purely intellectual; the senses receive little regular training; the power is used in very moderate degree to aid the mind—yet they are the first teachers of the young. Grammar, history, definition, composition, call for simple intellectual exertion—the natural sciences are very slenderly illustrated by sensible examples, and the poor engravings in the text books are often the only illustration they receive. The most obtruse subjects, that tax the attention of the strongest mental powers, are presented as studies for the young; girls of 13 or 15 are called upon to ponder the problems of mental and moral philosophy, to demonstrate the propositions of Euclid, to understand the refinements of rhetoric and logic—admirable studies, truly, but they are the food of mature minds, not suitable to children. "The Logic of the Schools," once signified the acutest efforts of powerful intellects—in our day it has a very different meaning!

There is no end to the list of "English branches," which the child has to "go through" during the few years of school training; the enumeration would have frightened our most studious ancestors; they did not understand what is meant by "going through the English branches;" they in their simplicity supposed that there was some use attached to every study—that it must be acquired thoroughly, and be made either a means of mental discipline, or an object of investigation and discovery. But it would puzzle the most ingenious observer, to discover the good use of most of our children's studies. If the object be mental discipline, there is no surer way of defeating such an object, than to attempt to give the mind a superficial view of a subject too difficult for it to grasp—to confuse it with a multitude of disconnected studies—to hurry it from subject to subject, so that the simple studies more suited to the young mind, are imperfectly acquired, and soon forgotten. Thus the greater part of the time devoted to the so-called cultivation of the intellect is really wasted; and it is no uncommon thing to find the young girl who has gone through all the English branches, quite unable to write a lady-like note, or read aloud a single page with right emphasis, ease and accuracy.

How can it be otherwise, when the young mind has to apply itself, during the limited term of school-study, to such a list of subjects as the following: Grammar, Ancient and Modern History, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Botany, Astronomy, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Physiology, Rhetoric, Composition, Elocution, Logic, Algebra, Geometry, Belles-Lettres!

The teacher is not to blame for this wretched system of cramming. He is compelled to present as formidable an array of knowledge to be acquired at his school, as his neighbors do; and most patiently and earnestly he may strive to aid his pupils in the acquisition. The evil is in the system itself, which substitutes names for things; which fails to recognize the necessity of adapting the kind of instruction to the quality of the mind. This formidable array of names, and superficial amount of instruction, is required by the community, and he is compelled to meet the demand; this system is radically wrong—no effort of the teacher can make it right.

But is this formidable amount of English branches the only burdens laid upon the child? We have not yet spoken of the accomplishments! accomplishments to be acquired with great labor, to a superficial extent, and laid aside directly the serious duties of life commence. French, Latin, Italian, perhaps Spanish, German and Greek—I believe Hebrew is not introduced in this country—vocal and instrumental music, piano, harp, guitar, drawing, painting, and various kinds of fancy work, swell the increasing list. Now many of these pursuits are beautiful and useful in themselves, and would refine and elevate life if acquired at the right time, in the right way. But as studied at present, added on to the burdens of the young school-girl, their acquisition is not simply useless; they consume much time, and thereby become highly injurious, by increasing still further the efforts of the mind, and preventing the slightest attention being given to the necessities of the body. The school-hour closes, the child returns home: not racing merrily along with shout and frolic—the little girl must not slide on the ice with boys—she must walk properly through the streets; she dines, and then there are lessons to be prepared for the next day: if she be a docile, obedient child, some hours will be spent in this preparation—if the instincts of nature are too strong, she will neglect the lessons, wander about the house, perhaps join in a game of play; and the next day she will suffer the penalty of a reproof from the teacher, for imperfect lessons, and the loss of her place in the class.

Perhaps the child is sent out to take a walk, on her return from school; but what is there attractive or invigorating in a walk through our streets? Can there be a more melancholy spectacle than a boarding school of girls, taking their afternoon walk? there is no vigor in their step, no pleasure in their eye; the fresh air is certainly good for their lungs, but the unattractive exercise is of the most questionable benefit.

There is little that is interesting to young girls in walking out without an object, they cannot play in the streets; their dress would be inconvenient; the mud and the carts, and the passengers, would prevent it. Children playing in the streets are nuisances; though we may watch with pleasure the lively moments of a group of boys, who have taken possession of a slippery pavement with their sleighs and skates, and though we would not for one moment dislodge them from their only play-ground—still they are out of place—and the unfitness would be still more striking, if the players were a group of girls, for there is an ideal of beauty in womanhood which may not be neglected, and our natural perception of fitness is always more outraged by coarse arrangements for girls than for boys. Our public squares do not afford the necessary opportunity for exercise. They are very few in number; they are public thoroughfares. Thus a quiet walk through the streets is the only resource for the young girls, and who can wonder that they find it more amusing to gaze in at shop windows, or lounge on the door step with young companions, or sit in a rocking-chair with a novel, than to take exercise in a dull street-walk. There is an entire neglect of all provision for the exercise of children in our city, that must not be overlooked by mothers. The ground has become so valuable, that the houses are crowded together: and with very few exceptions, the yards are laid out on the minutest pattern; exercise could not be taken in them, for they are the embodiment of dullness, shut in by brick walls; no room to run, hardly space for a swing. The old Dutch frame houses, that formerly stood in pleasant shaded gardens, on the little hills that diversified the island, have almost all disappeared: the island is fast becoming a dead level, and those pleasant gardens, with the wholesome breath of their trees and grass, have been dug away, with a short-sighted view of the greater profit to be derived from a row of brick houses. It is much to be regretted that some of those fine old gardens had not been retained for the benefit of children!

There is then for the school-girl, after the long hours of unnatural confinement, no opportunity given for the healthy action of those bodily powers which are, as we have seen, of the first importance to the young, whose neglect is the source of prolonged suffering and incapacity. There is no relief to the over-taxed mind—no excitement to the body whose powers have been so completely repressed. The child wakes in the morning, to dress and take her breakfast, and hurry off to school again. And often the toilette is hastily performed, the duties of cleanliness and order neglected, and the breakfast quickly swallowed, in defiance of the necessities of the stomach, in fear of being too late.

The food given to children is generally unsuited to their age, both in quality and quantity; we do not draw the necessary distinction between the youthful and adult natures, and though I would not vindicate the wisdom of our own food, there can be no doubt that such articles as coffee, hot bread, mingled butter and molasses, rich or highly spiced dishes, pickles, wine, pastry, are far more injurious to the young than to the old. Their food should be of the best quality, and wholesome unadulterated articles should be carefully selected, but it should be a plain description of food, well, but simply cooked.

They should be cautioned from eating food too hot; and from swallowing it hastily and half chewed—these habits injure both teeth and stomach; they may be entirely prevented by a little care, and the opposite habit regularly formed, will be a powerful safeguard from dyspepsia in later life.

Neither should children be allowed to eat large quantities; they require, as I have elsewhere shown, more food proportionally than the adult—and this should be given to them at regular but more frequent intervals.

We greatly injure children by neglecting these rules. In the ordinary school hours, the child remains for seven hours without any proper meal, for the luncheon taken to school is often hastily put up, and consists of some improper article; the pickles and candy that children frequently carry to school with them, are hardly more wholesome than the chalk, India rubber, and slate pencils, that they chew in such large quantities.

Thus under the combined influences of confinement and close air, of unsuitable food, and injudicious mental excitement, the school days pass; under such influences the child changes from a girl into a woman: such is the foundation laid for the important duties of adult life!

If we were to sit down and carefully plan a system of education, which should injure the body, produce a premature and imperfect development of its powers, weaken the mind, and prepare the individual for future uselessness, we could hardly by any ingenuity construct a system more admirably calculated to produce these terrible results. The stimulus applied to the young minds, the emulation excited, the very interest with which they take in many of their studies, become a powerful means for weakening the body—if the minds were not so much exerted—if the children were lazy or disobedient and would not learn, the same amount of mischief could not be done; but by their very conformity to rules, by striving to please their teachers and parents, and maintain an honorable position—they fall completely into the snare, and sin against nature, in exact proportion to their obedience to society!

It is in the boarding-school that this ruinous system of education attains its full force—for it is only there that the entire lives of the pupils are delivered up, for the time, to this one idea of so-called mental development. It is expected by the parents, that their children shall acquire so many branches and accomplishments in a given time; they are willing to pay high for the knowledge, but they will be much disappointed if the children do not display the worth of the money. To fulfil this expectation the teacher must utilize every moment, for the day is too short to get through the formidable list of studies. The time is laid out with the utmost regularity—early and late the child bends over her books or sits at the piano; the short time appropriated to exercise, is an interruption to the great business of the day, and is an unpleasant duty to all parties—for no child ever liked a boarding-school walk. The stimulus of rewards and punishments is freely applied, to urge on in the necessary direction—this stimulus is increased by the display of special exhibitions or examinations. The whole interest of the child is concentrated on its studies, for the distractions of home do not exist—the atmosphere of affection is not there, and if the moral tone of the school is good, study becomes its one idea.

I shall not speak of the frivolity and immorality which frequently exist in boarding-schools, though undoubtedly this association of children under such unnatural discipline, is calculated to weaken the moral sentiment, and produce a mental re-action in favor of weakness and folly. There is little religious influence exerted upon children at school. A formal prayer morning and evening, the repetition of Sunday's texts, or the occasional recital of a chapter in the Bible, is not the sort of instruction that will develop the religious nature of the child—the atmosphere which it breathes should be religious; it is only by the constantly exerted influence of religious natures, that children will grow in that direction. Frivolity and immorality are not necessarily connected with a well-conducted boarding-school; but the injury to the physical health is inevitable, it is a direct consequence of the system pursued, and too often the mind also is permanently weakened by the the very course adopted to strengthen it.

At 16, the girl's education, is often considered finished. At the very age, when, if a right system of physical and mental discipline had been pursued, she would have been prepared with a strong mind, in a strong body, to commence serious study, her education is pronounced finished, and she willingly lays aside her tasks to enter society more fully than was possible during the period of schooling. Henceforth pleasure is the chief object; for the plans that perhaps were formed, on leaving school, for reading and study, are never executed: the mind is not prepared to exert its powers alone. The knowledge already acquired has no connection with her present life—her social nature needs companionship; and the temptations of society are too strong to be long resisted.

And what has been gained during these long years of school, at such a sacrifice of physical strength? The logic has not taught her to reason well on any subject—the mental and moral philosophy will furnish her no guide to goodness or happiness—the chemistry will never aid her in the preparation of wholesome food, or taking stains out of her furniture—the botany will not render more interesting the country rambles that she does not care to take. She will never use her natural philosophy to make the fire burn, or ventilate her house. These studies will be completely dropped and soon forgotten—for they were learned too soon—the mind could not retain—they were acquired too superficially, too unpractically, to be of any use in strengthening the understanding, or aiding in daily life. The music may be useful in society, if there is any natural taste for it—if it is simply acquired with much drudgery, it will be at once dropped. The French will be of doubtful service—the young lady is too shy to speak it, if the occasion should present itself—if natural taste or circumstances induce her to persevere in its study, it may prove an elegant accomplishment, but, in general, that too is dropped. What then is made serviceable, out of the long list of studies—a little reading and writing (for it is very rare to find an elegant writer, still rarer, one who can read well aloud)—some arithmetic and the outlines of history and geography—this may be retained for life, and this is about all! Little real knowledge is gained, but an evil habit of mind has been acquired; a habit of careless, superficial thought, an inability to apply the mind closely to any subject—and this habit unfortunately cannot be dropped with the superficial acquirements which produced it. What a result is this, for years of time spent and much money surely we may call it a criminal waste of life!—Laws of Life, with a Special Reference to the Physical Education of Girls.

THE POWER OF KINDNESS.

We do not know the origin of the following article. It is excellent:—

A certain individual, whom we shall call Bullard, was one of the most cross-grained and peevish of men. It was misery to be near him. He grumbled and snarled incessantly, and found fault with every one and every thing around him. Nothing seemed to please him. He seemed to exist in one perpetual foment of irascible impatience, uncomfortable himself, and sowing the seeds of anger, fretfulness and discord wherever he appeared. His home was especially unhappy. Bitter retorts and passionate invectives obtained dominant sway. He constantly railed at his wife, and she replied in the same unloving strain; the children quickly imbibed a like vindictive habit, until such a thing as a pleasant look or kindly word was never known among them.

One day Mr. Bullard was returning to his cheerless dwelling, more feverish in temper than was his wont, in consequence of some disappointment, ready to vent his angry spleen upon his family as soon as he arrived. If the supper was not ready to sit down to at the very moment, he would almost turn the house upside down, and strike his wife to the quick with his taunting complaints. But chancing to approach a little sunny-haired girl, whose mild blue eyes and loving face were such a picture of bursting kindness as he had never seen before, an incident occurred which effected a complete revolution in his peevish frame of mind and planted a new feeling in his turbulent breast. The girl, and one, evidently her older brother, were playing with a small carriage; and, suddenly turning near a stone step, she accidentally struck the carriage against one corner, and broke it into atoms. In a passionate burst of anger, the boy advanced, and struck his sister a severe blow in the face with his clenched hand, and stamped his feet in a tempest of fury upon the ground.

But, instead of returning the blow and revengeful speech, after an involuntary cry of pain, the noble girl laid her hand gently on her brother's arm, and looking sorrowfully into his flushed face, softly said, "Oh, brother Tom! I did not think you would do that." In a moment, as if stung by a hot iron, the boy shrunk back, and hung his head in shame and conscience-stricken pain. Then he said, "Forgive me, dear Helen, I will never do it again." And scarce had the penitent words left his lips, when his sister's arms were thrown around his neck, and forgiveness sobbed on his breast. Here was a lesson for Bullard! At first he was quite stunned by it; he could not understand it. It was something utterly beyond his philosophy. But he felt that it had somehow done him good. Bit by bit, as he proceeded on, his own angry feelings vanished, till he felt more calm and kindly than he had done for years. Yea, he was softened to his heart's core, and he felt something very like moisture springing to his eyes.

Little noting the wonderful change which had taken place in her husband's temper, Mrs. Bullard was dreading his arrival home, for supper was not near ready, and she had had the misfortune to burn the cakes she had baked for that meal. And the children, copying from her, were unusually cross and bad. In vain she had scolded and whipped them; they only snarled and struck each other, and almost drove her distracted with their quarrelling confusion.

Mr. Bullard entered, and whatever could be the matter, Mrs. Bullard could scarcely give credit to her senses. Instead of dashing the door behind him in a pettish crash, and stamping his way forward to the kitchen, he took the crying baby from its bed, and hushed it with the softest and most endearing words he had ever used. And his face had a smile on it—a real, kind, sunshiny smile. What strange wonder was this? Mrs. Bullard was, at first, struck quite dumb with astonishment, and the children stared at their changed father as if at a loss to make the mystery out. He spoke, and actually said, "My dear Mary, is supper nearly ready? I'm as hungry as a hunter!"—Their wonder increased more and more. The children hardly seemed assured whether it was their father or not; and Mrs.

Bullard scarcely knew whether to believe in the evidence of her eyes and ears. But the change was real. Already a blessed feeling diffused through the family circle, like unto the falling of the morning dew, or the fragrant breath of summer flowers. At first, hesitatingly, Mrs. Bullard replied—"Supper will be ready directly. But I am so sorry these cakes are burned. Must Willie run to the bakery for a loaf?" "No, never mind," returned Mr. Bullard, "we can scrape off the burned part, and then they will taste as well as need be."

And taste as well they did, and better than cakes had tasted in the Bullard dwelling for a long time before. Not one jarring speech marred the pleasantness of that happy meal. Mr. Bullard's kindly speech and smiling face had descended to his wife, and from both became reflected in their children. The house looked brighter. The beautiful mantle of cheerfulness had fallen on it, and there was unutterable music in the very ticking of the old clock. Mrs. Bullard cried with delight, when she saw the baby crowing in its smiling father's lap; and he promised, if the elder ones would be good, to take them on a nice walk with him on the next Sabbath day. And she resolved never more to speak a peevish or angry word again, if constant watchfulness could prevent their utterance, but retain the peaceful happiness which only kind words and smiles can bring. A happy influence, too, was exerted on the children. They no longer saw peevishness and anger in their parents; and gradually, but surely, lost it in themselves. And Mr. Bullard, whenever he felt his old bad feelings rising up, to find an outer vent, called to mind the conduct of the blue-eyed girl, and resolutely crushed them down.

Reader, believe us, kind words are the brightest flowers of earth's existence; they make a very paradise of the humblest home the world can show. Use them, and especially round the fire-side circle. They are jewels beyond price, and more precious to heal the wounded heart, and make the weighed-down spirit glad, than all other blessings the earth can give.

PLANTS IN ROOMS.—The reason why plants fade so soon, is because due attention is not paid to them. The mere supplying with water is not sufficient. The leaves should be kept perfectly clean. "If as much washing were bestowed, in London," says Dr. Lindley, "upon a pot plant as upon a lap-dog, the one would remain in as good condition as the other. The reasons are obvious. Plants breathe by their leaves; and if their surface is clogged by dirt, of whatever kind, their breathing is impeded or prevented. Plants perspire by their leaves; and dirt prevents their perspiration. Plants feed by their leaves; and dirt prevents their feeding. So that breathing, perspiration, and food, are fatally interrupted by the accumulation of foreign matters upon leaves. Let any one, after reading this, cast an eye upon the state of plants in sitting-rooms or well-kept green-houses: let him draw a white kerchief over the surface of such plants, or a piece of smooth white leather, if he desires to know how far they are from being as clean as their nature requires."

TO AN ABSENT WIFE.

BY GEO. D. PRENTICE.

'Tis Morn:—the sea breeze seems to bring Joy, health, and freshness on its wing;
Bright flowers, to me all strange and new,
Are glittering in the early dew,
And perfumes rise from every grove,
As incense to the clouds that move
Like spirits o'er yon welkin clear,—
But I am sad—thou art not here!

'Tis Noon:—a calm, unbroken sleep
Is on the blue waves of the deep;
A soft haze, like a fairy dream,
Is floating over wood and stream,
And many a broad magnolia flower,
Within its shadowy woodland bower,
Is gleaming like a lovely star,—
But I am sad—thou art afar!

'Tis Eve:—on earth the sunset skies
Are painting their own Eden dyes:
The stars come down and trembling glow,
Like blossoms in the waves below,
And like an unseen sprite, the breeze
Seems lingering 'midst these orange trees,
Breathing its music round the spot,—
But I am sad—I see thee not!

'Tis Midnight:—with a soothing spell
The far-off tones of ocean swell—
Soft as a mother's cadence mild,
Low bending o'er her sleeping child;
And on each wandering breeze are heard
The rich notes of the mocking bird,
In many a wild and wondrous lay,—
But I am sad—thou art away!

I sink in Dreams:—low, sweet, and clear,
Thy own dear voice is in my ear:—
Around my cheek thy tresses twine—
Thy own loved hand is clasped in mine,
Thy own soft lip to mine is pressed—
Thy head is pillowed on my breast;
Oh, I have all my heart holds dear,
And I am happy—thou art here!

THE EMIGRANTS.

BY ALICE CAREY.

Don't you remember how oft you have said,
Darling Coraline May,
When the hawthorns are blossoming we shall be wed

And then to the prairie away!
And, now, all over the hills they peep
Milkwhite out of the spray,
And sadly you turn to the past and weep,
Darling Coraline May.

When the cricket chirped in the hickory blaze,
You cheerily sung you know—
Oh! for the sunnier summer days,
And the time when we shall go!
The corn blades now are unfolding bright,
While busily calls the crow,
And clovers are opening red and white,
And the time has come to go.

To go to the cabin our love has planned,
On the prairie green and gay,
In the blushing light of the sunset land,
Darling Coraline May.

How happy our lives will be, you said—
Don't you remember the day?
When our hands shall be, as our hearts are, wed—
Darling Coraline May.

How sweet you said when my work is o'er,
And your axe yet ringing clear,
To sit and watch at the lowly door
Of our home in the prairie, dear.
The rose is ripe by the window now,
And the cool spring flowing near:
But shadows fall on the heart and brow
From the home we are leaving here.

MORAL EXCELLENCE ATTAIN-ABLE BY ALL.

There are excellences which are not attainable by all. All cannot become poets, musicians, painters, sculptors, philosophers, statesmen, inventors, artificers. Education will put one in possession of his faculties, and secure a fair development of almost every power; but nature has a work to do first, and sometimes she lays the foundation for mediocrity alone. All the study, all the training in the world, will not make a Raphael or a Michael Angelo. Every man may be well-informed, sensible, discriminating. There are branches of knowledge which may be acquired by all, provided the needful labor be expended; and, perhaps, every man has a peculiar gift of some sort, but there are intellectual eyes which will take in at a glance what must always be hidden from common vision. There are souls to which the spirit of wisdom, of harmony, and of beauty, seems to be a peculiar possession. Shakspeare, Milton, Newton, Galileo, Watt, were educated in no school. Countless pupils grew up with them to their manliness of stature, but not to their manliness of mind. This seems to be the condition of things in the intellectual world. We think it can be shown, however, that such inequalities need not exist between men in moral or religious things—that God is rich unto all that call upon Him.

This may be thought a difficult point to establish. At first sight, facts appear to be against our assertion. Some appear to be naturally pious, devotional, conscientious, moral. Some happy natures seem to be sanctified almost from birth. As the germ of religion is implanted in every human being, so in many souls it is peculiarly rich and vigorous; those heavenly sentiments and affections that ennoble life are soon awakened, and the spirit is early dissatisfied with earth, and mourns over spiritual poverty, and hungers and thirsts after a spiritual, a right mind. He would be a bold man who should undertake to show that all natures are alike susceptible of religious impressions. Some children are reverential, conscientious, tender-hearted, beneficent, while others seem almost wholly destitute of these qualities. Talk to one of the Infinite Love that broods over him, and lavishes bounties with a liberal hand, and shines in the heart; the words will fall upon good ground, and the bright eye will be wet with warm, gushing tears. Another will scarcely hear what is said, much less understand or feel it. Hereditarily, or otherwise, the lower propensities are abundantly dealt out to some, whilst others recognize, and love upon the instant, everything good, true and beautiful.

All this must be admitted; and, in the natural condition of man, there are, certainly, great inequalities of endowment. And if we suffer things to have their own course, the inequality may always continue, or grow greater. But Religion forbids that nature should have its way, or things have their course. It enjoins a high aim and strenuous efforts. Every man is called to be ever better and better; and every man is empowered to become so. Growth in goodness is the duty, or we should rather say, the privilege of all. This is the highest attainment of which man is capable, yet it is an attainment within the reach of all. It will take different forms; it will express itself differently, according to individual peculiarities: but the spirit of growth and the attainment of goodness or excellence will be present in all the variant forms, degrees, and peculiar developments.

If growth in goodness and the attainment of moral excellence were not attainable by all, the want thereof could not be accounted a sin, as it is. Every man is under obligations to be good—to be holy. The privilege of continual progress in holiness or goodness is inseparable from our humanity. We are authorized, therefore, in entering upon the pursuit of spiritual excellence, as a thing attainable.

Religion addresses men variously gifted—the wise and the dull—the warm-hearted and the cold-hearted—the susceptible and those not easily impressed, and she says, “All of you may be, must be, ought to be, continually growing in grace and goodness—more and more perfect and complete in all the various developments of love to God and to man—more and more Christ-like in character and conduct. So far as nature serves, it is well; but when she fails, then call upon the God of nature, for He has promised to help you, and it is our duty and high privilege to become His sons—like to His holy family in Heaven. And when the attempt is really made to gain this prize, which is for all the world, we find that there are great compensations for seeming inequalities of natural endowment. Are the passions unruly, then there is strength of nature to be sanctified; they shall be elevated and converted into prevailing holy emotions. Imperfect natures are often the most glorious in their transformations. God chooseth the weak things of this world to confound the things which are mighty, so that when the command to be holy goes forth, we should not hesitate because of natural impediments, but remember that the resources of a nature allied to God are boundless, infinite as His law and His love. There are, indeed, numberless cold and worldly souls, to whom holiness, or the attainment of Christ-like excellence, must seem an impossibility, something beyond their utmost powers; they cannot, seemingly, rise above love of sect or party to love truth with disinterested affection; their love to God and man seems cold and powerless, notwithstanding all their wishes and efforts to the contrary. They cannot pray; their lives are conformed to the world. Still let them trust the good and gracious purposes of God, and pause before they renounce all claim to the great privilege of universal humanity. The untried often seems impossible; even the experience of the successful hardly assures us. But we must believe God. His purpose is to raise us ever nearer and nearer to Himself. However He may deal with the creature, His gifts to His children are impartial. He bestows upon all that blessed spirit which is His own fulness, and absorbs all distinctions, degrees and inequalities.

God does not call each one of us to be a great artist, poet, man of science, craftsman, or statesman. It may be strange that we have, so many of us, only one talent, though we have no right to complain, until we have faithfully used the one. But God does call each one of us to growth in grace and goodness, to eminence in saintship and all excellence. He furnishes abundantly for this end motives and means. He summons and helps the most humble to become spiritually great. He dwells with those who are of a contrite heart. He waiteth patiently on dullness and coldness, and aids in overcoming them. He calls all, and pleads with all, and has a way open for all. Whosoever will call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved; spiritual strength shall be given according to his faithfulness in the use of what he already has; spiritual signs and wonders shall be wrought in his behalf; and though once most wicked, or most worldly, he shall mount up, as on eagles' wings, towards the blissful habitation of the holy. For the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory; no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly.

THE OLD MAN'S BRIDE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER VII.

“Helen Lee must be sick,” said Fanny Milnor to her uncle, two days after Helen had been sent home through the storm in a carriage.

“Why do you think so?” asked Mr. Bullfinch, in a quick tone of voice, as if the suggestion had excited a sudden concern.

“This is her regular day for giving me a lesson. But she did not come. She has never missed before: I'm afraid she took cold from exposure on her last visit.”

The shadow, that concern had thrown upon the face of Mr. Bullfinch, instantly gave place to a smile.

“I hope not,” he said. “Some other reason may have prevented her from coming. She is, I think, a very excellent girl, Fanny.”

“So do I,” said Mr. Bullfinch, with considerable animation. “From the first I have observed her closely, and am convinced that she is a true-hearted, pure-minded, excellent young lady; thoroughly educated and accomplished, and fitted to adorn any station in life. Don't you think so, Fanny?”

“I have always thought so, and often said to myself, that if I were a young man, in search of a wife, I would, from among all my acquaintances, select Helen Lee.”

"Well said! Well said! You are a sensible girl." And Mr. Bullfinch rubbed his hands together in undisguised pleasure. "And you think she is sick?" he added, after a pause, and with a steady, meaning look.

"I'm afraid so," replied Fanny, thinking within herself that there was something unusual in the manner of her uncle.

"There is another reason, I presume, why she is not here," said Mr. Bullfinch.

"You think so?"

"Yes. And I'll tell you my thoughts a little farther, if you wish to hear them."

There was a look of mystery in the countenance of Mr. Bullfinch.

"What do you mean, uncle?"

"I don't think Miss Lee intends giving you any more lessons."

"Why? She gave me no such intimation."

"I believe it is her intention to give up the office of instructor altogether."

"Uncle! You surprise me. When did you hear this?"

"Yesterday."

"And is it so, really?"

"Yes."

"What is she going to do?"

"What a great many other lovely young creatures, just like her, have done before."

"Get married?"

"Yes."

"Why, uncle?"

"Any thing so surprising in that?"

"It is a little surprising that you should know all about it, while I never once suspected that an emotion so deep as that of love had passed over the calm surface of her virgin heart."

"And yet it is so."

"Who is the happy man, uncle? Is he worthy of her? Will she marry well?"

"I think so?"

The look and tone that accompanied this would have betrayed Mr. Bullfinch to any one else: but Fanny had not the remotest dream of the truth.

"I am surprised and delighted, Uncle Adam. But, how very close she has been about it! Ah! I never would have suspected her."

"You think her lover fortunate?"

"I do; very fortunate."

"He's a happy man, certainly. A prize like this is not often secured in a matrimonial lottery."

"Indeed it is not. But, why keep me in suspense, uncle? If you know the happy man, tell me his name."

"She is to be a very near neighbor of ours."

"Oh, uncle! Don't tease me in this way."

"A very near neighbor."

"How near? Next door?"

"Nearer than that."

The face of Fanny Milnor flushed, instantly, to a deep crimson. A suspicion of the truth had dawned upon her mind.

"Yes, nearer than that!" said Mr. Bullfinch, in a voice meant to confirm the impression which he now saw had taken hold of her mind.

"Speak plainly, Uncle Adam." The color had already faded from the cheeks of Fanny; while the whole expression of her countenance was changed.

"Plainly, then, Fanny; Miss Lee is soon to become mistress of this house. Have you any objection?"

"Oh, uncle! Can this be possible?" exclaimed the niece, in a distressed tone. "Surely you are trifling with me. You marry Helen Lee? Impossible!"

"It will certainly take place, Fanny. But why all this feeling on the subject? I can't understand it."

"She is but a child, uncle, and cannot marry a man of your age except from some low and debasing motive. She can have no love for you?"

"And why not, pray?" Mr. Bullfinch glanced at himself in a large pier mirror. "I am only in the prime of life; and my heart is as warm as ever—that never grows old."

"Believe me, uncle," said Fanny, speaking slow and impressively. "that no young girl ever marries an old man, except from a selfish motive. As to loving him truly, that is impossible, in the very nature of things."

"Nonsense! Nonsense, child!" replied Mr. Bullfinch, impatiently. "Mere lying romance. These marriages are always the happiest. I've seen a good many of them in my time, and never saw one that did not turn out well."

"I had a better opinion of Helen than this," said Fanny, speaking partly to herself. "She was poor: but I believed her virtuous."

"Virtuous!" exclaimed Mr. Bullfinch, with indignation—"How dare you question her angelic purity?"

"If," replied Fanny, speaking very firmly—"there were true maiden purity in her heart, she would never consent to such a union."

"Silence, Miss!" exclaimed Mr. Bullfinch, passionately. "Silence, I say! How dare you speak thus, and to my face, of the woman who is soon to become my wife!"

And the old man, overcome with excitement, stalked around the room, throwing his arm about impotently.

"You will not marry this girl, Uncle Adam," said Fanny, in a pleading, affectionate voice, taking hold of the old man's arm in a fond manner, after his anger had in a measure subsided.

"And why will I not, pray? Haven't I told you that it is all settled?"

"Oh no, no, uncle! I will not believe it."

"You must believe it," replied the old man, positively: "for as sure as you are living, it will take place."

Fanny withdrew her grasp from his arm, and stepped back as if she had been repulsed by a strong hand.

"You are fully in earnest in this?" said she.

"I was never in my life more in earnest about anything," was the firm reply.

"Enough. When she enters this house as your wife, I leave it forever. I could not live beneath the same roof with a creature who had so forgotten all that belonged to her as a woman."

"You are beside yourself, Fanny. You don't know what you are talking about," said Mr. Bullfinch, in a perplexed tone of voice. He was in no way prepared for an alternative like this. "Am I not free to do as I list? And is not Helen free to make her choice in life, without becoming the subject of false judgment from her own sex? How dare you question the purity of her motives! An angel is not purer. As to leaving my house, Fanny, that is a threat I am sorry to hear you make. You have been to me as a very dear child, and I would still cherish you as such. No one can take your place in my heart. But, if you turn from me, if you go out from beneath the roof that has so long sheltered you, and would shelter you still, the loss, the evil, be on your own head. I am not to be turned from a right purpose by any threat like this—the hasty threat of a capricious girl.”

“I have said it, uncle, and I will abide by it,” was the calm, resolute answer. “If I remain, she must be my companion and equal. But, I hold her to be unworthy of that relation.”

“She is quite as good as you are,” said Mr. Bullfinch, angrily.

“So I would have said an hour since, but I did not know her then. A veil has fallen from before my eyes, and now she stands revealed in her true character.”

“What folly for you to talk in this way! You know her to be pure and good, and in every way worthy your companionship.”

“I thought her so until now. But, henceforth, I can only regard her as unworthy—as having been false to her maiden instincts—as being influenced in an act, which should be the highest, purest and holiest in woman’s life, by the most sordid and mercenary motives. She will not marry you because she loves you, but because you are rich. Aug! I shudder at the thought. How can you respect her? And you would place her side by side with me, as a companion and an equal! But I cannot permit it, uncle. I will not so degrade myself.”

“You jump to conclusions. You judge harshly, Fanny,” said Mr. Bullfinch, speaking with much feeling. “Why not judge a sister maiden with more charity? In supposing reasons for her conduct, why not suppose such as are good?”

“Because I cannot,” was replied. “Some acts are never to be misjudged. They always spring from wrong motives; this is one of them.”

“You try me beyond endurance, by this perverseness!” exclaimed the old man again, losing command of himself. “Your language I regard as an insult to myself, and an outrage upon one about to hold to me the closest relation in life. I will hear no more of it. What I have announced will soon take place. By that time I trust you will have become wiser and more discreet. If not, the consequences must rest on your own head. Things have come to a pretty pass, when a strip of a girl like you attempts to lecture me after this fashion, and to threaten what she will do, if my conduct doesn’t just please her fancy! A nice state of things, indeed! A nice state of things,—let me hear no more of it!”

Fanny bowed, silently, her head upon her bosom, and stood, without speaking, for a few moments. Then she left the room and sought her own chamber, where, sinking into a chair, she burst into a wild passion of tears, and wept bitterly for a long time.

The bark Mr. Bullfinch had launched on the sea of love, was not destined to glide so smoothly along the rippling surface as he had hoped. Already an adverse wind had rudely fluttered the sails, while a cloud, threatening many future storms, was lowering over the sky. Opposition on the part of Fanny, he had not once anticipated. He knew that she was attached to Helen, and had, besides, a respect for her amounting to deference. He had not in the least doubted, that when she came to know that Helen was to be an inmate of their home, holding the high relation of his wife, that she would receive the announcement with unalloyed pleasure, as has been seen; but, he was destined to be bitterly disappointed. Several things that Helen said smarted his feelings, while others excited no very pleasant thoughts. That his marriage with a girl, whose years numbered scarcely a third of his own, had produced so marked a feeling of reprobation on one mind, did not flatter him much as to the general impression the act would produce. Yet, for all this, he did not once think of looking back. The good he sought was, in his estimation, too great to be bartered for such lighter drawbacks as these.

CHAPTER IX.

Opposition from those who deemed the act almost sacrilegious, availed not. Helen had betrothed herself, and, true to her extorted vow, was not to be held back from the consummation thereof. In love to her parents, she was about to offer herself up in an unholy sacrifice. As Mr. Bullfinch had said, he called to see her at her father’s house, on the evening that followed the day of her promise to marry him. To Mr. Lee he did not hesitate to declare the purpose of his visit. He met with a much more decided opposition in that quarter than he had expected. Mr. Lee at once avowed his utter repugnance to such an unnatural and impure union; and solemnly urged Mr. Bullfinch to reconsider the matter, and, with a noble magnanimity, release his unhappy daughter from her engagement.

“Does she wish to be released?” was the reply of Mr. Bullfinch to this. They were alone when the question was asked.

“Oh, sir!” returned Mr. Lee, eagerly, “you need only look at her changed countenance for an answer. Believe me, sir, that she is laboring under some mental hallucination. Never, never, were her mind perfectly clear, and evenly balanced, would she consent to the formation of so unnatural a union. Never would she take upon herself holy vows that can never be kept.”

“Never kept! What am I to understand by this, Mr. Lee?” said Mr. Bullfinch.

“In the marriage service,” replied Mr. Lee, “a woman promises to love and honor her husband.”

“Well, sir, well?” Mr. Bullfinch spoke with a slight show of impatience.

“Honor and love must be spontaneous.”

“Well?”

“You cannot extort them.”

“No; certainly not—certainly not.”

“Are you willing to marry a woman, who, in the very nature of things, can neither love nor honor her husband?”

“I need not answer the question,” replied Mr.

Bullfinch. "No man would be so great a simpleton."

"Believe me, sir," said Mr. Lee, solemnly, "that, if you commit the fatal error of making this young girl your wife, you will be in the unhappy position I have supposed."

Mr. Bullfinch smiled with a self-satisfied air, as he answered—

"You cannot frighten me from my purpose, Mr. Lee. Suggestions like these do not in the least alarm me. I believe I know Helen too well to doubt her truly wife-like qualities. I am extremely sorry that your hearty approval is not on our side. It should be; for opposition will only mar your daughter's happiness. Of one thing you may be very certain:—I will love and care for her with a tenderness and devotion never exceeded. She will be to me as the apple of an eye. My every thought will turn towards her. My very life will be devoted to her pleasure. I have wealth—and that will be at her command. Her love for her parents exceeds all selfish considerations. At once she will have it in her power to gratify this love; and in seeking that gratification, she will ever have a prompter in me. Surrounded by every external good, how can she fail to be happy? And how can she fail to love the hand that joyfully lays all these blessings at her feet? She cannot, Mr. Lee, she cannot."

"Do not deceive yourself, Mr. Bullfinch," answered Mr. Lee; "for deception in a matter like this proves utterly disastrous. It takes more than wealth to buy the love of a true woman; and you will find it so in the end. Heart-affinities are governed by laws over which we have little control. Love-fires, that kindle not, though we blow with never so much ardor, often shoot up into a broad, bright, never-dying flame, at a single breath."

Still the old man wavered not.

"Do you know," said Mr. Lee, as a new suggestion was flung into his mind—he spoke without due consideration—"that, in all marriages of youthful maidens with men far advanced in years, the young wife is subject to severe temptations?"

"From what source?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, in a quick voice.

"A maiden's affections are not under her control." As Mr. Lee commenced speaking, his wife, who had been in conference with her daughter, came into the room where they were sitting. "Few reach the age of Helen without a lover, young in years, like themselves. If the heart-impression be not too deeply made, a first lover may give place to a second; but the second, like the first, must be in the freshness and beauty of early manhood. An old man cannot take the place of either of these; because, in him, there can be no reciprocity. The fires of love are burning in a clear, bright flame on the altar of one heart, while, upon the other, lie only the black and smoking remnants of an offered sacrifice. What, then, is the natural consequence of a union between the old and the young? Need I say? Does not your own mind instantly see the danger? An old husband and a young lover!"

"Has your daughter a young lover?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, with more calmness than he felt. These suggestions of Mr. Lee disturbed him far more than he chose to let be seen.

"Few reach her age without a lover, as I have just remarked," was the evasive reply.

"But you do not answer my question," said Mr. Bullfinch.

"If my observation be correct, her heart is not altogether free."

"Mr. Lee!" exclaimed the mother of Helen. "How can you speak so? No one has visited her but young Harry Wellford, if the few calls he has made can be called visits. And he's nobody. I was so vexed at his assurance, last night, in asking for her, that I shut the door in his face."

"Henry Wellford?" said Mr. Bullfinch, musingly, and he repeated the name over two or three times to himself. "Oh, ah!" he remarked, at length, "the young man who lives with Vincent."

"The same," replied Mr. Lee.

"He's nobody," replied Mr. Bullfinch, in a contemptuous manner. And yet Mr. Lee had planted a seed of jealousy in the old man's heart. How long it remained there without germinating, our story in its progress will show.

"You may well say that," spoke up Mrs. Lee, warmly; "I wonder my husband could refer to him at all. A mother, Mr. Bullfinch, ought to know something as to the state of her daughter's affections; and if my observation is worth anything at all, you may rest satisfied that Helen has never had a lover. In taking her for a wife, you may be certain of getting an undivided heart."

Mr. Lee said no more. He saw that opposition would avail not; and was already aware that he had said too much, in his intimation that his daughter had a lover. This intimation might be, he now perceived, the germ of trouble in the future. It was an evil seed, and might produce a harvest of misery. The thought oppressed and silenced him.

"We had better be friends in this matter," said Mr. Bullfinch, speaking with exceeding blandness. "Friends, not in a mere repression of antagonisms, but in a hearty good will. I wish to be so. In regard to my marriage with your daughter, that is a matter settled beyond a question. If you throw impediments in the way, it will avail nothing, and only produce unhappiness. For your daughter's sake, then, give your full and free consent to this union. I will stand responsible for her happiness."

Mr. Lee said nothing, but sat with his feeble body crouched in his chair, his head bent forward, and his eyes upon the floor. Opposition he felt to be hopeless, and he could not speak consenting words. Oh! how weak and hopeless he felt! He had been stricken down by poverty and disease, and could not rise again. How he panted, in spirit, for the old ability—for the vigor of early manhood, when a strong will had ready hands to do its bidding. Had these been with him, how indignantly would he have rebuked the old sensualist, and spurned him from under his roof.

The father was silent, but the weak mother consented to the sacrifice of her child, and consented with more of pleasure than pain; for, in her imagination, were bright pictures of the future, a future for herself as well as her daughter. By Helen's elevation, she would rise, and far above the present condition of hopeless strife with poverty. The mere worldly woman saw, in what the world had to offer, the greatest good. Ah!

how often, during some twenty-five years of their married life, had the husband of this woman sighed, as he looked into her mind for higher, better, and purer instincts, and found them not! How sad he sometimes felt, in his little world at home! She, whom he had chosen as a life-companion, with whom he had hoped to form a true interior marriage union, had no appreciation of spiritual good—saw no desirableness in the higher truths that were to him so full of beauty. In what he loved, she saw nothing lovely; and, therefore, there was not with them that interior conjunction of thought and affection which constitutes a true marriage. He was in the love of growing wise—wise in the true sense, for he sought that wisdom which the world calls foolishness—but she did not love his wisdom; and, therefore, she was only adjoined to him, as it were, externally. Thus had they passed through life, and the world regarded them as most happily united, as presenting an instance of true conjugal unity. How many are like them! But the worldly-mindedness is not always on the woman's side.

CHAPTER X.

An early marriage was urged by Mr. Bullfinch. Helen, after being repeatedly asked to fix the time when it should take place, finally named a day six months in advance. Against so long a postponement, the ardent lover strongly remonstrated; but Helen remained immovable. She wished to put off the dreaded time as long as possible, and she had fixed the utmost limit. Beyond that, she knew it would be useless to go. Rapidly enough for her approached the day. All the lessons she was engaged in giving were completed up to the termination of the respective quarters, except those of Fanny Milnor. The reason for omitting these is already known to the reader. Two or three times Mrs. Barker approached her on the subject; but Helen invariably declined to hold any conversation thereon whatever. Her appearance had undergone considerable change. Every one remarked this. And yet, all could not see, beneath her partially disguised exterior, the unmistakable signs of unhappiness. Her face did not recover the warm hue that once gave it a softened, almost transparent beauty. It was uniformly pale. But her eyes were larger and brighter from this very paleness. Her step was firmer, and her bearing prouder than before—almost haughty at times; and at times, defiant. Having consented to take a false position in the world, she was steadily repressing all the gentler qualities of her nature, and putting on, as a coat of mail, a composed exterior. Day by day she laid her hand firmly upon her heart, to repress its natural emotions; and day by day she gained some new power over herself—some new ability to seem what she was not. As much to acquire this power, as from an instinctive repugnance to the contemplated union, had Helen deferred her marriage as long as possible.

Thus false to herself, and false to the world, the unhappy maiden prepared herself for the coming sacrifice, thinking often of the fate of Jephthah's daughter, as one full of pleasantness compared with her own. No one comprehended her state of mind—no one saw through the false exterior she had assumed, but her father. His eyes had a deeper penetration—the power of spiritual discernment. The heart she hid from others lay all open to him, and he saw, half palsied and crushed as it lay in her bosom, that its low, tremulous throb was born of exquisite pain. How many times did he seek a conference with her on the subject of her approaching marriage, in the hope of inducing her, at all hazards, to break the chords by which she was bound—the chords of an extorted promise—ere to struggle against their sharp bondage were utterly vain! But on this subject she would hold no communion with any one. Money, freely supplied by Mr. Bullfinch, even though the hand filled with gold were pushed back often and again, was bringing every external comfort to their household; and the regular attendance of one of the most skilful physicians in the city, sent by the same interested friend, was mitigating the violence of a disease under which Mr. Lee was fast wasting away: these were the accumulating obligations that, to Helen, gave to her promise of marriage a still more binding force. The question of escape from the hopeless future was no longer debated in her mind; and she would not suffer it to be opened.

"God will give me strength equal to my day." Thus she would seek to fortify herself, when thoughts of the coming self-devotion pressed upon her too heavily, and imagination drew too vivid pictures of the approaching reality. Ah! how can we hope for strength from above, when we enter upon trials not sanctioned by Heaven? If we take the current of Providence, that will never bear us out upon a sea where we needs must perish amid whirlpools of passion, or on the breakers of crime; but, if we choose a wrong course, no matter how specious may be the false persuasion under which we act, there is for us no safety. We look, in sure confidence, to God for strength.

The time wore on. The fond old lover made almost daily visits to the house of his affianced bride, where he was received by Mrs. Lee ever with a smiling and wordy welcome; by Helen, with a calm, dignified, almost repulsive politeness; and by Mr. Lee with a subdued toleration, that, while it seemed not to be noticed by Mr. Bullfinch, was treasured up never to be forgotten nor forgiven.

There was one thing that fretted the old man not a little. Often and often as he had tried to persuade Helen to appear with him abroad, he had never been able to induce her to go upon the street with him, or to appear in any public place, since she had consented to become his wife. Earnest persuasion, and the exhibition of a half-offended manner, alike failed to influence her.

"This is all wrong," said her mother, more than once, after Mr. Bullfinch had retired. "You are soon to become his wife. Do you never intend to go out with him?"

"When I am his wife, mother," she usually replied, "I will try, to the best of my ability, to do a wife's duty. Now, as a maiden, I wish to reserve a maiden's privilege."

It mattered not how warmly Mrs. Lee opposed this state of feeling in her daughter, it was of no avail; little beyond the reply just given was ever urged in self-justification.

And so the time wore on, until the day of sacrifice was at hand:

The opposition shown by Fanny Milnor to this unnatural union, did not subside like a sudden outburst of passion. She thought and felt correctly in the beginning, from her true woman's instinct. She knew that no young girl could love an old man, like her uncle, as a wife should love her husband; and it was, therefore, the instant conclusion of her mind, that Helen Lee, in consenting to such a relation, must be influenced by an unworthy motive. All respect for Helen died instantly in her bosom, and in its place was kindled a strong aversion, that daily gained strength. Several times her uncle had sought to approach her on the subject of his marriage, but she would hold no intercourse with him on that theme. As for herself, she had marked out the course she would pursue—marked it out in the beginning. When Helen entered the home of her uncle, as its future mistress, she would go out therefrom to return no more. Mr. Bullfinch did not believe that she would carry out her declaration. He regarded it as the hasty threat of a young girl, to be receded from almost as soon as uttered. But he was in error here.

Not wholly dependent on her uncle was Fanny. She had a small income, not beyond a few hundred dollars, secured to her from the shattered estate of her father, who had died when she was a child. Her uncle not being her legal guardian, this money had been regularly paid into her hands, since she became old enough to receive it, and was entirely at her disposal. This resource made the way before her much clearer, as she thought upon the future. It did not, however, in the least influence her decision. Such was the disgust of her soul at the marriage about to take place, that she would have gone out from her uncle's roof, though she knew not where to lay her head.

And what of Henry Wellford? Since the time he saw Helen in the street, on the day of his good fortune, his eyes had not rested upon her. Twice, after that evening, had he called at her father's house, to be, each time, repulsed by Mrs. Lee, and, on the last occasion, with the cutting words—

"You needn't come hear any more. Helen doesn't want to see you."

How dark, and cold, and cheerless, seemed all the world to him, as, after this harsh repulse, he went wandering about the streets aimlessly, and conscious only of a heavy weight upon his bosom. Late at night he sought his pillow, and, in half-waking dreams, passed the hours, till morning came with a sense of relief. No further effort was made by him to see Helen at the residence of her father; but many an hour lingered he in and around the neighborhood, after night had closed in; but he lingered in vain. That form, fairer to him than the world's highest type of beauty, blessed not his longing vision. Never was he upon the street, by day or by night, that his eyes searched not, constantly, for Helen. But, neither afar off nor nigh at hand did she appear, and his heart grew sick in its deferred expectations. And so the time passed with him. Yet, a whisper of what was to take place—of the destiny of his soul's bride—came not to his ears.

CHAPTER XI.

The six months probation is over, and, in that time, Helen Lee has gained a power over her feelings far greater than she had ever hoped to achieve. Her face is a little paler than it was, but shows no signs of the weakness and weariness that once rested there almost continually. Her eyes do not droop meekly and maidenly, as of old, but are larger and steadier in their gaze. At times they are fixed and musing; and always they seem as if looking away from the present, seeking to penetrate the future, or resting on the past. Beautiful she is to look upon; beautiful with what some would call a proud, high-born beauty. She never speaks, except with a smile. Ah! it is not the smile of old. She has taught her lips that smile, and they have learned their lesson well: though, far from perfectly.

Mr. Bullfinch is proud and happy. He calls to see her daily, and she receives him with a pleasant, yet subdued manner, and speaks to him with the smile she has taught her lips. He believes that it but reflects her feelings. He talks of the future—of the happy day now at hand, and she compels herself to join in with him, and to make such responses as she thinks he will best like to hear. She is still schooling herself—still conning her lesson—still rehearsing for the great appearance, when she is to come before the world as the wife of Adam Bullfinch. When her heart flutters, she lays her hand upon her bosom, and by an external and an internal pressure at the same time, subdues it into quietude. Great power over herself has she gained; yet, oh! by what an intense struggle—and of what long continuance!

According to arrangement, a few friends are to be at the residence of Mr. Bullfinch, to receive him and his bride. The marriage is to take place at the house of Mr. Lee, and then all are to go in company to their future home. Instead of two households, there is to be, from this time, but one. Helen has stipulated from the first, that her home is to be that of her parents; and she will not go to the dwelling of her husband, even on her bridal night, except they go with her.

In view of the almost immediate consummation of a union, against which his feelings still revolt, Mr. Lee, who is very weak, from bodily illness, finds himself in such a state of nervous agitation, that he can scarcely trust his voice in words.

"My dear, dear child!" he sighs often to himself, "to think it should come this! Oh! If I had but health and strength!"

He wanders about uneasily, or sits for many minutes at a time, motionless, his eyes gazing vacantly.

"Poor child!" he murmurs—"Poor child!" Yet not so audibly as to be heard either by his wife or Helen. He has no sympathy from the one, and he tries to be cheerful with the other.

And all this while the minutes are gliding away, and the appointed hour approaches.

Dressed for the bridal, Helen asks to be left alone for the half hour that is to elapse, ere she stands at the altar. How that brief season is spent we know not. It is past, and she is leaving, for the last time, her chamber. There are traces of tears on her cheeks—her eyes are humid and red—but her lips are firm, though her cheeks are white; her step is steady, and her bearing one of entire self-possession.

Below she is met and received by the happy bridegroom, looking younger by ten years or more. He is dressed with great care, and more in the fashion of a man of twenty-five, than of one past three score. What a light comes into his seamed and age-marked face, as he grasps the hand she yields passively!

How pleased the mother looks! Dim-visions, through selfish worldly-mindedness, she sees only a sunny future for herself and child. They are no longer to be crushed beneath the iron heel of poverty—no longer to sit under the shadow of a boding cloud. She is ready to give her daughter away, untroubled by fears for the future. It is not so with Mr. Lee. His eyes are moist with tears. He does not speak to Helen, for he knows that a sob would choke the words, if he attempted an utterance. He could not feel sadder if he were gazing upon her beautiful face, cold as marble, and eternally calm in the repose of mortality.

And with no one to lift a voice and forbid the offering up of a young heart, the sacrifice is made. Mute are the bride's responses, yet none the less binding. How passionless her face, as she receives the kissing salutations of husband and friends. She smiles—it is her lesson—but how cold the rays of light that faintly quiver on her beautiful countenance! Mr. Bullfinch accepts them as from the heart; the mother persuades herself that her daughter is pleased, if not as happy as she will be; but the agonized father is looking down into the desolate, hopeless bosom of his wretched child, searching there, but vainly, for a single green spot made fresh by a ray of sunshine.

CHAPTER XII.

Since the exciting interview between Adam Bullfinch and his niece, occasioned by his avowal of his purpose to marry Helen Lee, no word on the subject had passed between them, further than the simple announcement of the former as to the time when the marriage would take place, and his desire to have certain preparations made for the bride's reception.

It by no means escaped the uncle's observation, that Fanny was altogether changed from her former self. She was as kind in manner to him as before, and as much devoted to his wants and comfort; but her cheerfulness was gone, and she spent much of her time alone. More frequently than of old, did she decline entering into public and social amusements; and even when strongly urged by Mr. Bullfinch to go out with him, persisted in remaining at home.

Mr. Bullfinch had completed his toilette, after more than two hours of time devoted to his person. The carriage stood at the door, waiting to convey him to the residence of his bride elect, and now he descended to the drawing-rooms, where he expected to find his niece. She was not there, however. He sent to her room, and she returned for answer that she was engaged, and wished to be excused.

"Tell her that I wish to see her particularly," he returned to this message. In a few minutes, Fanny came down. Her face wore a troubled expression.

"Fanny," said Mr. Bullfinch, taking her hand, "have I not always been kind to you?"

"Oh, yes, dear uncle! kind as a father could have been," quickly replied his niece, speaking with concealed agitation.

"I could not have loved my own child better than I have loved you," said Mr. Bullfinch, tightening his grasp upon her hand that remained in his.

Fanny leaned her face against him, and sobbed.

"Dear child!" said Mr. Bullfinch, affectionately, laying his hand upon her head. "You are wrong," he added, after a few moments, "to fret yourself about this matter—very wrong. I will love you none the less. Do not let your mind be warped by a false judgment of Miss Lee. Believe me, she is pure as an angel. You will soon be as tenderly united sisters."

Mr. Bullfinch could feel the quiver that ran through the frame of his niece. But she answered not to his words.

"A few friends will be here," he continued. "Be cheerful with them. Do not, for my sake, let any one see that you are opposed to what I am doing. By eight o'clock we will be here. Let Helen find you in our chamber; and, Fanny, love, I beg of you to receive her frankly, kindly—may I not say with affection?"

But Fanny made no reply, nor did she lift her head.

"I will trust you to do what is right," said Mr. Bullfinch, after waiting some time for a response. "I know that you will not disregard my wishes. Good bye for a little while."

And, as he spoke, he lifted her concealed face, and left, on her wet cheek, an earnest kiss.

Mr. Bullfinch passed from the house, and Fanny returned slowly to her chamber. Here she did not long remain passive. Two large trunks were in the middle of the floor, both nearly filled with clothing; and to the work of packing these, which her summons to the parlor had interrupted, she again applied herself. Not much remained to be done. Drawers and wardrobe were nearly empty. Soon this work, indicating a hurried departure, was over. Then a note was penned, sealed, and directed—HELEN LEE. This she placed in the bridal chamber.

Twilight was falling; and now another carriage stood before the dwelling of Adam Bullfinch. Upon this was placed the two trunks that Fanny had packed with her clothing. A brief time was spent in giving needful directions for the reception of company; and, then, entering the carriage, Fanny Milnor departed from the home of her childhood and youth, and, with a troubled heart, went forth into the world, and alone.

An hour afterwards, the old man brought home his bride.

"Fanny! Fanny, love!" he called, as, on entering the rooms above, to make preparation for joining the already assembled friends, he missed the expected presence of his niece.

Even, as he spoke, the pale bride saw the note inscribed with her name. Taking it hurriedly, and with a foreshadowing of its meaning, she broke the light seal, and read:—

"Helen Lee! or, must I write, Mrs. Bullfinch! One word, on your entering this, my old and happy home, to become its mistress. I need not tell you, who must know the truth too well, that you do not and cannot love and honor my uncle as a true wife must ever love and honor her husband. I need not tell you, that unworthy motives have influenced you in the step you have taken. That some mere worldly and external good has prompted the act—for all this you must know but too well. If your pillow do not prove one of thorns, then are your maidenly instincts dead. If the fruit you have plucked turn not to ashes in your mouth, happy are you—thrice happy! Budding youth and blighted old age! Spring and Autumn! Unnatural union! It cannot find favor in the sight of Heaven. But my feelings are carrying me away. As you enter, to become the mistress of this house, I go forth into the world, alone. We cannot live beneath the same roof, for I despise you! And, yet, for the old man you have consented to wed, let me ask something. I have loved him as a child, and as a child have ever sought his comfort. The duty was one full of pleasure, for love makes labor light. With you, all will be cold task-work. You do not love him as a wife—you cannot. Oh, Helen! Helen! why did you do this? I thought you wiser and better. He is old, with habits as fixed as iron; and if you do not bend to these—if you do not live in daily self-denial, you will both be wretched. I tremble as I think of this. Shall I write more? In vain! in vain! FANNY."

The whole of this letter Helen seemed to take in at one eagle glance. Then it was crumpled in her hands and thrust, with a passionate gesture, into her bosom. Encased as she had thought her heart to be in a rocky crust, these sentences, like heavy strokes, broke through to the sealed fountain, and there was a wild gush of feeling.

"What is it? what does it mean? where is Fanny?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, greatly disturbed.

But Fanny did not appear, and Helen made no response, beyond her sobs and tears. The bell was rung violently by Mr. Bullfinch.

"Where is Fanny?" he asked of the servant who soon after entered.

"She went away, in a carriage, nearly an hour ago," was answered to this enquiry.

"Gone away! Where did she go? Speak!"

But the servant could give no information.

"Was that note from her?" enquired the excited uncle, turning to Helen, as he spoke. His tones were sharp and imperative.

"It was," sobbed Helen.

"Let me see it."

Helen placed her hand on her bosom, and felt the crumpled letter beneath her dress, but did not comply with the demand.

"Quick! Let me see the letter!" said the old man, passionately.

"It is addressed to me," replied Helen, now gaining a little self-possession, and speaking with some firmness.

"I don't care who it is addressed to, let me see it!" exclaimed Mr. Bullfinch; in the excitement of the moment, forgetting even a decent regard for his young bride, or her parents, who, in the adjoining room, were appalled witnesses of the scene.

Not from hurried thoughts, but from a woman's quick instincts, Helen decided her course of action. Already there was an unwarrantable assertion of authority over her, to which she could not yield. As she would act in the future, so she acted now. Passive and silent she sat, her tears suddenly dried up, and lifted her eyes until they rested upon the red and almost distorted face of her husband. Under his angry glare, they did quail a moment.

"The note is addressed to me, Mr. Bullfinch," she said, at length, "and I cannot show it. No doubt, Fanny has made, or will make, a communication for you also. She has left your house, because I am about to come into it. Of where she has gone, or what she will do, she says nothing to me. Beyond this, you have no interest in her letter."

The calm dignity and self-possession of his young wife instantly subdued the over-excited old man. He saw that he was wrong, and that he had made an exhibition of himself, ever to be regretted. Still, he was deeply disturbed by the unexpected departure of his niece; so much so, that he found it almost impossible to assume anything like a composed exterior. A confused, but not over hearty, apology was made, both to Helen and her parents. Soon after, all descended, and received, from the few friends of Mr. Bullfinch, who had come to honor the occasion, their wordy congratulations.

How that embarrassing evening was passed—embarrassing to all parties—we will not describe. At an early hour, the guests retired, feeling a sense of relief as they gained the open air, and talking ominously of the young bride's future, as they moved away. And, in truth, the promise was not fair.

CHAPTER XIII.

The sun of fortune was rising on Henry Wellford. He had now been six months in the house of Lane & Latta, and so trusty and capable was he, that his new employers had already raised him to a more responsible position. In doing this, an ulterior purpose was in their minds. They wished to test his higher abilities. They had business views beyond their present operations, which, if carried out, would require one of the partners to reside abroad. Before this change was made, they had decided to bring in a third partner, a young and active man, to take the place of Mr. Latta, who designed being absent. Of all their clerks, no one possessed just the qualities they desired except Wellford; and their test of his higher abilities proved altogether satisfactory. Accordingly, the offer of a partnership in the house, with a fair per centage on the profits, was made and accepted. The young man was taken altogether by surprise at this new stroke of good fortune. He understood the business and resources of the house well enough to know, that, as an integral part thereof, his own permanent prosperity was secured. Even from the beginning, should no unforeseen drawback occur, his dividend could not fall short of two or three thousand dollars.

How quickly turned his thoughts to Helen Lee, when, through this new vista, reaching into the future, light dawned upon him! Good fortune seemed a double blessing when he thought of her as sharing therein.

Never, since he was so insultingly repulsed by Mrs. Lee, had Wellford called at the residence of his heart's idol; and never since then had he been so fortunate as to meet her on the street, though hour after hour, many and many a time, he walked the pavement in neighborhoods where he hoped she might be; yet searched for her thus in vain. Of what was passing in regard to her, not a whisper had reached him. Nor had the faintest imagination of the truth crossed his mind.

"More good fortune, mother," said the young man, in a gay voice, on returning home after receiving the proposition from Lane & Latta, to which we have referred.

Mrs. Wellford lifted her pleasant, cheerful face, and looked earnestly into the animated countenance of her son, but without speaking.

"More good fortune, mother," he repeated. "And what do you think it is?"

"I'm sure I cannot tell, my son," was the quiet response.

"No, I'm sure you cannot," said Henry. "Would you believe it? They've offered me a partnership."

"Who?" quickly asked Mrs. Wellford.

"Lane & Latta," replied Henry, struggling to appear composed, yet betraying his emotion.

"You are not in earnest, surely, my son!" replied Mrs. Wellford, in a voice that was now unsteady.

"Entirely in earnest, mother. Mr. Latta is going to London to reside, as a representative of the house abroad. They do not wish to fill his place here, which is a most important one, with an irresponsible clerk, and so have determined to take in a partner."

"And they have chosen you?" said Mrs. Wellford, eagerly.

"They have, mother."

"It seems incredible, my son." Mrs. Wellford's voice trembled. "O, do not let this good fortune uplift your mind too greatly."

"Do not fear for that," said Henry, speaking now in a more subdued tone. "I have enough to keep my thoughts sober."

Both were silent for some moments.

"Mother," said the young man: his voice was low, hesitating and unsteady—"Mother, there is one thing of which I have never spoken to you."

"What is that, my son?"

"You have seen Helen Lee."

"Oh yes."

"For a long time she has been very dear to me, mother."

Mrs. Wellford did not look surprised, but waited, in silence, for her son to proceed.

"Very dear, mother," he repeated. "But, for the curse of poverty," (he spoke with a sudden bitterness) "I would have long ago brought her to our home, and you would have loved her as your own child. She is poor, mother, yet noble and self-devoted in her poverty. Bravely is she battling with the world, and wresting from it, in daily toil, the means of support for parents who have, in her, their sole dependence. Oh, how often I have sighed for the means to lift her above her unhappy condition! And now they are about coming into my hands. So faithful and devoted a child cannot but make a true and loving wife."

"You have been to me a good son," replied Mrs. Wellford, as Henry ceased speaking—"and I know you will make a good husband. If Helen is worthy of you, and I doubt not that she is, make her your wife. Only be sure, Henry, that you have the ability to meet the added expense. If Mr. and Mrs. Lee have no means of support but the earnings of their daughter, you cannot remove the stay of their life without taking the burden on yourself."

"How thankful I am," said the young man, "that I now have the ability to do this. No, no; I will not remove the stay of their life, without myself taking up the burden."

In the ardor of his new hopes and brighter prospects, Wellford could not bear, it seemed, the intervention of a single hour between this and the time of another meeting with Helen.

"I will see her this very night," said he, as his thoughts grew more active in that direction. "Poor, dear girl! what may she not have borne and suffered since our last meeting! But it is all over now."

And yet even as he spoke thus within himself, a shadow from the wing of doubt fell upon his spirit. Utterly unaccountable had ever been, and still remained, her sudden turning from him. That it was not from estranged affection, he knew, even though her mother had rudely striven to make him believe otherwise. And yet, might there not exist causes which would separate them forever? As doubt formed this question in his mind, a cold thrill ran along his nerves. Less confident now than when, under the impulse awakened by his unexpected good fortune, his thoughts turned fondly and hopefully towards Helen, Wellford prepared himself to make her a visit.

Daylight had faded, and night was closing in darkly when he left his now comfortable home, and took his way to the humble abode of Helen. Love gave fleetness to his steps, and he hurried along the pavement like one, on whose errand life and death were depending. Just as he turned into the little street where Mr. Lee resided, two carriages started from the immediate vicinity of his dwelling, and came sweeping past him rapidly. Into one of these carriages, a gas lamp threw its bright glare. Was it an illusion? or did his eyes rest upon the pale, passionless face of Helen Lee, as she crouched beside an old man! Instantly his steps were arrested, and he stood, for a time, like a statue. Then, as the carriage whirled out of sight, he sprang forward, and was soon at the door of the dwelling he sought. His loud knock was answered by a hollow reverberation from within. He knocked again and again, but only echo replied to his summons.

Gazing up at the house, he found all the shutters closed. What could be the meaning of this? Had they moved away, or were they only absent temporarily? Again he knocked, and more loudly; it was with the same result. All the while that he stood thus, vainly seeking to gain admission, the vision that had so suddenly fallen upon his eyes, remained before him with annoying distinctness.

Disappointed and troubled, he turned, at length, away, and walked slowly from the seemingly deserted house. He paused, however, before passing the next street, looked back with an earnest gaze, and finally retraced his steps. His second attempt to arouse the inmates of Mr. Lee's dwelling, if any were therein, proved as fruitless as the first.

"I will make enquiry concerning them," said he, as a suggestion crossed his mind. "Their neighbors can tell me whether they have moved, and if so, where they are now to be found."

And so he applied at the adjoining house.

"Has Mr. Lee moved?" he asked of a servant, who answered the bell he rung with a pretty decided hand.

"I believe not," was the reply.

"I have rung several times, but no one seems to hear."

"May be they're out," suggested the servant.

"You're sure they've not moved?" said Wellford.

"Hav'n't seen any moving going on there, though I shouldn't wonder."

"Why shouldn't you wonder?" asked the young man, in a voice that betrayed more interest than he wished to show.

"Oh, because." And there was a knowing, vulgar leer on the servant's face.

"Because what?" So sharp and imperative was the voice of Wellford, that the girl looked frightened, and stepped back a pace or two.

"Why shouldn't you wonder if they had moved?" he repeated, bending towards the girl, and now speaking in a milder and more persuasive voice. "Nothing wrong there, I hope?"

"O, no sir; nothing that I know of."

"But what reason have you to think they have moved?"

"It was only my fun, sir; nothing else," replied the girl, who now began to fear that she might have said something that would bring her into trouble. Seeing that the young man was about pressing the matter on her still further, she shut the door, and left him standing without.

More troubled and perplexed than ever, Wellford moved away, and again left the immediate neighborhood of Mr. Lee's dwelling. Dissatisfied, he once more returned, unwilling to go until the mystery, which, in his mind, now closed around Helen and her family, was cleared up.

"There was something in that girl's mind;" thus he communed with himself; "what could it be? She had light thoughts of the family; and such thoughts are never entirely baseless. Can there be any true foundation in the appearances upon which they rest? Where has Helen been—what has she been doing for over six months—the long, long period that has elapsed since I last gazed upon her face? Can anything be wrong? I tremble at the thought. In some fearful extremity can she have yielded to temptation? No, no! I fling the unworthy thought aside, scorning myself for having given it utterance. But where is she? Could that have been her I saw in the carriage?"

Spite of his manliness, a shudder crept along his excited nerves.

"I must solve this mystery!" said he, and he rang the bell of another house in immediate proximity to that of Mr. Lee.

"Has the family next door to you moved away?" he asked.

"Which family?" was returned.

"That of Mr. Lee."

"I believe not, sir."

"There is no one in the house. I have rung the bell a number of times."

"I saw Mrs. Lee, from our back windows, several times during the afternoon."

"You did?"

"Oh, yes."

"What is wanted?" now called out a voice, at some distance along the passage within.

"A gentleman is enquiring about Mr. Lee," replied the servant.

"What about them?"

"He wishes to know if they have moved away?"

"They hav'n't moved their things out yet," said a lady, now advancing to the door.

"Then they are going to leave here," remarked Wellford.

"Oh, dear, yes. Their daughter was married, to-night, and they have gone with her to her new home."

"Married!" exclaimed the young man.

"Oh, yes, indeed! And such a marriage! January and May! Spring in the lap of Winter! It's the strangest thing I ever heard of."

"To whom is she married?" asked Wellford, in a hoarse voice. It was only by a strong effort that he could control his feelings sufficiently to give utterance to the question.

"To a man old enough to be her grandfather. Who he is, I don't know. But they say he's rich as a Jew. But, if she isn't sorry for it before she dies, then I don't know anything of woman's nature."

Nothing more did the young man pause to hear. The blasting fact, so rudely announced, was enough for him. What need he care for details and particulars? It was a late hour when he reached his home, the time verging on to midnight. Mrs. Wellford still sat up, awaiting his return. She knew the purpose of his visit to the house of Mr. Lee, and she did not care about retiring until advised of the issue of his suit. That it would be favorable, she had no reason to doubt. Well might she be startled at his appearance when he, at length, came in so quietly that her watchful ear had scarcely noticed his entrance, and stood before her, revealed suddenly, like an apparition.

"Oh, Henry!" she exclaimed, clasping her hands together. "What has happened? Why do you look so?"

The young man's colorless lips quivered as he essayed, but in vain, to speak. For a few moments, the mother and son gazed into each other's faces. Then the latter attempted to pass on to his own room; but Mrs. Wellford caught his hand and detained him, saying, in a voice full of tender interest—

"Henry, my son, what ails you? Is anything wrong with Helen?"

"Wrong—wrong! Oh, mother!"

This was his first utterance, and the words were rather sobbed out than spoken.

A long silence ensued, in which Henry was striving for the mastery over his feelings; and his mother, conscious of the struggle, sat awaiting the result. At last, the sufferer lifted his face—how changed in a few short hours!—and said, speaking now with icy calmness—

"As I came near the house of Mr. Lee, tonight, two carriages drove away. In one of them was a young girl, in whose very pale face I thought I recognized the features of Helen. She sat beside an old man, and seemed as if she were shrinking away from rather than toward him. This was seen only at a single glance, as a strong light shone for an instant into the passing vehicle. The house of Mr. Lee I found deserted. I rung and rung again, but no one answered the bell. Then I made enquiry of a neighbor, as to whether the family had moved away, and learned that Helen had just been married."

"Married, Henry!"

"Yes, mother, married, and to an old man!" He spoke with bitterness.

"Who is he?"

Henry shook his head, sighing.

"I know not."

"Married—married. Had you no intimation of this?"

"None in the world. Oh! how could I have dreamed of such a thing? It has fallen on me like a bolt from heaven, searing my very heart. Good night! good night, dear mother!" he added quickly, and with returning emotion; and, as he spoke, he left the room hurriedly, and went up to his own chamber.

Hours went by, and Mrs. Wellford, too much disturbed for sleep, could hear, ever and anon, the footsteps of her unhappy son, as he walked restlessly the floor above her.

In the morning, he came down early, as usual. How that night of suffering had marred his fresh, young countenance, and dimmed the light of his pleasant eyes! He looked as if years had left upon him their marks of suffering and disappointment. His mother's eyes grew dim as she read the change, and understood too well how deep must have been the anguish that produced it. But few words were said as they sat at the scarcely tasted morning meal, and in these was not even a remote allusion to the incidents of the evening before. Each spoke to the other in tones of deeper affection; each felt for the other a stronger love. Their hearts were closer knit. Henceforth, in the bosom of Henry Wellford, the altar-fires were to be kept alive only by the oil of filial love. Beyond this, the stay of his life had failed; and, like a long-absent wanderer, storm-tossed and tempest-marred, he sought rest and refuge where it was surely to be found.

CHAPTER XIV.

Henry Wellford was sitting at his desk on the morning after the marriage of Helen Lee, with his thoughts far away from business, when his attention was arrested by a remark from Mr. Lane, who was looking over a morning paper.

"Bless me!" said that gentleman, speaking to a friend, who was sitting near him, also engaged with a paper. "Here is news!"

The friend looked up enquiringly.

"Who do you think is married?" asked Mr. Lane. There was a broad smile on his face.

"Who?"

"You wouldn't guess in a month."

"Then I won't be so foolish as to make the trial. Who is the happy man?"

"Old Bullfinch."

"No!"

"It's a fact, as I live. Here it is, all in black and white. Listen. 'Married, on Wednesday evening, 21st inst., Mr. Adam Bullfinch to Miss Helen Lee.'"

"Why, the old sinner! He'd better be thinking of his grave. Married! And to Miss Helen Lee! And pray who is the damsel? A spinster of fifty, or some blooming maiden of sweet sixteen? The latter, I'll be bound! Well, it does beat all!"

"You remember Lee who failed in the West India trade, after crippling himself through an unfortunate sugar speculation?" said Mr. Lane.

"O yes, very well."

"You also remember his daughter Helen?"

"I do. She was a lovely girl. But I'll not believe that she has thrown herself away upon Adam Bullfinch."

"He is rich; or, at least so esteemed," said Mr. Lane, meaningly.

"What of that? If my impression of the girl is correct, money would never have bought her. She would have died of starvation ere thus proving traitor to her woman's heart."

"For the sake of her parents she may have done this. They are very poor, and Mr. Lee is in bad health. He has not been able to engage in any business for some time."

The friend shook his head, remarking—

"Bad, bad, bad. Nothing will justify a marriage like this. Can she possibly find happiness?"

"She hardly took that into the account," said Mr. Lane. "So far as she is herself concerned, if the girl I supposed her to be, she expects happiness in her marriage relation, about as much as the martyr looks for pleasure at the stake. She is passing through the fire, hoping for something beyond; or, I might rather say, is giving up her very life for the sake of her parents' external comfort. This, at least, is my interpretation of the matter."

"How sad to think of," was remarked, in answer to this. "Ah me! It is a fearful mistake. And such a husband for a young, innocent, pure-minded woman! Why, he is the merest sensualist. A man who has blotted out from his impure mind, every idea involved in a true marriage! It is shocking to think of. Poor girl! If she have thus sacrificed herself for the sake of her parents, she is to be pitied indeed. They should never have allowed it to take place. Better have starved together, than buy luxurious living at such a price."

"As to the luxurious living," said Mr. Lane, "I am not so certain—at least so far as permanency is concerned." He spoke in rather a lower tone of voice. "The fact is, Mr. Bullfinch is far from being as shrewd in business matters as formerly, and I shouldn't be at all astonished if he were to find himself thrown to the wall one of these days. You remember that nice operation of his in sugars and coffees?"

"Very well. It is said that he lost about ten thousand dollars."

"I shouldn't like to make his loss good out of twelve thousand," said Mr. Lane.

"Do you think the speculation was so bad as that?"

"I am sure of it. Then, he sold Wayland after every one else had refused to credit him a single dollar, and bore, in consequence, the heaviest loss sustained by a failure which the merest tyro in business saw must inevitably take place. It's my opinion, though I wouldn't like to say it out of doors, that Adam Bullfinch isn't worth as much now as he was twelve months ago by twenty thousand dollars."

"You surprise me," said the friend.

"And what is more, if he doesn't show himself wiser in his business operations than he has been for some time past, he'll find the end of his rope much sooner than he or any one else dreams of."

"In that case, the bird who has just entered his cage, will not have even gilded bars against which to beat and bruise herself. Ah! what a mistake that young bride has committed!"

"Yes, look at it as you will, it is all a mistake. What compensation is there in mere wealth, or the external good it procures, for a life-long association against which the heart revolts, even from its profounder depths?"

"And you think her heart will so revolt? That she really has no affection for the old man? That she will not love him with something like filial tenderness? That, should wealth fail him, she will not cling to him more closely, hiding his defects lovingly from the world, and sustaining him, even as a vine the decaying branches that bore it at first from the earth, where it lay with no inherent power to lift itself into the pure air and warm sunshine."

"No!" was the emphatic answer.

"That little word comprehends a great deal."

"It does, and fully covers this question. What Mr. Bullfinch is, as a man, we know pretty well. His heart lies not in the centre, but beats every where, so to speak, in the very external of his life. He comprehends only by the touch. He is, in plainer language, the merest sensualist—taking the term in its broader signification—in the world. What does he understand of the delicate emotions, the pure, almost spiritual perceptions, the exquisite appreciation of qualities, possessed by the heart of a truly virtuous woman, such as I believe his child-wife to be? Nothing—less than nothing."

"Not much, I can readily believe," was answered.

"And is it to be supposed, for a moment, that the grosser qualities of his mind will not be perceived, instinctively, by the finer appreciations of hers, and that such a perception will not be accompanied by a suffocating disgust? We cannot reasonably hope for a different result."

"I suppose not," was remarked in reply. A customer entered at the moment, and there the conversation, every word of which had fallen upon the ears of Wellford, ended. He knew that Helen had married an old man; that he learned on the night previous—but he was not prepared to hear that Adam Bullfinch was her husband. Of him he knew quite enough—knew him to be essentially a gross and impure-minded man.

"Unhappy girl!" he sighed, as a momentary forgetfulness of his own bitter disappointment, left his heart free to pity the wretched victim of a mistaken sense of duty,—“into what a gulf of wretchedness you have thrown yourself!”

A short time he remained at the desk; then, unable to compose his mind, or to fix his thoughts on business, he went out, and wandered through the streets for an hour, striving, though vainly, to repress the wild agitation into which he had been thrown. Returning to the store, he sought to compose his mind, and give renewed attention to the duties that devolved upon him; but this he found utterly impossible. The disturbance from which he suffered was no mere ripple on the surface of his life—it went to the very depths of his being. The whole current of thought and feeling was in commotion. Strong of will though he was by nature, and habitual in self-control, he failed now, utterly, in every effort to subdue the strife within. A plea of indisposition—far from being assumed on his part—sufficed to release him from duties which, in his state of mind, he found it impossible to perform, and he left the store and returned home.

On the following morning, Wellford was absent from his post. On sending to his house, word came back that he was still too much indisposed for business, but hoped to be well enough on the next day to resume his place. But the next day, and the next following, he was still absent. Two weeks elapsed, and then his old position was resumed. All saw that he was a changed man, yet none guessed the cause and nature of the change. It was not strongly marked, yet clearly apparent to every one who was familiar with his daily manner and habit of mind. He did not converse as freely as before, nor take his usual interest in passing events. He was often absent-minded to a degree that, at first, made his business action partially defective; but this he gradually overcame, and devoted himself to trade with greater concentration of thought than ever. In fact, the new position he had assumed in the house of Lane, Latta & Co. demanded this intense application of all his powers. It was well for him, perhaps, that such was the case. It prevented the sickly, brooding state into which he would have fallen almost inevitably. He not only felt the responsibility of his new relation in business, but a desire to make the most of it in a worldly point of view, from ends not even fully acknowledged to himself, came gradually into activity. And so he was sustained in the great trial he had been called to pass through; sustained so far, at least, as the world's observation was concerned. No eye penetrated the secret chambers of his heart; none knew of the darkness and coldness that dwelt there; none saw the anguish that overmastered him in his hours of solitude. Intimately blended with all his hopes in life—more intimately than was known even to himself—had been the image of Helen Lee. Though she had turned from him, he felt that there was no estrangement in her heart; and he was patiently awaiting the time that would remove the cloud from the sun of his life, when it was darkened suddenly by a total eclipse.

CHAPTER XV.

The little scene enacted, at the house of Mr. Bullfinch, on the occasion of bringing home the bride, was unfortunate. The quick temper and strong self-will of the old man were thus fully exhibited in the beginning; while he saw something more in his young wife than he had expected to find—a dignified, womanly firmness that he might not hope to bend. In the almost fragile, mild, retiring, beautiful girl, he had seen nothing but what was passive or yielding. In winning her to his home, he had looked for the possession of an object from which only pleasure would come. Such a thing as opposition to his will had never been taken into the account. He scarcely regarded her as one capable of opposition. In an instant the delusion vanished.

On the other hand, Helen had seen nothing about Mr. Bullfinch that led her to regard him as anything but a kind, mild-tempered man. This sudden ebullition, therefore, while it surprised, armed her against him. And so, between the two, was established, from the very beginning, a position of antagonism, not strongly marked at first, but still existing, and the fact thereof never for a moment absent from the consciousness of both parties.

The abandonment of her home by his niece was a circumstance for which Mr. Bullfinch was altogether unprepared. Not only as a public rebuke did it hurt him; but the act did violence to his real affection for one who had been to him for so many years as a child—loved, indulged and cared for. Had the question of marrying Helen and giving up Fanny been presented for decision—could he have clearly seen this issue—the old man would have hesitated long before taking a step that now promised far less of happiness than a fond imagination had pictured. Fanny knew all his tastes and habits, and had endeared herself to him by a daily regard for his comfort. Inordinately selfish, as such men are, he loved her the more, because she ministered to his enjoyments. With her as a daughter, and Helen as a wife, he had anticipated a climax of earthly good. But even as he grasped the cup that was to intoxicate him with pleasure, a rude hand jostled it, and spilled more than half its contents upon the earth. Without Fanny, he felt that home would be robbed of half its sunshine; and he had already too good reason to doubt the ability of his young wife to restore the absent light. How little of good promise was there, in all this, for the future!

From the beginning, there was, on the part of Helen, a defective appreciation of the daily wants of her husband. Her own father was nothing of an epicure, and few men sought, less than he, pleasure in a mere gratification of sensual appetites. She had not learned, therefore, to know the wants of a man like Mr. Bullfinch. Mr. Lee required little service of those around him. Greater pleasure he always derived from ministering than from being ministered to. But Mr. Bullfinch thought only of himself, and was disappointed and fretted if everything did not bend to his gratification. Considering her home education, and the character of her mind, a mere child were about as well fitted for the wife of Adam Bullfinch as the young creature he had dragged into a position from the duties of which her whole nature revolted. Had Fanny Milnor remained, the difficulties of Helen's position would have been less; as it was, more was expected of her than it was in her power to give.

A week from the inauspicious marriage day had elapsed. It was morning, and Mr. Bullfinch was walking the floor of the breakfast room with a step the quickness of which showed his mind to be disturbed. Every now and then he would pause, glance at the time-piece on the mantle, and again resume his uneasy movement. At length, his impatience overleaped the barriers of repression; lifting a small table-bell, he rung it violently. Mr. Lee, who was reading, in one of the parlors, supposing this to be the summons to breakfast, came up, and entered the room. He saw, in a moment, by the dark brow of Mr. Bullfinch, and the unfurnished table, his error. And, so, without speaking, he retired, wishing, in his heart, that he were back again, with his wife and child, in the poor but independent home from which Helen's inauspicious marriage had lifted them. As he reached the parlor, he heard the bell again, rung louder and more impatiently than before.

A waiting-woman now appeared, in the breakfast-room, in answer to this repeated summons.

"What's the meaning of this? Why is breakfast not ready?" said Mr. Bullfinch, angrily.

"I don't know, sir," was the timid reply.

"Well, somebody ought to know! Here it is, half an hour past the usual time. Go down into the kitchen, and see what on earth's the matter. Nothing goes right in this house, now."

As Mr. Bullfinch said this, Helen entered the room, fixing, as she did so, her large, calm eyes upon him, with a look that subdued, yet inwardly chafed him.

"I wish you would see a little after things," said he, in a greatly modified, yet reproving voice. "I like order and punctuality. I've always been used to, and must have it."

"What is wrong, now?" enquired Helen, coldly.

"Wrong! Don't you see that it's almost an hour past our usual breakfast time?"

Helen glanced at the time-piece, and merely said—

"Is it any fault of mine?"

A rebuking reply trembled on the lips of Mr. Bullfinch; but he had already learned to fear the excitement of certain moods in his young bride; and, therefore, wisely restrained its utterance.

In the pause thus created, and while both parties stood looking at each other, with something of defiance in their manner, the waiter came in with breakfast.

"Ready, at last," said Mr. Bullfinch, moodily. "This will never suit me."

The bell was rung, and Mr. and Mrs. Lee joined their daughter and her husband at the table.

Silently the meal passed. Each heart was oppressed. How different from the pleasant breakfasts enjoyed by Mr. Bullfinch and his niece for so many years! As mistress of his household, Fanny had studied and met her uncle's tastes and peculiar habits in almost everything. She was truly attached to him, and derived pleasure from thus anticipating and meeting his wants. Affection made the service delightful. No morning meal was set upon the table, in the preparation of which she had not given some direction, and in which was not some dish that her epicure uncle regarded as a favorite. And so, they ever met at breakfast in cheerful mood, and enjoyed it together.

Ah! how different were all the daily meals now! Mr. Bullfinch had bought a wife with gold—a young and beautiful wife—and she was now the mistress of his household. Bought love! It was mocking him already like an unsubstantial shadow.

Silently the morning meal passed, and comfortless to Mr. Bullfinch. Not a dish had the old taste, for the directing hand of the absent one was wanting. This, to the old man, was a serious drawback, for in eating was included a large measure of his daily satisfaction in life. Of this, his young wife knew nothing. She did not, in fact, comprehend how any one could make the pleasures of the table a paramount thing. Her father had always been to her the type of manly virtues and endowments, and he never found fault with what was set before him—but ever partook of the plainest food with apparent relish. Her mother had little taste for the kitchen. And so, the domestic education of Helen in no way fitted her for the wife of Adam Bullfinch.

The unenjoyed breakfast over, the old man left for his store, in no pleasant mood, and Helen was alone with her parents.

"I never saw such a man!" exclaimed Mrs. Lee, almost as soon as he had left their presence, and ere the street door closed on his retiring form. "Nothing pleases him; and he is as sour, at times, as vinegar."

"Breakfast was late, and it fretted him," said Helen, in an apologetic manner.

"I wonder if he never had breakfast late in his life before?" replied Mrs. Lee.

"I don't know, I'm sure," Helen spoke in an absent manner. "But, we must try and remedy the defect. It may easily be done, I suppose, and if so, I must do it."

"Yes, my child," said Mr. Lee—"do it by all means. Mr. Bullfinch is a man of orderly, punctual habits, and little matters like this fret him a great deal. You will soon get to understand his wishes and peculiarities, and it will be your duty, and I hope your pleasure"—Mr. Lee's voice faltered a little in spite of his effort to retain its calmness—"to meet the one and adapt yourself to the others."

"I will try to do right, father," Helen replied. Her voice was steady, but her father saw that her eyes were humid.

"Ah!" he sighed to himself, as she passed from the room—"what a trial! God give her strength to bear it!"

CHAPTER XVI.

A month had passed since Fanny Milnor went, a voluntary exile from her uncle's house. To her, the trial had not proved a light one. Much of this time she had suffered from a depressing home-sickness; and nightly she dreamed of the old pleasant place, and of her kind uncle. Yet, had she not once repented of the step which she had taken.

She was sitting, one day, about this time, in no cheerful mood, trying, but in vain, to become interested in the pages of a book she was reading, when a servant came to her door, and said that a lady had called and wished to see her.

"Did she send up her name?" enquired Fanny.

The servant replied in the negative.

"Why didn't you ask her name?"

"I did," was answered, "but she said it made no difference, and that she would prefer seeing you in your own room."

Fanny thought for a few moments, and then said—

"Tell her to walk up."

The servant retired, and Fanny awaited her return with the visiter, wondering the while who it could be. Soon footsteps were heard on the stairs, and along the passage leading to her room.

The door was again opened by the servant; a lady stepped in, and the servant retired.

Instantly the face of Fanny Milnor flushed to a deep crimson; her eyes gave forth an indignant light, while her lips arched scornfully.

"You here! I did not expect this," she said, while the stain of anger rose even to her brow. Then, with a suddenly assumed, yet mocking smile, she added—"To what am I indebted to a visit from Mrs. Bullfinch?"

Helen—for it was she—had prepared herself for this, or even a more cutting reception. The bitter scorn of the girl, therefore, did not discompose her. Though not offered a chair, she seated herself, her wonderfully calm and penetrating eyes fixed with a steady look upon Fanny, who still remained standing.

"May I pass a few sober words with you, Fanny?" she now said, in a voice so low and serious, that the indignant girl felt its influence, yet was in no way inclined to bend from the haughty, repellant attitude she had assumed towards the wife of her uncle.

"What can you have to say to me?" was her sharply uttered retort.

"Much that you ought to hear," said Helen.

"Away! Leave me! We can hold no intercourse," exclaimed Fanny, passionately.

"Fanny Milnor!"

"Go!" And turning her face aside, the niece of Mr. Bullfinch waved her visiter with an imperative gesture, to retire.

"No, Fanny," was the undisturbed answer.

"I am prepared for all this, and much more. Having entered upon the present work, I am not to be turned aside from my purpose by the first difficulty that presents itself. I have come to talk with you about your uncle; the old man in whose behalf you appealed to me so earnestly."

The arched lip did not in the least unbend itself; nor was there any softening of Fanny's cold, scornful eye; neither answered she a word. "Your uncle is not happy," said Helen.

"Happy!" was sharply and suddenly answered. "Happy! Was he so mad as to expect it with you?"

"If so," returned Helen, calmly, "he has already awakened from his delusion. But, he was forewarned."

"In truth was he?" ejaculated Fanny.

"If by you, then twice forewarned," said Helen, as she looked steadily at the proud, defiant girl—so steadily, that the eyes of the latter sunk beneath her glances, and in slight confusion of thought, she said, repeating the words of her visitor:

"Twice forewarned?"

"Yes, twice."

"And by whom beside myself?"

"I forewarned him."

"You?"

"Yes, I; and repeated the warning. But, he would not hear me. That, however, is past now; and for either you or I to refer to it is bootless. Enough that your uncle is unhappy, and will remain so until you return to him."

"That I will never do!" was the positive declaration of Fanny. "When I left his house, I left it forever. What! do you think I would share the honors thereof with you?"

Again her lip curled with ineffable scorn.

The pale cheeks of Helen now flushed; and her hitherto steady eyes grew restless. The loss of self-possession, however, was but momentary. When she spoke again, her voice was steady as before.

"You can take all the honor if you will. I have no ambition. Make your uncle happy if you can. Supply to him again what he hoped, but vainly hoped, to find in me. That is your duty. My position need not touch yours. Never fear that I will interfere with your old prerogatives. Glad will I be to have you resume them. If you love your uncle, Fanny, return to him."

"And did he send you to lure me back again?" said Fanny, bitterly. "Why did he not come himself? But, he knew the power of your eloquence!"

This meaning assertion broke through the crust that protected the feelings of Helen. Her face, that had resumed its paleness, flushed again, and her eyes fell under the sharp glances of Fanny, while her form seemed to shrink into smaller dimensions. As soon as she could trust her voice with words, she said—

"Our assumptions are often far wide of the truth, Fanny. In this instance, yours are so."

Steady though the voice was, it had in it a heart-touching mournfulness, to which even the mailed heart of Fanny was not altogether proof. But she repressed the rising sympathy, or pity, which ever it might be called, and said as coldly, and in as repellant a manner as at first—

"Why did not my uncle come himself? Why did he send you?"

"He did not send me," replied Helen.

"You have come at his instance, at least."

"No."

"Is he sick?"

"He is unhappy; and sickness of the soul needs medicine quite as much as sickness of the body. For years, you have been the light of his household. All is dark since your withdrawal. Return, then, and be to him as of old; return, Fanny, and my heart will bless you. I have no power to chase the shadows from his heart and brow."

"Why, then, did you assume an office that you cannot fill?" asked Fanny, sternly.

"To err is human," was the touching, mournfully uttered reply.

"A poor excuse for premeditated wrong," said Fanny. "But it weighs nothing here. With subtlety, from base ends, you adroitly flattered my uncle, until you drew him within your toils——"

"It is false!" exclaimed Helen, with an emphasis and an energy that startled her auditor. "False to the utmost meaning of the word."

She had risen to her feet, and stood, with her body drawn to its full height, and her large eyes glaring upon the face of Fanny Milnor, who, in momentary surprise, retreated a pace or two.

"False, proud, harsh-judging girl!" she added, with a womanly dignity and self-possession that, for the time, completely subdued her listener, "I claim to be as pure in motive, as free from all that is base, as yourself. If I have erred, it has not been in self-seeking. Heaven knows I expected no good for myself—and I shall not be disappointed!"

"What did you expect, pray?" inquired Fanny, with a covert sneer.

"Silence!" was the stern, subduing answer to this. "I will bear from you no further insult. Do your own duty before you question the right or wrong of my actions. You have deserted the relative to whom you owe a debt of gratitude a life-service might not pay. I have told you that this desertion has robbed him of happiness; that no one can supply your place. Thus far I have done my duty. It is left for you, so quick to censure others on insufficient grounds, to do yours. Good morning."

CHAPTER XVII.

The effort made by Helen to induce Fanny to return to her uncle's house, proved unsuccessful. The girl's entire being had revolted against the unnatural union, and now, look at it and think of it as she would, the intense disgust, at first created, remained. The interview just described had inspired her with a degree of respect for Helen not before felt, and left in her heart a feeling of pity for the unhappy creature, who gave painful evidence, not only in her countenance, but in the tones of her voice, of having suffered intensely. This was one thing; but to live in daily intercourse with her as the wife of her uncle, was another matter altogether. To do that, she did not regard herself as under obligation; and so she remained steady to her first purpose. Mr. Bullfinch was not the man to go after her, and seek to bring her back to his home. Had he put any faith in her threat to leave him, he would have used every inducement in his power to prevent her doing so. But, now that she had actually gone away, his pride would not let him take even the first step towards prevailing on her to return. The effort which Helen had made was entirely without his knowledge.

Time, while it wore away some of the rough edges which at first produced unpleasant contact, did very little towards bringing into harmony the opposing elements which a false marriage had bound together. A closer union with Mr. Bullfinch in no way broke down the repugnance which, from the first, possessed the mind of Helen—in no way lessened the pain of the living sacrifice she had made and was still making.

The change produced upon the state and temper of the young wife, by the new relation into which she had come, was almost inconceivable. At the end of six months, she was so altered that a familiar friend, who had been absent through the period, would scarcely have known her. Not in the breaking down of her health was this apparent, though, most of the time, her face had an unnatural paleness; nor was it shown in a spiritless or melancholy exterior. Most the change was seen in the development of a more decided character; in an occasional haughtiness of manner, savoring at times of heartlessness, never displayed before her marriage. She seemed to regard her new position as one of defence, if not actual warfare, and to have armed herself at every point.

Although Helen tried, and faithfully, for a time, so to administer the affairs of her husband's household as to meet his wants and wishes, she was unable to satisfy his expectations; and he, too old and confirmed in his ways to bend to the new order of things, fretted, or stormed, as the case might be, thus making matters worse instead of better. A milder temper on his part; a giving up, in a measure, if only in appearance, of self, and a graceful acceptance of the earnestly made efforts of Helen to have all things as he desired, would have encouraged and softened her feelings towards him. But, he only thought of and felt the disagreeable difference that now existed, and continually chafed his wife by a complaining or angry reference thereto. Mr. Lee did what he could, in his weak way, to ameliorate what was around him, while the mother of Helen was ever making things worse by an unwise interference when Mr. Bullfinch was present, or indignant animadversions on his conduct when he was absent.

A few times had Helen been abroad with her husband since their marriage. From social or public appearances she had shrunk with a reluctance, that it required all her strength of will to overcome. Of her personal appearance and accomplishments, Mr. Bullfinch was very proud; and having no delicacy touching the diversity in their ages, would have shown her off on all occasions, could he have made her passive to his will.

This, however, was a matter in which he rarely had his own way. When he wished her to go out with him, she never failed to have some good reason for desiring to remain at home; and far oftener than was agreeable to her husband, refused positively to go with him to places of public amusement, or to join in private entertainments. In company, the fond old man was ever desirous of bringing his wife forward; urging her to play and sing invariably on these occasions. She had a fine voice, and sung and played with exquisite taste and skill. But, thus to be thrust forward in strange companies—her circle of personal and intimate friends was very limited—was what she could not endure, and she yielded, therefore, only on few occasions to the wishes of her husband, who not unfrequently lost patience with her, and manifested, in mixed companies, to the mortification of Helen, and the delight of those who were ill-natured and fond of idle gossip, an overbearing and fretful temper.

Something like a year had elapsed since Helen's marriage, when, one day, invitations were sent in for a party at the house of Mr. Lane. The first impulse of Mrs. Bullfinch was to destroy them, and thus leave her husband in ignorance of the fact that they had ever been received. Upon second thought, however, she hesitated to do this. Knowing the temper of Mr. Bullfinch, she did not wish to be involved in the trouble that would surely follow his discovery of what had been done. So, after pondering the matter for some time, she wisely determined to let things take their course.

"What is this?" said Mr. Bullfinch, as his eyes rested on the note of invitation, which Helen had been at no pains to conceal, and, as he spoke, he took it up and read it.

"Ah, indeed!" he remarked, with a pleased manner. "Company at Mr. Lane's on Thursday evening."

"So it seems," remarked Helen, indifferently.

"Something brilliant, no doubt. I've been at several of Mr. Lane's entertainments, and they are handsome affairs. We will go, of course. I always regretted that you did not accept the last invitation. Now, I am sure you will be delighted."

"I care but little for company," said Helen.

"So much the worse for you," replied her husband, speaking in a quickened tone of voice. "If you would go abroad more frequently, instead of moping, as you do, at home, from week in to week out, you would have better health and lighter spirits. Really, Helen, you wrong yourself, your husband, and society, by the way you are acting. I like company—am social in my habits—have many friends whom I desire to meet; but you—"

Mr. Bullfinch felt himself growing warm, and, therefore, checked the utterance of what was on his tongue. He had learned to forbear a little, as the re-action of his young wife was at times of a character far from agreeable.

"You need not deny yourself any social pleasures on my account, Mr. Bullfinch," said Helen. "I shall always be gratified to have you go into company. If I am happier at home, why drag me out into the world, between which and myself is no congeniality, no sympathy?"

"I cannot bear to hear you talk in this way, Helen," replied Mr. Bullfinch, with real kindness of manner. "What would I not give to see you cheerful and happy: ready to take the world as it is, and enjoy all the good it has to offer! This is my philosophy; and if it was yours, how much of sunlight would be on your way—and on mine"—he added in a lower voice.

Helen drew a deep sigh, but did not answer. She felt the utter impossibility of being what her husband desired her to be; and yet, as a wife, it was her duty to do all in her power for his happiness. A clear perception of duty, accompanied by this sense of the impossibility of its performance, so saddened her spirit, that, in spite of her struggles to hide what she felt, tears flowed from her eyes.

It was not often that she had permitted Mr. Bullfinch to see her weep. Intensely as she had too frequently suffered, she had been able, through pride, strengthened by a strong will, to subdue the woman's weakness that melted into tears. And there was another reason. She did not love her husband, and, therefore, in her intercourse with him, was rarely affected with any of the tenderer emotions.

It was a strange thing for Mr. Bullfinch to see his wife in tears; and it moved him greatly.

"My poor, dear child," said he, with unaffected kindness, as he laid his hand caressingly upon her. "Do not take on so about this. If you are so averse to going into company, I will not urge it upon you. We can be happy with each other at home. Try, dear Helen! to be more cheerful. I love you truly, and will do all in my power to secure your happiness. Have I not done so from the first? Perhaps I have been strong-headed, at times, from confirmed habit; this, you must look over and forgive. I am a little quick-tempered, but it is soon past and forgotten."

And as he thus talked, the feelings of Helen softened more and more, and, for awhile, she wept freely. Thought was clearer as emotion at length subsided, and she saw more distinctly her duty than she had seen it for a long time. A softer expression came into her face, and her large eyes drooped with something of a woman's tenderness.

"I will go with you to Mr. Lane's," said she, in a gentle voice.

"We will decline the invitation, if it is at all disagreeable to you, Helen," replied Mr. Bullfinch.

"I would rather go. It ought not to be disagreeable. I know that I seclude myself too much; that I am unjust to you. But I will try to overcome my weakness."

Her voice trembled through part of this sentence, but regained its steadiness at the close.

"It is not good for us to keep ourselves too much away from society," remarked Mr. Bullfinch. "The mind will prey upon itself. In cheerful contact with the world, we gain cheerfulness. As face answers to face in a glass, so does the face of a man to his friend. We reflect our mutual good feelings, and thus share them as common property. I am glad to hear you say that you will go to Mr. Lane's. I know you will enjoy yourself."

How little did he know of her true state of mind! Enjoy herself in a gay company, with the spirit of which her palsied heart had nothing in common!—in a company where she would be as the wife of an old man, the observed of many curious observers, and the subject of ungenerous and heartless comment! Enjoy herself! It was the anticipation of an utter impossibility. Ah! Mr. Bullfinch little dreamed of the self-abnegation involved in the declared purpose of his wife to go with him to the brilliant party that was to be given at Mr. Lane's. He was too much pleased at her assent in the matter to look very curiously below the surface: and too little skilled in the mysteries of woman's nature to comprehend what he saw, even if it were possible for him to open a window into her heart.

Preparation for the event was next to be made. Mr. Bullfinch expressed his wish that Helen should appear with befitting elegance, and that there might be nothing to prevent, supplied her liberally with money, besides presenting her with some rich and costly jewelry. If Helen had consulted her own tastes and feelings, she would have attired herself with extreme simplicity, in order to attract as little attention as possible. But knowing what her husband desired and expected, and aware how much he would be disappointed if she did not dress with an elegance that accorded with his views, she abandoned her own preferences. In doing this, she was still governed by good taste.

Having consented to dress for the sake of pleasing her husband, a change of feeling came over Mrs. Bullfinch. Gradually, an interest in the work of preparation was awakened. As one article of attire after another was chosen, and, in imagination, she saw the effect which it produced, the pride of appearance grew active, and something like a spirit of emulation warmed the cold atmosphere in which her thoughts had moved.

Strange as it may seem, this feeling gradually increased, until Helen began to look forward to the coming entertainment with something like pride and pleasure. If she was to be the observed of many observers, admiration, as well as pity, should be excited. Once admitted to a place in her bosom, the feeling grew stronger; and by the time the evening of the party had arrived, the old man's bride was anticipating the occasion as one in which triumphs were to be achieved. And she did not greatly err in this. But of their nature there came no foreshadowing to her mind.

A cheerful and benign temper, that buds forth pleasant blossoms, and bears sweet fruit for those who live within its influence, is sure to produce an undying growth of green remembrances that shall flourish immortally after the present stock is decayed and gone.

To take events cheerfully, and to promote the happiness of others, is the way to insure an enduring spring of existence.

MARIE ALBONI.

This great vocalist—the greatest, indeed we may say, the only great modern contralto who has of late years appeared upon the stage of Europe—for, be it remembered, that Grisi, Sontag, and others of the leading vocalists of the day, as well as Jenny Lind herself, are all soprani—was born, as we are told, in 1826, her father being a captain in the Papal army. Despite the extraordinary proofs of her talent and love for music which she gave even at an early age, her father was prejudiced against her making it a profession, and it was only at the decided opinion of many of his best friends that he at length gave his consent that Marie should cultivate her natural powers. This was when she had attained the age of eleven. In consequence of this consent, after passing two years under the tuition of M. Baglioli, she was admitted to the Conservatory of Bologna. This school was then under the administration of Rossini, and with this remarkable and eminent composer she remained until she had reached the age of fifteen.

At this period Rossini contracted an engagement for her with the Theatre of Bologna. Her first appearance was in the part of Sappho, and she at once established herself in the opinion of the leading Italian critics as one of the most eminent vocalists of the day. In the following year she appeared at Milan, and there decided her previous triumph. From Milan she travelled to the principal capitals of Europe, in each of which she established her reputation; being, perhaps, the only great female vocalist who has met with equal success in Vienna, Berlin, Naples, St. Petersburg, London and Paris. Her husband, to whom she has been but a few months married, is the Count Achille Pepoli, of Venice, a gentleman, of great literary talent, and son of the distinguished poet of that name, whose devotion to his country and enmity to Napoleon and despotism have rendered his name so famous with his countrymen. Madame Alboni arrived in New York in June last, by the Hermann. Her intention in coming at this period was for the purpose of visiting, with her husband, the splendid scenery of our own country, and she was in this case, as she is in most others, the herald of her own arrival.

She had, however, brought with her several letters of introduction to some of the more influential citizens of New York, and by their persuasions she was induced to give two concerts previous to the final termination of the summer season in that city. These concerts, we need scarcely say, were brilliantly successful ones, and had the effect of determining her to pass the year in a tour through America. The voice of Madame Alboni is one of the most brilliant as well as the sweetest and most sonorous of true contraltos. It descends to fa in the bass clef, and ascends to the do in alt, having the extended compass of two and a half octaves complete. One must have heard this great artist to be aware of the singular skill with which she regulates and controls this magnificent organ, for no description could give any fair idea of her superb voice, and its unequalled power and sweetness, as well as the ease with which it is exerted, and the intense care with which it has been cultivated. It is, however, in her genuine chest voice, which is of almost unparalleled power and beauty, that her real strength as the principal contralto of the age resides, and that she is chiefly to be esteemed as the only legitimate successor to Pisaroni.

THE POET MOORE.

A lady, who had the good fortune to be present at a party in Dublin, the evening of the day when the first volume of Moore's Melodies was given to the world, was recalling the circumstance in so graphic a manner, that we think her story may interest others as much as it did us. At that time, our now aged friend must have been of remarkable beauty—an enthusiastic girl, brought up in deep seclusion; married in her seventeenth year to an officer, with whom she was about to leave her native land. Of Little's poem, the avant courier of Moore's fame, she had never heard; and, though the "melodies" of her country were familiar to her ear and lip, she did not think that they were known except by those who had learned them from the peasantry. "The pretty bride" was so new to the world, that her husband almost tutored her, as our grandame tutored us—"Now, my dear, hold up your head, hold your tongue, and remember your curtsy. He begged of her, whatever occurred, 'to ask no questions.' It was that great event in a country lady's life, 'her first town party,' and she was, of course, perpetually charmed, confused and blushing. Presently she heard various whispers in the room—"Is he come?" "Will he come?" "Is he certain to come?" Vague ideas of the Lord Lieutenant, that cynosure of Irish eyes—of the commander of the garrison—floated before her: then the lady of the house asked her daughter if the book was placed open on the piano, "where he could see it at once?" And a dozen sweet faces pressed forward to inquire if "he" was "certain sure to come?" and the reply called forth all the little bewitching "Oh dears!" and "Oh mys!" and "Oh thens!" which render the "brogue" the true accent of Cupid. The obedient wife—a very Griselda—would ask no questions; but she tried to reach the piano, and ascertain what "the book" was. However, one page of music is too like another to have yielded much information. As the evening melted away, the anxiety of the hostess and her friends increased to fever heat. At last, a double knock, and the hero of that and many other evenings, entered. "I saw," continued our friend, "a very, very little man, without star or ribbon—not the lord-lieutenant! I was so disappointed; I even thought him ugly. I looked at all the radiant officers, and wondered who the little man was. Then came fine speeches from the hostess; and there gathered round him all the old and young. I was provoked: all this fuss for a little tiny man in black, who was neither the lord-lieutenant nor an officer. I sat down sulkily at the end of the grand piano, and resolved not even to look at him. Presently, the hostess manoeuvred him to the piano, and then, showing him the first number of his own melodies, asked him to sing. He said something—I did not hear exactly what—about not being prepared, but sat down, and with his small, delicate hands preluded a moment, and then sang 'RICH AND RARE.' Before he had got to the —bright gold ring,

I was spell-bound. The head slightly upturned: the white, full, high brow, over which his silken hair lay in rich folds; the brightest, tenderest, most loving eyes were eloquent of expression: the smiling mouth gave forth the most bird-like, gushing music; every word was heard, and not only heard, but felt; and every eye fixed upon the 'poet of all circles.' When he finished, the burst of enthusiasm was electric; and his thanking smile, as he glanced round, emboldened his audience to exclaim, as with one voice, 'Another! another!' He sat down; the brilliancy of his expression faded: the sparkling light of love in his eyes deepened into the intense fire of patriotism; his form dilated, and he gave the line,

Go where glory waits thee!

as if it was a command from Heaven. I had been but a short time married: my husband expected every day to be ordered off to the war; my hopes for him were so mingled with terrors, that I felt a shudder when I heard the words of the song. They were succeeded by others,

But when fame elates thee,
Oh, then remember me, in tones so plaintive, so tender, so overwhelming, that, ashamed of my emotion, I covered my face with my hands, and pressed it on the piano. I tried to endure it; but every line, winged by such bewildering melody, entered into my heart. I had said words with the same meaning to my husband twenty times. As the poet finished, I was completely overpowered; the burst of tears would come, and my husband carried his foolish, child-wife out of the room. I afterwards heard that the poet had said 'those tears were the most eloquent thanks he could ever receive.'—Sharpe's Magazine.

HELP YOURSELF.

This, says the Yankee Blade, is the true secret of success, the master-key that unlocks all difficulties, in the various paths of life. Aide-toi, et le ciel t'aidera, as the French have it—help yourself, and Heaven will help you. The greatest affliction that can befall a young man is, to be the recipient of charity—to lean, for any length of time, upon others for support. He who begins with crutches, will end with crutches. It is not in the sheltered garden, but on the rugged Alpine cliffs, where the storm beats most violently, that the hardest plants are reared. It is not by the use of corks, bladders, and life-preservers, that you can best learn to swim, but by plunging courageously into the wave, and buffeting it, like Cæsar and Cassius, "with lusty sinews." The monied charity of individuals to individuals is one of the greatest curses that afflict society. It is the Upas tree, that paralyzes and reduces to the last gasp the moral energy of every man who inhales its poisonous atmosphere. Under the appearance of aiding, it weakens its victims, and keeps them in perpetual slavery and degradation.

Cold, consequential, and patronizing, it freezes the recipient into humiliation, and there leaves him, as firmly wedged as Sir John Franklin amid the thick-ribbed ice of the Arctic Ocean.

Money bestowed this way is nine times out of ten more truly wasted than if thrown into the sea. It is labor bestowed upon a worthless soil, incapable of yielding anything but a crop of weeds, or feeble plants which never reach maturity. God never intended that strong, independent human beings should be reared by clinging to others, like the ivy to the oak, for support. The difficulties, hardships, and trials of life—the obstacles that one encounters in the road to fortune—are positive blessings. They knit his muscles more firmly, and teach him self-reliance; just as by wrestling with an athlete, who is superior to us, we increase our own strength, and learn the secret of his skill. Read the history of the rich and poor in all ages and countries, and if you do not find that the "lucky dogs," as they are called, begun life at the foot of the ladder, without a finger's "lift" from anybody, while the "unfortunates," who flit along the paths of life more like scarecrows than human beings, attribute the first declension in their fortunes to having been bolstered and propped up by others—we will resign all pretensions to philosophy. All experience shows that this boasted benevolence tends to extinguish the faint sparks of energy in those who partake of it, till, having fallen into the despair and indolence inseparable from a cultivated sense of inferiority, they look upon themselves as beyond the pale of hope, and at last lose even the wish for independence.

CRITICS.—Narrow-minded and ignorant scribes sit in judgment upon books, but not one of which they could have produced in a century, and, because they are incapable of appreciating their power or loving their lessons of virtue, they squirt venom on them from their nameless concealments. It would be inexpressibly ludicrous to see a score of these little wasps brought face to face with some noble-minded author whom they had tried to bring down to their own grovelling level. I would have each of them labelled with his critique, and his name written in red ink across it—red as a substitute for the blush of which the critic is, of course, incapable. The author would enjoy a rich satisfaction in just looking at them for five minutes.—He could take the mental measurement of the twenty sufficiently in that time, although each of them figured in a print as a "we." The wisest and ablest men of the age should be its literary critics. Until this be the case, the market will be glutted with inferior books.

I once escaped, at table, the well-meant persecutions of the kind-hearted wife of a medical friend, from whom, ever and anon, came the inquiry of what I would take next? This had been so often repeated that I began to look round, fearing that my character, as a teacher by example, might suffer, and replied that, "If she was pleased, I would take breath." It was saucy and ungrateful, but it was good-naturedly received and understood.

THE MERCHANT'S DREAM.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Algeron was a merchant. All through a long summer day he had been engaged among boxes, bales, and packages; or poring over accounts current; or musing over new adventures. When night came, he retired to his quiet chamber and refreshed his wearied mind with music and books. Poetry, and the harmony of sweet sounds, elevated his sentiments, and caused him to think, as he had often before thought, of the emptiness and vanity of mere earthly pursuits.

"In what," said he, "am I wasting my time? Is there any thing in the dull round of mercantile life to satisfy an immortal spirit? What true congeniality is there between the highly gifted soul and bales of cotton or pieces of silk? Between the human mind and the dull, insensible objects of trade? Nothing! Nothing! How sadly do we waste our lives in the mere pursuit of gold! And after the glittering earth is gained, are we any happier? I think not. The lover of truth—the wise, contemplative hermit in his cell is more a man than Algeron!"

Thus mused the merchant, and thus he gave utterance to his thoughts—sighing as he closed each sentence. The book that he loved was put aside—the instrument from which his skilful hand drew eloquent music, lay hushed upon a table. He was unhappy. He had remained thus for some time, when the door of his room opened, and a beautiful being entered and stood before him. Her countenance was calm and elevated, yet full of sweet benevolence. For a moment she looked at the unhappy merchant, then extending her hand, she said—

"Algeron, I have heard your complaints. Come with me, and look around with a broader intelligence."

As she spoke, she laid her finger upon the eyes of the young man. Arising, he found himself in the open air, walking by the side of his strange conductor, along a path that led to a small cottage. Into this they entered. It was a very humble abode—but peace and contentment were dwellers in the breasts of its simple-minded occupants—an aged female and a little girl. Both were engaged with reels of a curious and somewhat complicated construction; and both sang cheerily at their work. A basin of cocoons on the floor by each of the reels, told Algeron the true nature of their employment. A small basket of fine and smoothly reeled spools were upon a table. While the merchant still looked on, a man entered, and after bargaining for the reeled silk, paid down the price, and carried it away. A few minutes after, the owner of the cottage came in. He asked for his rent, and it was given to him. Then he retired. Shortly after, a dealer in provisions stopped at the humble dwelling, and liberally supplied the wants of its occupants. He received his pay, and drove off, singing gayly, while the old woman and the child looked contented and happy.

"Come," said his conductor, and Algeron left the cottage. The scene had changed. He was no longer in the open country, but surrounded by small houses. It was a village. Along the streets of this they walked for some time, until they came to a store, which they entered. Standing beside the counter was the same man who had bought the cottagers' silk. He had many parcels, which he had collected from many cottages; and now he was passing them over to the storekeeper, who was as ready to buy as he was to sell.

"Another link in the great chain," remarked the mysterious companion significantly. "See how they depend, the one upon the other. Can the hermit in his cell, idly musing about truths that will not abide—for truth is active—is in fact the power by which good is done to our fellows, and will not remain with any one who does not use it—thus serve his fellows? Is his life more excellent, more honorable, more in accordance with the high endowments of the soul, than the life of him who engages in those employments by which all are benefited?"

Algeron felt that new light was breaking in upon him. But, as yet, he saw dimly.

"Look up," continued his companion, "and see yet another link."

The merchant raised his eyes. The scene had again changed. The village had become a large town, with ranges of tall buildings, in which busy hands threw the shuttle, weaving into beautiful fabrics of various patterns the humble fibres gathered from hundreds of cottages, farm-houses, and cocooneries, in all the region roundabout. Through these he wandered with his guide. Here was one tending a loom, there another folding, arranging, or packing into cases the products thereof; and at the head of all was the manufacturer himself.

"Is his a useless life?" asked the guide. "Is he wasting the high endowments of an immortal mind in thus devoting himself to the office of gathering in the raw material and reproducing it again as an article of comfort and luxury? But see! Another has presented himself. It is the merchant. He has come to receive from this man the products of his looms, and send them over the world, that all may receive and enjoy them. Are his energies wasted? No, Algeron! If the merchant were not to engage in trade, the manufacturer could not get his goods to market, and would no longer afford the means of subsistence that he now does to hundreds and thousands who produce the raw material. Without him, millions who receive the blessings furnished by nature and art in places remote from their city or country, would be deprived of many comforts, of many delights. The agriculturist, the manufacturer, the merchant, the artisan—all who are engaged in the various callings that minister to the wants, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, are honorably employed. Society, in all its parts, is held together by mutual interests. A chain of dependencies binds the whole world together. Sever a single link, and you affect the whole. Look below you. As a merchant, your position is intermediate between the producer and the consumer. See how many hundreds are blessed with the reception of nature's rich benefits through your means. Could this take place, if you sought only after abstract truth, in idle, dreamy musings? Cease, then, to chafe yourself by fallacious reasonings. Rather learn to feel delight in the consciousness that you are the means of diffusing around you many blessings. Think not of the gold you are to gain, as the end of your activity; for so far as you do this, you will lose the true benefits that may be derived from pursuing with diligence your calling in life—that for which, by education, you are best qualified—and into which your inclination leads you."

"I see it all now, clear as a sunbeam," Algeron said, with a sudden enthusiasm, as light broke strongly into his mind. The sound of his own voice startled him with its strangeness. For a moment he seemed the centre of a whirling sphere. Then all grew calm, and he found himself sitting alone in his chamber.

"Can all this have been but a dream?" he murmured, thoughtfully. No—no—it is more than a dream. I have not been taught by a mere phantom of the imagination, but by Truth herself—beautiful Truth. Her lovely countenance I shall never forget, and her words shall rest in my heart like apples of gold in pictures of silver. Henceforth I look upon life with a purified vision. Nothing is mean, nothing is unworthy of pursuit that ministers to the good of society. On this rock I rest my feet. Here I stand upon solid ground."

From that time, Algeron pursued his business as a merchant with renewed activity. The thought that he was ministering, in his sphere, to the good of all around him, was a happy thought. It cheered him on in every adventure, and brought to his mind, in the hour of retirement, a sweet peace, such as he had never before known. Fully did he prove that the consciousness of doing good to others brings with it the purest delight.

OUR WINNIE, THAT DIED.

BY MRS. L. BOSTWICK.

The flow of the sunset shadows
Lay deep on the crags of the hill,
Like the trailing of funeral banners,
'Mid the tomb-stones white and still.

The moon, with her pale hand, slowly,
Was parting the night-locks back,
That settled down heavy and coldly
Over the sun's red track.

That morning, our beautiful Winnie
Had wandered afar in the glade,
Searching out, in the beds of June blossoms,
The foot-prints that Summer had made.

But ere the sun rode in the zenith,
With snowy buds twined in her hair,
She came—but so wearily treading,
We know not her step on the stair.

And now as the wan moon parted
The night-tresses back from the skies,
Their shadows swept heavy and darkly,
Down the blue deeps of her eyes.

And sadly we spread the white covers
Aside from her own little bed,
And watched her faint breath till at morning,
We knew that our Winnie was dead.

Oh, dimly and coldly, that summer,
Our hearts felt the sunbeam and breeze,
That gleamed from a slab of white marble,
And rustled the church-yard trees.

But now as we sit by that head-stone,
And garland it over with flowers,
We shed not a tear for the lovely,
The innocent child that was ours.

For one motionless eve in October,
When the full moon was crowning the hill,
And even the trees of the forest
Held back their soft breath and were still;

Over banks of vermilion and purple
There floated a strain from the West,
As it were the sweet voices of childhood
Prolonging the chants of the Blest.

And one voice that seemed strangely familiar,
Our senses enchained like a spell,—
Oh, rapture! to catch the soft accents
We had loved and remembered so well.

Though the song was the song of Immortals,
And to us its full burden denied,
Yet we knew 'twas the voice of our Winnie,
Our beautiful Winnie that died.

EDINBURGH, O.

WHO WANTS A MONKEY?

BY CHERICOT.

DEAR SIR:—As I know that you have always a word of advice for those who need it, and a warm sympathy for the distressed, I venture to hope you will kindly help to extricate me from a difficulty in which I am at present placed by the generosity of a friend. A few weeks since, on a very hot afternoon, I was aroused from my usual daily siesta, by the intelligence that a box, containing a valuable present for me, had just arrived from the West Indies; and paying the rather large amount that was required for the freight and express expenses, I joyfully hastened down stairs to inspect it. Imagine my consternation, when I saw a long narrow box, with slats nailed on one side, through which peeped the mischievous head of a little grey monkey! Now, sir, I am not a single lady of a certain age, and I do not like monkeys; nay, I will at once confess, that I have a peculiar aversion for them, and you may, therefore, imagine my vexation, which I am ashamed to say, vented itself in a burst of tears, though I retained sufficient self-possession not to tear my hair. The new arrival had been followed into the house by a crowd of ragged boys and girls, and dirty women, with forlorn-looking babies in their arms; and the animal, doubtless, thinking his welcome very cordial, expressed his delight by grinning, chattering and cutting many antics around his contracted dwelling, thereby scattering about tomato skins, nut shells, orange peel, melon rinds, and other agreeable fragments of former repasts.

Excessively disgusted, I ordered him into the yard, and having, with some trouble, got rid of the admiring spectators, I sat down calmly to consider what course to pursue in this pressing emergency, and, as a preliminary duty, opened and read the letter received with the box. It contained merely a few lines, stating that, having, with some difficulty, procured me a monkey from South America, he hastened to forward it, thinking I should be pleased with such a curious pet, and begging me to write him by the return of the vessel whether "Beauty" had arrived safely.

I could scarcely read the above with patience, and determined, forthwith, to indite him an answer of bitter reproaches; but the remembrance of the friendship he had evinced for me in trying times, prevailed, and I renounced the idea, though I could not prevent myself from secretly impugning his motives for such a gift.

"Why," soliloquized I, "why, if generously inclined, did he not send me a parrot, or a little lilac turtulica, or a tropicale? How pleased should I have been with one of the fairy dogs that never grow so large as a kitten, and are equally loving and playful; even a box of confitures, or a dozen flasks of preserves, would have been acceptable,—but a hateful monkey! Oh!" sighed I, "Heaven deliver me from my friends," as Shakspeare or somebody says, (I do not precisely recollect who, in my present state of nervous excitability.)

I reverted to the first query, why did he send me the disagreeable animal? and suspicion whispered that he had found it very troublesome at home, and, as the shortest way of despatching it, had shipped it off to his dear American friend. I imagined him saying to his wife:

"Well, Mimi, we've been intending for a long time to send Chericot some curiosities; why not get rid of this detestable monkey?"

I could see his black slave, Jerard, fastening up the snarling little thing, and taking it to the vessel, while his master and mistress stood on the verandah, waving a joyful farewell to the departing torment; but as these reflections did not tend to improve my temper, I wisely banished them, and went down to the yard to look at my present, in the hope of becoming accustomed to him.

I found there several of my neighbors, who had been attracted by the new comer, and who seemed as delighted with it as I was displeased. and made many suggestions about its diet, to which the monkey listened with more satisfaction than I did. One person said it must be fed daily with oranges, sugar, nuts, cakes and fruits of all kinds; that it could eat no other sort of food, and would die if deprived of it. I thought on the many human beings who needed a crust of bread, and mentally resolved my monkey should not fare better than a Christian; but here another friend declared that the first thing to be provided was a new domicile and a chain, as the poor thing would die if kept in such close confinement. I assure you, sir, I am not naturally hard-hearted; indeed, it gives me pain to see any living thing suffer; but you may imagine the intense acid to which my milk of human kindness had turned, when I contritely acknowledge that I savagely determined, if the monkey's death would result from keeping him in that box, there he should stay. But how vain are human calculations! I had not retired into the house many minutes, when my humane and officious neighbor returned, with a clean barrel, nicely prepared for the odious animal, who was immediately installed therein, and daintily fed as before suggested on oranges, nuts and sundry other delicacies.

However, not to draw too largely on your sympathy, I will briefly say, that some days passed before I could sufficiently compose my feelings to consider the proper thing to be done in this imminent crisis. I had serious thoughts of premeditatedly losing him; but though he was often liberated from confinement, he seemed to like the premises so well that he would not leave them; indeed, every one in the family became so attached to the little monster that they carefully prevented any attempt on his part to escape. One eventful day, however, that Alice (our Irish servant) had furtively released him, with the view of nursing "the darling craythur," he sprang from her arms, and took that opportunity of exploring unknown regions, and making a tour through the house. Off darted "Beauty," and off went Alice in pursuit, but he cunningly eluded all attempts to capture him, and listened, unmoved, to her coaxing petitions that he would return to the shelter of her arms. Up to the attics, down again to the chambers, through which he made sundry excursions, playfully poking his nose into every hole and corner, he at last approached the room where I sat at my desk, faithfully chronicling the further adventures of Aunt Tabitha; and, leaping affectionately on my shoulder, caressingly threw his paws round my neck. I sprang up in agony, clutched my tormentor, and threw him violently from me;—he screamed—jumped on the table, whisked a bottle of ink over the unfortunate Mrs. Higgins, destroyed a touching ode to the muse, of Sensibility, and in his frenzy devoured an Essay on Dietetics that had been sent me by a friend, and which I fear he will find to be very hard of digestion. Flying through the door, he rushed down stairs, examined everything in the parlor, leaving sundry scratches and defacements on books and daguerreotypes, and as the panting Alice pursued him, he descended into the kitchen, alighting on the range; but probably, thinking it uncomfortably warm, he climbed the chimney, made his egress at the stove-pipe hole, and dexterously evading the servant's outstretched arms, entered the dining-room, and concealed himself on the supper table in the sooty apparel he brought from the chimney. Here, while comfortably regaling himself on hot buttered toast and preserves, he was, at last, caught. Do not fancy, sir, that I beheld all these accidents. I believe I fainted; but I recovered to desperate energy, and seizing a pen, indited the following letter to a friend:

"DEAR SIR:—I am indebted to you for so much kindness, which I have never been able to repay, that I have suffered acutely as a delicate mind must, when oppressed by the weight of obligations it cannot return. Imagine, then, the pleasure I feel in believing that I am at last able to offer you a token of my gratitude in the shape of a valuable monkey. It is not only a curiosity, but it is the prettiest pet imaginable—so gentle, and so endearing, that I am sure you will soon become as much attached to it as I am; indeed, it is only in parting with it that I have discovered how dear it is to me; but, as I would not give you anything I did not particularly prize, I trust that the reluctance with which I do so, will evidence that I consider this the only offering that could fully express the esteem and gratitude of

"Truly yours, CHERICOT."

I sealed my letter, gave it and the monkey into the charge of a porter, and sat down with buoyant spirits and fine appetite to the relics of my supper, congratulating myself on having paid a debt and got rid of my tormentor at the same time; or in vulgar parlance on having "killed two birds (my friend and the monkey) with one stone." Short lived, however, were my transports, for in an hour my messenger returned with the "plague of my life" and the following answer to my epistle:

"MY DEAR FRIEND:—I appreciate the delicacy which prompts you to return what you wrongly estimate as benefits on my part; but much as I admire the interesting animal you have sent me, I would not for worlds deprive you of a pet which you seem so highly to value. I should blame myself were I to take advantage of the self-sacrificing spirit which animated you, when you so amiably wished to express a gratitude that I really do not merit, and I hasten to assuage the grief you must doubtless be suffering at parting from your monkey, and, by promptly returning him, convert your sorrow into smiles of joy. If it is ever in my power to be of use to you, do not hesitate to command me, and remember I can never consent to receive any return for the trifling services of Yours, respectfully,

J. JONES."

If my correspondent could have seen the face that met my view in the opposite mirror, as I raised my head after perusing his letter, I fancy he would have beheld frowns instead of the smiles he had anticipated; but I will only say, that I ordered the grinning little beast down stairs so that I might not be tempted to tear him in pieces, and retiring to my bed, passed a sleepless night in a vain attempt to discover a way out of my perplexities. The fruit of my cogitations was a resolve to make another attempt to dispose of "Beauty," by presenting him to a lady of my acquaintance, the mother of a large family of spoiled children, who were very fit associates for my monkey. I sent him to her accordingly, after breakfast, and was more cautious this time in expressing my affection for him:

"MY DEAR MADAM:—I have just received a valuable and curious monkey from the West Indies, and as I have no place to keep him in without confining him too much, I send him to you, begging you to accept him as a present for your very interesting children. He is the most gentle of his species—so winning in his ways, and so harmless, that your dear little cherubs may play with him with impunity. I trust he will be the source of many a happy hour to them and of consequent pleasure to you. Give my regards to Mr. Smith, and be sure to kiss all your precious darlings for Yours, truly,
CHERICOT."

The porter shortly returned with a message of thanks, giving me the consolatory assurance that the family appeared delighted with their new acquisition; and now, what a load was removed from my oppressed bosom! How gaily I set about repairing the monkey's misdemeanors; in what spirits I re-indited my account of Mrs. Tabitha's doings in her New Home, and how sweetly I slept that night, you can imagine better than I can describe.

But I was rudely awakened from my peaceful slumbers early the following morning by Alice, who handed me a letter, saying—

"Sure, the craythur's like a bad penny—he's come back again."

I opened the missive with trembling hands, and a palpitating heart, and read as follows:—

"I have hitherto considered you a friend, and in the belief of your affection for me and mine, have lavished on you the tenderness of a confiding heart. How you have repaid that trust, let your conscience answer if it be not deaf to the loud thunders of accusing friendship, which demands in accents not to be misunderstood, why did you send me that monkey?

"When your treacherous letter and equally treacherous present were handed me, I hailed them with pleasure as new proofs of your love. I considered them delightful evidences of that tender intercourse of soul, that congeniality of mind and attainments that had hitherto united us in the lasting bonds of enduring unanimity. While my innocent babes danced eagerly round the new comer, I sat in a delicious reverie, apostrophising you as the friend of my soul. I recalled the blissful period, and now, false friend, if we are parted forever—blame your monkey for it! If I supposed you undesignedly injured me, I would forgive it and restore my confidence to you, but circumstances too plainly prove what Mr. Smith and myself have for sometime suspected, your intense hatred of my defenceless family. The very last day we spent at your house, I could not help remarking the impatience with which you regarded their playful gambols, and your malignant looks when my noble George Washington broke the lamp and upset the oil on the carpet. Could you not have vented your malice on me and spared my precious infants?

When we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted;

"But listen to the detail of the suffering you have inflicted, and if you have any feeling or any tears to shed—prepare them now. Mr. Smith, to please our darlings, released the odious thing from the cruel confinement in which you had kept it, and tying it with a rope under the shed in the yard, our compassionate children immediately began to feed it. I am sure you must have starved the poor creature, for never did I see such an appetite. Tomatoes, peaches, oranges, water-melons, nuts and cakes, went down its throat in such rapid succession that at last the nasty beast could not move. It continued in a state of torpor until after tea, when my timid fawn, Rosa Matilda, playfully poking a stick in its eye, the little wretch jumped up, broke its string, rushed at her and bit her cheek till the blood streamed down her neck. While I bathed the gory wounds with my tears and some arnica, every one pursued the infuriated animal; and Zachary Taylor, bravely attacking it in the rear, caught hold of its tail, but it fiercely bit his poor little finger and dashed into the house, where it whisped its paw into William Henry Harrison's eye, swelling it shut, and making it so black and blue that he really is not fit to be seen. As for Winfield Scott, notwithstanding he retreated to the pantry and entrenched himself behind the butter tub, the monkey laid in ambush, and the minute the poor child lifted his head, left scarcely a lock of hair on it; indeed, he looks as if he had been scalped. My cap was snatched off and torn to pieces, and when he had demolished that, he flew at poor Mr. Smith, clutched his wig, threw it into the kitchen fire, and literally covered his bald head with scratches.

"My dear, witty, little Charles Dickens says it looks for all the world like the globe with ever so many lines of latitude and longitude on it, and shows that his pa has passed the meridian of his life. We have only just caught the animal after two hours of riot and destruction, that I cannot pretend to describe. My looking-glasses, in particular, Mr. Smith thinks you ought to pay for; but I don't suppose you have feeling enough for that, so I will just add I have done with you for ever: and here's your monkey back again; and if you don't feel remorse when you read this, come and see for yourself that what Scott says is true:

"No spectre can the charnel send,
So dreadful as an injured friend."

For I may say, that inside and outside we are nothing but injuries. Mr. Smith joins me in hoping you may never know what peace is any more, but I don't suppose you care what we think.

"FANNY SMITH."

Now, Mr. Editor, I declare to you that the lady, who wrote the above letter, never was an intimate friend of mine; that we had been acquainted but a short time, and that I was as innocent of any regard for her as I was of malice preposse toward her children. You will perceive a strange discrepancy in her style, which varies from injured eloquence to coarse vulgarity; and as it is a fair sample of her conversation, you may imagine how probable it was that I, who have a soul which soars above the meaner things of earth, could have been linked with her in the ties of friendship. Dear little "Beauty," I could almost love you for the good taste you have shown in disliking that horrid woman!

When I recovered my temper, which was not for a day or two, I immediately began to consider about giving the monkey his credentials, and sending him again on his travels; and fortunately recollecting that a fair, frivolous, young lady, of my acquaintance, who had a passion for pets, had formerly expressed a wish for one, I thought myself tolerably secure, in sending "Beauty" to her, of never seeing him again. Alas! how vain were my hopes—but I will not anticipate.

"DEAREST ORIANNA:—I have often heard you wish for a monkey, and I am supremely happy to contribute to your enjoyment, by sending you one I have just received. I have had some difficulty in preserving it for you, so many of my friends coveted it; but as I destined it for you, my fondest and fairest, I resisted all petitions. Our mutual friend, Mrs. Smith, is quite offended at me about it; but I shall not care, if you are pleased, which I am sure you must be with such an engaging pet. Au revoir. CHERICOT."

Two days, a week, elapsed, and as I heard nothing of "Beauty," I began to consider him as among the things that were; but, as usual, like uncurrent coin, or a counterfeit note, he would not pass, but invariably came back to me. The gentle Orianna's rose-scented billet will explain the difficulty.

"FRIEND OF MY HEART:—It grieves me to the soul to send you back the darling fellow; but pa, like Fate, is inexorable, and I am forced to submit to his decrees. You will readily conceive my anguish at parting with him, for he was not only inestimable as a token of your affection, but is, besides, the dearest little love of a creature I ever beheld. I was so delighted to get him, and had such pleasure in working for him. I never looked at my canary, nor spoke to Fidèle, while he was in the house; but, alas! those days of happiness are fled for ever, and I am left in solitude to sigh. You may imagine how I loved him, when I tell you, that, with the exception of the whiskers and moustache, he was the exact image of dear Harry Harumscarum, (who, I suppose you know, has deserted me for that vile California.)

"I had a sweet, blue cashmere mantle made for him (the monkey, not Harry), tied with charming cherry colored rosettes; also, a pink, bound with white satin, and an orange, with lilac fringe; a velvet cap, with gold tassel, completed his costume, in which he did, indeed, look irresistible. Ah! poor, little fellow! I shall never admire you again, as I have done, dancing with delight at your finery; for, my dear, he was just as much pleased with dress as any man I ever saw. Pa was absent, at New York, until yesterday, and, when he returned, began, as I had expected, to grumble at and abuse the sweet fellow; but I do think matters would not have come to an extremity, had not dear "Beauty" injudiciously jumped out of my arms, as we sat at table, and knocked a cup of scalding hot tea down pa's bosom; the immediate consequence of which was, that he swore shockingly, and ordered me to send him instantly out of the house. This command I obeyed with many tears, and feeling reluctant to hurt your feelings by returning him to you, I sent him, with a friendly message, to Mrs. Smith, who, you intimated in your note, was anxious to have him. Imagine my dismay at his being sent back, with such a letter. Oh! my dear, you never saw anything like it, and I can't pretend to tell you all that was in it;—she accuses poor, innocent me of having leagued with you to add insult to injury, and says she hopes neither of us will ever darken her doors again. Of course, we won't; but do explain to me what she means? Je vous embrasse tendrement.

"ORIANNA."

"P. S.—I am forced, as you perceive, to return the monkey, but I shall often call to see him; indeed, if you do not object, I should like to have his daguerreotype, as, in the hurry of departure, dear Harry forgot to leave me his, and they are so much alike."

As usual with people in distress, I have many friends to give me advice, but there is no one generous enough to take my monkey: in fact, he has given me so much trouble that I am resolved to sell him, and get paid for it; but here, again, is a difficulty—no one will have him as a gift, no one will steal him, no one will buy him.

One gentleman says he would be glad to have him—but he once owned a monkey, for whom he paid ten dollars, and the first time he left the house, his wife traded the animal off to a Jew for a common red bird, paying him a dollar and a half to boot, so he don't like to put another such expensive speculation in her way.

I should like to know the value of my monkey; but, that, like everything else concerning him, is a mystery. One person says he is worth twelve dollars; a second tells me two is too much for him; a third advises me to get rid of him on any terms, and a fourth bids me to let him run. I turn in despair to the newspapers, and the prices current tells me that ashes have a tendency upwards, that molasses is firm, cotton shaky, tobacco in demand, while common salt is rated heavy. I even see Scotch pigs mentioned (which I am told refers to iron); but there is nothing said about monkeys. In fact, a friend assures me that the market is glutted. He asserts they are to be seen for nothing, in any quantity, parading Chestnut street at fashionable hours, twirling their canes, and gazing impertinently at the belles who pass them.

But my monkey, sir, is not like those; he really is an uncommon monkey. Notwithstanding all the abuse that Mrs. Smith and Orianna's pa have lavished on him, I solemnly assure you he is a most desirable acquisition to any family circle. When you caressingly smooth his soft grey fur, you are rewarded by a smile that displays two rows of seed pearls, and his bright hazel eyes beam gratitude on you, while his long, feathery tail twines caressingly round your arm. Indeed, sir, if you can persuade anybody to purchase him, they will never repent it. I would advertise him, but that malicious Mrs. Smith takes the Ledger, and I am sure she would slander him, so that no one would like to have him. So, if you have any friend who answers to the description of the old proverb, "A fool and his money is soon parted," ask him to

BUY MY MONKEY.

TRUE AND BEAUTIFUL.—Channing says: "We have felt, when looking above us into the atmosphere, that there was an infinity of space which we could not explore. When I look into man's spirit, and see there the germs of an immortal life, I feel more deeply that an infinity lies hid beyond what I see. In the idea of duty which springs up in every human heart, I discern a law more sacred and boundless than gravitation, which binds the soul to a more glorious universe than that to which attraction binds the body, and which is to endure though the laws of physical nature pass away. Every moral sentiment, every intellectual action, is to me a hint, a prophetic sign, of a spiritual power to be expanded forever: just as a faint ray from a distant star is significant of unimaginable splendor."

THE LITTLE STUMPY MAN.

FROM "ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH, OR LIFE IN CANADA," BY MRS. MOODIE.

Before I dismiss for ever the troubles and sorrows of 1836, I would fain introduce to the notice of my readers some of the odd characters with whom we became acquainted during that period. The first that starts vividly to my recollection is the picture of a short, stumpy, thick-set man—a British sailor, too—who came to stay one night under our roof, and took quiet possession of his quarters for nine months, and whom we were obliged to tolerate from the simple fact that we could not get rid of him.

During the fall, Moodie had met this individual (whom I will call Mr. Malcolm) in the mail-coach, going up to Toronto. Amused with his eccentric and blunt manners, and finding him a shrewd, clever fellow in conversation, Moodie told him that if ever he came into his part of the world he should be glad to renew their acquaintance. And so they parted, with mutual goodwill, as men often part who have travelled a long journey in good fellowship together, without thinking it probable they should ever meet again.

The sugar season had just commenced with the spring thaw; Jacob had tapped a few trees in order to obtain sap to make molasses for the children, when his plans were frustrated by the illness of my husband, who was again attacked with the ague. Towards the close of a wet, sloppy night, while Jacob was in the wood, chopping, and our servant gone to my sister, who was ill, to help to wash, as I was busy baking bread for tea, my attention was aroused by a violent knocking at the door, and the furious barking of our dog, Hector. I ran to open it, when I found Hector's teeth clenched in the trousers of a little, dark, thick-set man, who said in a gruff voice,

"Call off your dog. What do you keep such a brute about the house for? Is it to bite people who come to see you?"

Hector was the best-behaved, best-tempered animal in the world; he might have been called a gentlemanly dog. So little was there of the unmannerly puppy in his behavior, that I was perfectly astonished at his ungracious conduct. I caught him by the collar, and not without some difficulty succeeded in dragging him off.

"Is Captain Moodie within?" said the stranger. "He is, sir. But he is ill in bed—too ill to be seen."

"Tell him a friend," (he laid a strong stress upon the last word,) a particular friend must speak to him."

I now turned my eyes to the face of the speaker with some curiosity. I had taken him for a mechanic, from his dirty, slovenly appearance; and his physiognomy was so unpleasant that I did not credit his assertion that he was a friend of my husband, for I was certain that no man who possessed such a forbidding aspect could be regarded by Moodie as a friend. I was about to deliver his message, but the moment I let go Hector's collar, the dog was at him again.

"Don't strike him with your stick," I cried, throwing my arms over the faithful creature.

"He is a powerful animal, and if you provoke him, he will kill you."

I at last succeeded in coaxing Hector into the girl's room, where I shut him up, while the stranger came into the kitchen, and walked to the fire to dry his wet clothes.

I immediately went into the parlor, where Moodie was lying upon a bed near the stove, to deliver the stranger's message; but before I could say a word, he dashed in after me, and going up to the bed, held out his broad, coarse hand, with, "How are you, Mr. Moodie? You see I have accepted your kind invitation sooner than either you or I expected. If you will give me house-room for the night I shall be obliged to you."

This was said in a low, mysterious voice; and Moodie, who was still struggling with the hot fit of his disorder, and whose senses were not a little confused, stared at him with a look of vague bewilderment. The countenance of the stranger grew dark.

"You cannot have forgotten me—my name is Malcolm."

"Yes, yes; I remember you now," said the invalid, holding out his burning, feverish hand. To my home, such as it is, you are welcome."

I stood by in wondering astonishment, looking from one to the other, as I had no recollection of ever hearing my husband mention the name of the stranger; but as he had invited him to share our hospitality, I did my best to make him welcome, though in what manner he was to be accommodated puzzled me not a little. I placed the arm-chair by the fire, and told him that I would prepare tea for him as soon as I could.

"It may be as well to tell you, Mrs. Moodie," said he sulkily, for he was evidently displeased by my husband's want of recognition on his first entrance, "that I have had no dinner."

I sighed to myself, for I well knew that our larder boasted of no dainties; and from the animal expression of our guest's face, I rightly judged that he was fond of good living.

By the time I had fried a rasher of salt pork, and made a pot of dandelion coffee, the bread I had been preparing was baked; but grown flour will not make light bread, and it was unusually heavy. For the first time I felt heartily ashamed of our humble fare. I was sure that he for whom it was provided was not one to pass it over in benevolent silence. "He might be a gentleman," I thought, "but he does not look like one;" and a confused idea of who he was, and where Moodie had met with him, began to float through my mind. I did not like the appearance of the man, but I consoled myself that he was only to stay for one night, and I could give up my bed for that one night, and sleep on a bed on the floor by my sick husband. When he re-entered the parlor to cover the table, I found Moodie fallen asleep, and Mr. Malcolm reading. As I placed the tea-things on the table, he raised his head, and regarded me with a gloomy stare. He was a strange-looking creature; his features were tolerably regular, his complexion dark, with a good color, his very broad and round head was covered with a perfect mass of close, black, curling hair, which, in growth, texture, and hue, resembled the wiry, curly hide of a water-dog. His eyes and mouth were both well-shaped, but gave, by their sinister expression, an odious and doubtful meaning to the whole of his physiognomy. The eyes were cold, insolent, and cruel, and as green as the eyes of a cat. The mouth bespoke a sullen, determined, and sneering disposition, as if it belonged to one brutally obstinate, one who could not by any gentle means be persuaded from his purpose. Such a man in a passion would have been a terrible wild beast; but the current of his feelings seemed to flow in a deep sluggish channel, rather than in a violent or impetuous one; and, like William Penn, when he reconnoitred his unwelcome visitors through the keyhole of the door, I looked at my strange guest, and liked him not. Perhaps my distant and constrained manner made him painfully aware of the fact, for I am certain that, from the first hour of our acquaintance, a deep-rooted antipathy existed between us, which time seemed rather to strengthen than diminish.

He ate of his meal sparingly, and with evident disgust; the only remarks which dropped from him were:

"You make bad bread in the bush. Strange, that you can't keep your potatoes from the frost! I should have thought that you could have had things more comfortable in the woods."

"We have been very unfortunate," I said, "since we came to the woods. I am sorry that you should be obliged to share the poverty of the land. It would have given me much pleasure could I have set before you a more comfortable meal."

"Oh, don't mention it. So that I get good pork and potatoes I shall be contented."

What did these words imply?—an extension of his visit? I hoped that I was mistaken; but before I could lose any time in conjecture my husband awoke. The fit had left him, and he rose and dressed himself, and was soon chatting cheerfully with his guest.

Mr. Malcolm now informed him that he was hiding from the sheriff of the N— district's officers, and that it would be conferring upon him a great favor if he would allow him to remain at his house for a few weeks.

"To tell you the truth, Malcolm," said Moodie, "we are so badly off that we can scarcely find food for ourselves and the children. It is out of our power to make you comfortable, or to keep an additional hand, without he is willing to render some little help on the farm. If you can do this, I will endeavor to get a few necessaries on credit, to make your stay more agreeable."

To this proposition Malcolm readily assented, not only because it released him from all sense of obligation, but because it gave him a privilege to grumble.

Finding that his stay might extend to an indefinite period, I got Jacob to construct a rude bedstead of two large chests that had transported some of our goods across the Atlantic, and which he put up in a corner of the parlor. This I provided with a small hair-mattress, and furnished with what bedding I could spare.

For the first fortnight of his sojourn, our guest did nothing but lie upon that bed, and read, and smoke, and drink whiskey and water from morning until night. By degrees he let out part of his history; but there was a mystery about him which he took good care never to clear up. He was the son of an officer in the navy, who had not only attained a very high rank in the service, but, for his gallant conduct, had been made a Knight-Companion of the Bath.

He had himself served his time as a midshipman on board his father's flag-ship, but had left the navy and accepted a commission in the Buenos-Ayres service during the political struggles in that province; he had commanded a sort of privateer under the government, to whom, by his own account, he had rendered many very signal services. Why he left South America and came to Canada, he kept a profound secret. He had indulged in very vicious and dissipated courses since he came to the province, and by his own account had spent upwards of four thousand pounds, in a manner not over creditable to himself. Finding that his friends would answer his bills no longer, he took possession of a grant of land obtained through his father's interest, up in Hersey, a barren township on the shores of Stony Lake; and, after putting up his shanty, and expending all his remaining means, he found that he did not possess one acre out of the whole four hundred that would yield a crop of potatoes. He was now considerably in debt, and the lands, such as they were, had been seized, with all his effects, by the sheriff, and a warrant was out for his own apprehension, which he contrived to elude during his sojourn with us. Money he had none; and, beyond the dirty fear-nought blue seaman's jacket which he wore, a pair of trowsers of the coarse cloth of the country, an old black vest that had seen better days, and two blue-checked shirts, clothes he had none. He shaved but once a week, never combed his hair, and never washed himself. A dirtier or more slovenly creature never before was dignified by the title of a gentleman. He was, however, a man of good education, of excellent abilities, and possessed a bitter, sarcastic knowledge of the world; but he was selfish and unprincipled in the highest degree.

His shrewd observations and great conversational powers had first attracted my husband's attention, and, as men seldom show their bad qualities on a journey, he thought him a blunt, good fellow, who had travelled a great deal, and could render himself a very agreeable companion by a graphic relation of his adventures. He could be all this, when he chose to relax from his sullen, morose mood; and, much as I disliked him, I have listened with interest for hours to his droll descriptions of South American life and manners.

Naturally indolent, and a constitutional grumbler, it was with the greatest difficulty that Moodie could get him to do anything beyond bringing a few pails of water from the swamp for the use of the house, and he has often passed me carrying water up from the lake without offering to relieve me of the burden. Mary, the betrothed of Jacob, called him a perfect beast; but he, returning good for evil, considered her a very pretty girl, and paid her so many uncouth attentions that he aroused the jealousy of honest Jake, who vowed that he would give him a good "looming" if he only dared to lay a finger upon his sweetheart. With Jacob to back her, Mary treated the "zeabear," as Jacob termed him, with vast disdain, and was so saucy to him that, forgetting his admiration, he declared he would like to serve her as the Indians had done a scolding woman in South America. They attacked her house during the absence of her husband, cut out her tongue, and nailed it to the door, by way of knocker; and he thought that all women who would not keep a civil tongue in their head should be served in the same manner.

"And what should be done to men who swear and use ondacent language?" quoth Mary, indignantly. "Their tongues should be slit, and given to the dogs. Faugh! You are such a nasty fellow that I don't think Hector would eat your tongue."

"I'll kill that beast," muttered Malcolm, as he walked away.

I remonstrated with him on the impropriety of bandying words with our servants. "You see," I said, "the disrespect with which they treat you: and if they presume upon your familiarity, to speak to our guest in this contemptuous manner, they will soon extend the same conduct to us."

"But, Mrs. Moodie, you should reprove them."

"I cannot, sir, while you continue, by taking liberties with the girl, and swearing at the man, to provoke them to retaliation."

"Swearing! What harm is there in swearing? A sailor cannot live without oaths."

"But a gentleman might, Mr. Malcolm. I should be sorry to consider you in any other light."

"Ah, you are such a prude—so methodistical—you make no allowance for circumstances! Surely, in the woods we may dispense with the hypocritical, conventional forms of society, and speak and act as we please."

"So you seem to think; but you see the result."

"I have never been used to the society of ladies, and I cannot fashion my words to please them; and I won't, that's more!" he muttered to himself, as he strode off to Moodie in the field. I wished from my very heart that he was once more on the deck of his piratical South American craft.

One night he insisted on going out in the canoe to spear muskinoe with Moodie. The evening turned out very chill and foggy, and before twelve, they returned, with only one fish, and half frozen with cold. Malcolm had got twinges of rheumatism, and he fussed, and sulked, and swore, and quarrelled with everybody and everything, until Moodie, who was highly amused by his petulance, advised him to go to his bed, and pray for the happy restoration of his temper.

"Temper!" he cried. "I don't believe there's a good-tempered person in the world. It's all hypocrisy! I never had a good temper! My mother was an ill-tempered woman, and ruled my father, who was a confoundedly severe, domineering man. I was born in an ill-temper. I was an ill-tempered child; I grew up an ill-tempered man. I feel worse than ill-tempered now, and when I die it will be in an ill-temper."

"Well," quoth I, "Moodie has made you a tumbler of hot punch, which may help to drive out the cold and the ill-temper, and cure the rheumatism."

"Ay; your husband's a good fellow, and worth two of you, Mrs. Moodie. He makes some allowance for the weakness of human nature, and can excuse even my ill-temper."

I did not choose to bandy words with him, and the next day the unfortunate creature was shaking with the ague. A more intractable, outrageous, impatient I never had the ill fortune to nurse. During the cold fit, he did nothing but swear at the cold, and wished himself roasting; and during the fever, he swore at the heat, and wished that he was sitting in no other garment than his shirt, on the north side of an iceberg. And when the fit at last left him, he got up, and ate such quantities of fat pork, and drank so much whiskey-punch, that you would have imagined he had just arrived from a long journey, and had not tasted food for a couple of days.

He would not believe that fishing in the cold night-air upon the water had made him ill, but raved that it was all my fault for having laid my baby down on his bed while it was shaking with the ague.

Yet, if there were the least tenderness mixed up in his iron nature, it was the affection he displayed for that young child. Dunbar was just twenty months old, with bright, dark eyes, dimpled cheeks, and soft, flowing, golden hair, which fell round his infant face in rich curls. The merry, confiding little creature formed such a contrast to his own surly, unyielding temper, that, perhaps, that very circumstance made the bond of union between them. When in the house, the little boy was seldom out of his arms, and whatever were Malcolm's faults, he had none in the eyes of the child, who used to cling around his neck, and kiss his rough, unshaven cheeks with the greatest fondness.

"If I could afford it, Moodie," he said one day to my husband, "I should like to marry. I want some one upon whom I could vent my affections." And wanting that some one in the form of a woman, he contented himself with venting them upon the child.

As the spring advanced, and after Jacob left us, he seemed ashamed of sitting in the house doing nothing, and therefore undertook to make us a garden, or "to make garden," as the Canadians term preparing a few vegetables for the season. I procured the necessary seeds, and watched with no small surprise the industry with which our strange visitor commenced operations. He repaired the broken fence, dug the ground with the greatest care, and laid it out with a skill and neatness of which I believed him perfectly incapable. In less than three weeks, the whole plot presented a very pleasing prospect, and he was really elated by his success.

"At any rate," said he, "we shall no longer be starved on bad flour and potatoes. We shall have peas, and beans, and beets, and carrots, and cabbage in abundance; besides the plot I have reserved for cucumbers and melons."

"Ah," thought I, "does he indeed mean to stay with us until the melons are ripe?" and my heart died within me, for he not only was a great additional expense, but he gave a great deal of additional trouble, and entirely robbed us of all privacy, as our very parlor was converted into a bedroom for his accommodation; besides that, a man of his singularly dirty habits made a very disagreeable inmate.

The only redeeming point in his character, in my eyes, was his love for Dunbar. I could not entirely hate a man who was so fondly attached to my child. To the two little girls he was very cross, and often chased them from him with blows. He had, too, an odious way of finding fault with everything. I never could cook to please him; and he tried in the most malicious way to induce Moodie to join in his complaints. All his schemes to make strife between us, however, failed, and were generally visited upon himself. In no way did he ever seek to render me the least assistance. Shortly after Jacob left us, Mary Price was offered higher wages by a family at Peterborough, and for some time I was left with four little children, and without a servant. Moodie always milked the cows, because I never could overcome my fear of cattle; and though I had occasionally milked when there was no one else in the way, it was in fear and trembling.

Moodie had to go down to Peterborough; but before he went, he begged Malcolm to bring me what water and wood I required, and to stand by the cattle while I milked the cows, and he would himself be home before night. He started at six in the morning, and I got the pail to go and milk. Malcolm was lying upon his bed, reading.

"Mr. Malcolm, will you be so kind as to go with me to the fields for a few minutes while I milk?"

"Yes!" (then with a sulky frown,) "but I want to finish what I am reading."

"I will not detain you long."

"Oh, no! I suppose about an hour. You are a shocking bad milker."

"True; I never went near a cow until I came to this country; and I have never been able to overcome my fear of them."

"More shame for you! A farmer's wife, and afraid of a cow! Why, these little children would laugh at you."

I did not reply, nor would I ask him again. I walked slowly to the field, and my indignation made me forget my fear. I had just finished milking, and with a brimming pail was preparing to climb the fence and return to the house, when a very wild ox we had come running with headlong speed from the wood. All my fears were alive again in a moment. I snatched up the pail, and, instead of climbing the fence and getting to the house, I ran with all the speed I could command down the steep hill towards the lake shore; my feet caught in a root of the many stumps in the path, and I fell to the ground, my pail rolling many yards ahead of me. Every drop of milk was spilt upon the grass. The ox passed on. I gathered myself up and returned home. Malcolm was very fond of new milk, and came to meet me at the door.

"Hi! hi!—Where's the milk?"

"No milk for the poor children, to-day," said I, showing him the inside of the pail, with a sorrowful shake of the head, for it was no small loss to them and me.

"How's that? So you were afraid to milk the cows. Come away, and I will keep off the bugaboos."

"I did milk them—no thanks to your kindness, Mr. Malcolm—but—"

"But what?"

"The ox frightened me, and I fell, and spilt all the milk."

"Whew! Now, don't go and tell your husband that it was all my fault; if you had had a little patience, I would have come when you asked me, but I don't choose to be dictated to, and I won't be made a slave by you or any one else."

"Then why do you stay, sir, where you consider yourself so treated?" said I. "We are all obliged to work to obtain bread; we give you the best share—surely the return we ask for it is but small."

"You make me feel my obligations to you when you ask me to do anything; if you left it to my better feelings, we should get on better."

"Perhaps you are right. I will never ask you to do anything for me in future."

"Oh, now, that's all mock humility. In spite of the tears in your eyes, you are as angry with me as ever; but don't go to make mischief between me and Moodie. If you'll say nothing about my refusing to go with you, I'll milk the cows for you myself to-night."

"And can you milk?" said I, with some curiosity.

"Milk! Yes; and if I were not so confoundedly low-spirited and lazy, I could do a thousand other things too. But, now, don't say a word about it to Moodie."

I made no promise; but my respect for him was not increased by his cowardly fear of reproof from Moodie, who treated him with a kindness and consideration which he did not deserve. The afternoon turned out very wet, and I was sorry that I should be troubled with his company all day in the house. I was making a shirt for Moodie from some cotton that had been sent me from home, and he placed himself by the side of the stove, just opposite, and continued to regard me for a long time with his usual sullen stare. I really felt half afraid of him.

"Don't you think me mad?" said he. "I have a brother deranged; he got a stroke of the sun in India, and lost his senses in consequence; but sometimes I think it runs in the family."

What answer could I give to this speech, but mere evasive commonplace?

"You won't say what you really think," he continued; "I know you hate me, and that makes me dislike you. Now, what would you say if I told you I had committed a murder, and that it was the recollection of that circumstance that made me at times so restless and unhappy?"

I looked up in his face, not knowing what to believe.

"'Tis fact," said he, nodding his head; and I hoped that he would not go mad, like his brother, and kill me.

"Come, I'll tell you all about it; I know the world would laugh at me for calling such an act murder; and yet I have been such a miserable man ever since, that I feel it was."

"There was a noted leader among the rebel Buenos Ayreans, whom the government wanted much to get hold of. He was a fine, dashing, handsome fellow; I had often seen him, but we never came to close quarters. One night, I was lying wrapped up in my poncho at the bottom of my boat, which was rocking in the surf, waiting for two of my men, who were gone on shore. There came to the shore, this man and one of his people, and they stood so near the boat, which I suppose they thought empty, that I could distinctly hear their conversation. I suppose it was the devil who tempted me to put a bullet through that man's heart. He was an enemy to the flag under which I fought, but he was no enemy to me—I had no right to become his executioner, but still the desire to kill him, for the mere devilry of the thing, came so strongly upon me, that I no longer tried to resist it. I rose slowly upon my knees; the moon was shining very bright at the time, both he and his companion were too earnestly engaged to see me, and I deliberately shot him through the body. He fell with a heavy groan back into the water; but I caught the last look he threw up to the moonlight skies before his eyes glazed in death. Oh, that look!—so full of despair, of unutterable anguish; it haunts me yet—it will haunt me for ever. I would not have cared if I had killed him in strife—but in cold blood, and he so unsuspecting of his doom! Yes, it was murder; I know by this constant tugging at my heart that it was murder. What do you say to it?"

"I should think as you do, Mr. Malcolm. It is a terrible thing to take away the life of a fellow-creature, without the least provocation."

"Ah! I knew you would blame me; but he was an enemy after all; I had a right to kill him; I was hired by the government under whom I served to kill him: and who shall condemn me?"

"No one more than your own heart."

"It is not the heart, but the brain, that must decide in questions of right and wrong," said he. "I acted from impulse, and shot the man; had I reasoned upon it for five minutes, that man would be living now. But what's done cannot be undone. Did I ever show you the work I wrote upon South America?"

"Are you an author?" said I, incredulously.

"To be sure I am. Murray offered me £100 for my manuscript, but I would not take it. Shall I read to you some passages from it?"

I am sorry to say that his behaviour in the morning was uppermost in my thoughts, and I had no repugnance in refusing.

"No, don't trouble yourself. I have the dinner to cook, and the children to attend to, which will cause a constant interruption; you had better defer it to some other time."

"I shan't ask you to listen to me again," said he, with a look of offended vanity; but he went to his trunk, and brought out a large MS., written on foolscap, which he commenced reading to himself with an air of great self-importance, glancing from time to time at me, and smiling disdainfully. Oh, how glad I was when the door opened, and the return of Moodie broke up this painful tete-a-tete.

From the sublime to the ridiculous is but a step. The very next day, Mr. Malcolm made his appearance before me, wrapped in a great-coat belonging to my husband, which literally came down to his heels. At this strange apparition, I fell a-laughing.

"For Heaven's sake, Mrs. Moodie, lend me a pair of inexpressibles. I have met with an accident in crossing the fence, and mine are torn to shreds—gone to the devil entirely."

"Well, don't swear. I'll see what can be done for you."

I brought him a new pair of fine, drab-colored kerseymere trowsers that had never been worn. Although he was eloquent in his thanks, I had no idea that he meant to keep them for his sole individual use from that day thenceforth. But after all, what was the man to do? He had no trowsers, and no money, and he could not take to the woods. Certainly his loss was not our gain. It was the old proverb reversed.

The season for putting in the potatoes had now arrived. Malcolm volunteered to cut the sets, which was easy work that could be done in the house, and over which he could lounge and smoke; but Moodie told him that he must take his share in the field, that I had already sets enough saved to plant half-an-acre, and would have more prepared by the time they were required. With many growls and shrugs, he felt obliged to comply; and he performed his part pretty well, the execrations bestowed upon the mosquitoes and black-flies forming a sort of safety-valve to let off the concentrated venom of his temper. When he came in to dinner, he held out his hands to me.

"Look at these hands."

"They are blistered with the hoe."

"Look at my face."

"You are terribly disfigured by the black-flies. But Moodie suffers just as much, and says nothing."

"Bah!—The only consolation one feels for such annoyances is to complain. Oh, the woods!—the cursed woods!—how I wish I were out of them." The day was very warm, but in the afternoon I was surprised by a visit from an old maiden lady, a friend of mine from C—. She had walked up with a Mr. Crowe, from Peterborough, a young, brisk-looking farmer, in breeches and top-boots, just out from the old country, who, naturally enough, thought he would like to roost among the woods.

He was a little, lively, good-natured manny, with a real Anglo-Saxon face,—rosy, high cheek-boned, with full lips, and a turned-up nose; and, like most little men, was a great talker, and very full of himself. He had belonged to the second-class of farmers, and was very vulgar, both in person and manners. I had just prepared tea for my visitors, when Malcolm and Moodie returned from the field. There was no affectation about the former. He was manly in his person, and blunt even to rudeness, and I saw by the quizzical look which he cast upon the spruce little Crowe that he was quietly quizzing him from head to heel. A neighbor had sent me a present of maple molasses, and Mr. Crowe was so fearful of spilling some of the rich syrup upon his drab shorts, that he spread a large pocket-handkerchief over his knees, and tucked another under his chin. I felt very much inclined to laugh, but restrained the inclination as well as I could—and if the little creature would have sat still, I could have quelled my rebellious propensity altogether; but up he would jump at every word I said to him, and make me a low, jerking bow, often with his mouth quite full, and the treacherous molasses running over his chin.

Malcolm sat directly opposite to me and my volatile next-door neighbor. He saw the intense difficulty I had to keep my gravity, and was determined to make me laugh out. So, coming slyly behind my chair, he whispered in my ear, with the gravity of a judge, "Mrs. Moodie, that must have been the very chap who first jumped Jim Crowe."

This appeal obliged me to run from the table. Moodie was astonished at my rudeness; and Malcolm, as he resumed his seat, made the matter worse by saying, "I wonder what is the matter with Mrs. Moodie; she is certainly very hysterical this afternoon."

The potatoes were planted, and the season of strawberries, green peas, and young potatoes come, but still Malcolm remained our constant guest. He had grown so indolent, and gave himself so many airs, that Moodie was heartily sick of his company, and gave him many gentle hints to change his quarters; but our guest was determined to take no hint. For some reason best known to himself, perhaps out of sheer contradiction, which formed one great element in his character, he seemed obstinately bent upon remaining where he was. Moodie was busy under-bushing for a full fallow. Malcolm spent much of his time in the garden, or lounging about the house. I had baked an eel-pie for dinner, which if prepared well, is by no means an unsavoury dish. Malcolm had cleaned some green peas, and washed the first young potatoes we had drawn that season, with his own hands, and he was reckoning upon the feast he should have on the potatoes with childish glee. The dinner at length was put upon the table. The vegetables were remarkably fine, and the pie looked very nice.

Moodie helped Malcolm, as he always did, very largely, and the other covered his plate with a portion of peas and potatoes, when, lo and behold! my gentleman began making a very wry face at the pie.

"What an infernal dish!" he cried, pushing away his plate with an air of great disgust. "These eels taste as if they had been stewed in oil. Moodie, you should teach your wife to be a better cook."

The hot blood burnt upon Moodie's cheek. I saw indignation blazing in his eye.

"If you don't like what is prepared for you, sir, you may leave the table, and my house, if you please. I will put up with your ungentlemanly and ungrateful conduct to Mrs. Moodie no longer."

Out stalked the offending party. I thought, to be sure, we had got rid of him; and though he deserved what was said to him, I was sorry for him. Moodie took his dinner, quietly remarking, "I wonder he could find it in his heart to leave those fine peas and potatoes."

He then went back to his work in the bush, and I cleared away the dishes, and churned, for I wanted butter for tea.

About four o'clock, Mr. Malcolm entered the room. "Mrs. Moodie," said he, in a more cheerful voice than usual, "where's the boss?"

"In the wood, under-bushing." I felt dreadfully afraid that there would be blows between them.

"I hope, Mr. Malcolm, that you are not going to him with any intention of a fresh quarrel."

"Don't you think I have been punished enough by losing my dinner?" said he, with a grin. "I don't think we shall murder one another." He shouldered his axe, and went whistling away.

After striving for a long while to stifle my foolish fears, I took the baby in my arms, and little Dunbar by the hand, and ran up to the bush where Moodie was at work.

At first I only saw my husband, but the strokes of an axe at a little distance soon guided my eyes to the spot where Malcolm was working away, as if for dear life. Moodie smiled, and looked at me significantly.

"How could the fellow stomach what I said to him? Either great necessity or great meanness must be the cause of his knocking under. I don't know whether most to pity or despise him."

"Put up with it, dearest, for this once. He is not happy, and must be greatly distressed."

Malcolm kept aloof, ever and anon casting a furtive glance towards us; at last little Dunbar ran to him, and held up his arms to be kissed. The strange man snatched him to his bosom, and covered him with caresses. It might be love to the child that had quelled his sullen spirit, or he might really have cherished an affection for us deeper than his ugly temper would allow him to show. At all events, he joined us at tea as if nothing had happened, and we might truly say that he had obtained a new lease of his long visit. But what could not be effected by words or hints of ours was brought about a few days after by the silly observation of a child. He asked Katie to give him a kiss, and he would give her some raspberries he had gathered in the bush.

"I don't want them. Go away; I don't like you, you little stumpy man!"

His rage knew no bounds. He pushed the child from him, and vowed that he would leave the house that moment—that she could not have thought of such an expression herself; she must have been taught it by us. This was an entire misconception on his part; but he would not be convinced that he was wrong. Off he went, and Moodie called after him, "Malcolm, as I am sending to Peterborough to-morrow, the man shall take in your trunk." He was too angry even to turn and bid us good-bye; but we had not seen the last of him yet. Two months after, we were taking tea with a neighbor, who lived a mile below us on the small lake. Who should walk in but Mr. Malcolm? He greeted us with great warmth for him, and when we rose to take leave, he rose and walked home by our side. "Surely the little stumpy man is not returning to his old quarters?" I am still a babe in the affairs of men. Human nature has more strange varieties than any one menagerie can contain, and Malcolm was one of the oddest of her odd species.

That night he slept in his old bed below the parlor window, and for three months afterwards he stuck to us like a beaver. He seemed to have grown more kindly, or we had got more used to his eccentricities, and let him have his own way; certainly he behaved himself much better. He neither scolded the children nor interfered with the maid, nor quarrelled with me. He had greatly discontinued his bad habit of swearing, and he talked of himself and his future prospects with more hope and self-respect. His father had promised to send him a fresh supply of money, and he proposed to buy of Moodie the clergy reserve, and that they should farm the two places on shares. This offer was received with great joy, as an unlooked-for means of paying our debts, and extricating ourselves from present and overwhelming difficulties, and we looked upon the little stumpy man in the light of a benefactor.

So matters continued until Christmas-eve, when our visitor proposed walking into Peterborough, in order to give the children a treat of raisins to make a Christmas pudding.

"We will be quite merry to-morrow," he said. "I hope we shall eat many Christmas dinners together, and continue good friends."

He started, after breakfast, with the promise of coming back at night; but night came, the Christmas passed away, months and years fled away, but we never saw the little stumpy man again!

He went away that day with a stranger in a wagon from Peterborough, and never afterwards was seen in that part of Canada. We afterwards learned that he went to Texas, and it is thought that he was killed at St. Antonio; but this is mere conjecture. Whether dead or living, I feel convinced that

"We ne'er shall look upon his like again."

SCENERY IN THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAIN.

There is something grand and awe-inspiring in the higher class of mountain scenery. The ocean spread out before you in its vastness, is a sublime spectacle. The clear, calm lake, reflecting the "crimson and gold" of sunset clouds, and mirroring on its glassy bosom the scenery which fringes its margin, is a scene of richness and beauty. The broad savanna, decorated and embroidered with flowers and verdure of every hue and odor, is an object of loveliness. But a landscape made up of lofty mountains, frowning cliffs, ravines, torrents, vales and cascades, rises to the sublime, and yet tempers its own sublimity by an intermixture of the beautiful in nature, which relieves from the oppression of that which is grand and awful only. And then, too, there is panoramic variety in such a scene, which you look for in vain in the boundless fields of ocean, the unvaried face of the smooth lake, or the monotonous beauties of the flowery prairie.

I lately made a visit to the Cumberland Mountain, in quest of health, and found myself interested in the scenery much beyond my anticipations. I ascended the mountain by the main mail route leading from Nashville to Knoxville, and took temporary quarters at Bon Air, five miles east of Sparta, on the Western brow of the mountain. The cabin assigned to myself and family was on an elevated point, a little way from the main building, and considerably higher, commanding a view among the most delightful I have ever seen. It extended from the southward round to sunset, describing half a circle, whose horizon was bounded by mountains varying, according to the best information I could get, from fifteen hundred feet high to more than two thousand; and this mountain horizon was from twenty to forty or more miles distant from my stand-point of observation. Within this broad area were included, I think, six or seven counties, or parts of counties; and the whole grand amphitheatre filled with high hills and mountains, interspersed with deep valleys, rivers, cultivated fields, villages and towns; and upon all these I looked at one glance from a position more than two thousand feet above Nashville, and near fifteen hundred feet above the neighboring village of Sparta.

But we must attempt something like an analysis of this rich landscape. Sitting in my cabin porch, and facing a point about S. S. W., the mountain falls rather abruptly, and a few rods below a bold freestone spring leaps from its rocky side, and sports its clear waters down into large troughs, prepared for their reception, at the roadside. Soon the deep descent places the tops of the tallest trees far below my sight, and a dark gulf intervenes to where the eye strikes an irregularly cone-shaped mountain which rises beyond the chasm, densely covered with green forest growth of stately stature; but the compact forest, as I look down upon it, appears like one great tree, whose top has been carefully shorn to reduce it to evenness. Behind this mountain rises another, and then another, and another, until the eye rests on the seventh of the series, where, at the distance of forty miles, it seems to support the firmamental dome, and bury its blue summit in the clouds; or, if no clouds be present, the sky and mountain-top appear a continuous wall on which the line of junction between the celestial and terrestrial is scarcely traceable by the eye. Change the view farther west or east, and the line of vision takes a diagonal range, through cultivated fields and human abodes. But in the instances of the remoter of these, the dwellings appear little more than toy-houses, and the farms as small gardens.

Through one of these valleys flows a navigable river, (Caney Fork,) which, within the scope of my horizon, has a fall of ninety feet within the distance of a few rods, and affords a five thousand horse hydraulic power. Early in the morning, you may trace the meanders of this river for many miles by the rising volume of fog, which in the distance so truthfully represents the stream from which it goes up, that you can hardly divest yourself of the illusion, especially where, within a basin of hills, it expands into a beautiful mimic lake. One morning, on looking out, a new spectacle was presented. The fog was very dense, and had risen up all over the immense basin described by my horizon, nearly to the tops of the mountains, and now I had before me a noble bay, with its coves and inlets, and in which each mountain-top was a green island in the wide waste of ideal waters. The flowing of the fog, at one point, over a depression in the remotest mountain, gave the appearance of a strait, by which the mountain-girded bay was connected with the wide ocean, and rendered the illusion absolutely perfect.

The constant diversity of shade and sunshine is a beautiful sight, and is to be seen at all times when the sun is up: for at no time did I see the whole field of vision before me either shaded or sunny. On one mountain a deep shade rested, the adjoining one was covered with bright sunshine, and another still was receiving the blessing of a refreshing shower; and in this manner the entire area was diversified. I have seen heavy showers falling in three different locations at the same time, while the intervening country was either basking in sunshine or shaded with clouds. At one time, while the sun was shining brightly around me, and in a horizontal plane from my point of view, the sky was perfectly clear, save a few light, fleecy clouds over the southern horizon; below that line of vision hung a cloud which melted before me into a copious rain, and fell on the valley beneath. The "place of the rain" was before me, and I was permitted to witness the processes of the great laboratory of nature on a grand scale.

But the sublimest exhibition of all is a thunder storm at night among these mountains. A transient sheet of flame flashes across an area of hundreds of square miles, revealing, for a moment, the giant forms of a hundred mountains, then leaving the whole under a pall of inky blackness; this is succeeded quickly by the loud thunder-peal, that makes the mountain tremble, and goes off in murmuring reverberations from mountain to mountain, until the deafening roar, weakened at each repeated echo, at last dies away in a low, distant moan.

I saw but one rainbow, and that, by-the-by, was not a bow at all. I was approaching the base of the mountain from the west, by a sort of gorge. On the nether slope of the mountain a lively shower was falling, and upon the falling rain the horizontal rays of a bright evening sun struck, and converted the shower into one broad, brilliant Iris, apparently lying on the ground, within two or three hundred yards of the place where I stood.

Altogether, we have here a glorious exhibition of the works of nature, and the power and goodness of Him who built the universe.—Southern Lady's Companion.

It is an undoubted truth, that the less one has to do, the less one finds times to do it in. One yawns, one procrastinates, one can do it when one will, and, therefore, one seldom does it at all; whereas, those who have a great deal of business, must (to use a vulgar expression) buckle to it; and then they always find time enough to do it in.

Politeness is the outward garment of good will; but many are the nutshells in which, if you crack them, nothing like a kernel is to be found.

THE ESTRANGED.

BY B. HATHAWAY.

We meet,—but yet we do not meet,
And smile, perchance,—yet do not smile;
For, oh! how is each thought replete
With darkened memories the while;
Of fatal hour, when ruthless pride
Rude plucked away the flowers divine,
Who-e fragrant garland sweetly tied
Thy trusting spirit unto mine.

For thou didst love, e'en as the heart
That troubles in this bosom chill;
Thou too must turn, though far apart,
All vainly to one image still.
Unto one altar, where was shrined
Too much of bliss for thee and me;
Now are we waked from dreams to find
How vain our deepest dreamings be!

Now, the lone paths our weary feet
Are tracing, lie full far apart;
And frail the gladdest smiles we meet,
To soothe the aching wayward heart;
For, oh! we never more may know,
Life's summer-dream, so early passed,
Nor feel again the bosom glow,
That should have charmed us to the last.

But yet thy manly brow alone
Seems lighted with divinest thought,
And more than others' is the tone
Thy lips do breathe, with music fraught.
And still I cherish, though in vain,
Their latest softly murmured sigh;
And turn me in my deep'n'g pain,
For ray from out thy starry eye.

When faith that is to truth allied,
Undimmed by doubt was ever near,
To still the favored pulse of pride,
And stay all thought of coming fear;
When forth the springs of feeling gushed
In chainless torrent, full and free,
While all the far empyrean flushed
With beams of brighter days to be.

The freshness of Love's rosy morn,
Its quiet hours of summer calm,
Its glory-promise—beauty born—
Its nectar-dews of spirit-balm,—
Its Hope,—high orb of heavenly light,
Far smiling through the live long day,
O'er scene enchanted, Eden-bright,—
Have these for ever passed away?

Has Love a mortal life alone?—
Too strangely fair, so soon to fail;
A voice to swell one rapture tone,
Then only wake in sorrow's wail?
A prophesy of pain-release,—
Of blessing never to be blessed?
An earnest of untroubled peace,—
Whose giving is alone unrest?

Or may it own the life divine,
And in the night time all unseen,
Its cheering sun still quenchless shine,
Though darkling clouds do intervene?
Its kindling beams still brighter glow,
Beyond the bound of earthly strife,
Until, in One, united flow,
Our hearts' deep streams of Love and Life?

So will I trust, nor longer mourn
Affection's buds, though early aere;

Our footsteps hasten to the bourne,
Where none may weep estrangement tear;
Where dwell the true, secure and high,
Where stricken Love has never been;
There shall recruit the severed tie,—
There Spirit greet its Spirit-kin.

INCIDENTS IN FRONTIER LIFE.

THE WAY THEY EMIGRATE.

BY AN OLD PIONEER.

At the close of the "Black Hawk War," in 1832, and as a partial indemnity for the injuries sustained, the government of the United States came into possession of a strip of country on the west side of the Mississippi, some fifty miles in width from the river, back, and extending from the vicinity of Fort Madison, north to Turkey river, above Dubuque. The Sauk and Fox nations of Indians claimed this country by conquest of the loways, about a century since. They received a valuable consideration for the exchange, and agreed to take possession of a tract of country towards the Missouri river, by the 1st of June, 1833. The people of Illinois called the country the "Black Hawk Purchase;" though that restless Indian had nothing to do in the sale or the treaty.

On the first opening of Spring, emigrants from Illinois and other Western States crossed the "Great river" at Skok-o-quan, to become the founders of a new State. A ridge of bluffs lay along the river, known to the Americans by the name of the "Flint Hills," the present site of Burlington city, where stood a solitary trading house, which had long been a gathering place for the aborigines, under the name Skok-o-quan.

The country in the rear of the Flint Hills was rich, and duly proportioned into timber and prairie: and in that direction the first tide of immigration passed. Many families from the vicinity of the writer disposed of good farms at a small price, to move to the "New Purchase." The "red-man" had scarcely set his face towards the setting sun, before many families, with their flocks and herds, found a new home on the plains of Iowa. On all the principal pathways leading across the peninsula, lying between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, wagons, people and their stock might be seen moving to the "Black Hawk Purchase."

Until they could open farms and raise crops, there was much suffering amongst these pioneers. The influx of immigration to the adjacent parts of Illinois, required all the surplus grain and provisions. Corn for bread could not be had for the people in the "New Purchase," even at an extravagant price, within fifty, and to some settlements, one hundred miles. And those who had no money to purchase with, nor team to haul it, had no alternative but to live without bread until they could prepare ground, fence it, and put in and cultivate a crop. Meat could be obtained by hunting, but the "staff of life" could not be had.

In the early part of the summer of 1833, the writer was travelling through the counties on the "Military Tract" in Illinois, as the country was called that lay between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers. He was engaged in establishing Sunday schools in the sparse, frontier settlements.

All the immigration by land to the Iowa country had to cross this tract. It was an interesting speculation to watch the "movers" as they wended their way to the New Purchase. For the amusement of such readers of the "Home Gazette," as are strangers to the aspects of frontier life, we will give an unvarnished portraiture of an immigrating family.

As the last rays of the setting sun were gilding the tops of the forest trees, and shedding their mellow tints on the floating clouds, a large road wagon, covered with coarse white cloth, with four horses, was seen entering the forest from the border of a large prairie, and proceeding slowly down the descent towards a small stream.

An elderly man with several youngsters of both sexes were marching on foot, and driving the cows and swine lazily along. A large sun-burnt man, with his clothing soiled and torn, was driving the team. He sat astride the hindmost horse, on the left side, and guided the others by a rope in one hand, while with the other he cracked his heavy whip to stimulate their efforts. The old man, who appeared to be about fifty, carried his rifle in a sloping position on his shoulder, while two stout lads each had the same deadly weapon. Their hunting gear was on, and each carried a large hunting-knife in his belt. Peering out from under the wagon cover could be seen the swarthy, wrinkled face of the matron, with a younger female, who might be taken for the "helpmate" of the driver, especially as three white-headed, dingy-looking children, with soiled faces and black eyes, were too young to claim consanguinity to the elderly female, unless in the line of second generation.

The weather for several days had been dry, and the roads dusty, and had we come on this family comfortably settled in a frontier log-cabin, they might have been a pattern for tidiness and thrift: but they were moving to a new country, and we describe them as their appearance was, which was far from prepossessing. Yet we have seen hundreds of families at their homes, on our frontiers, who were social, intelligent, cleanly and hospitable, and whose log-cabins would have done credit to a Jersey housewife.

On the bank of a creek that meandered through the strip of forest land, the wagon stopped, and the party made preparations to "camp out" for the night.

On the bottom land, along the creek, pea-vines and wild grass furnished rich pasturage. The horses were ungared, and "hobbled out" on this "range," by fastening a strap or piece of hickory bark to the forelegs of the animals, so they could step but a few inches at a time. The cows were milked, and with the calves and swine, left to gather their own fodder, for they would not stray from the wagon. A fire had been kindled against a fallen tree; water was heating in the coffee-pot to prepare that indispensable beverage to a frontier family; one of the girls was wetting up corn-meal for "dodgers;" the old woman was smoking a dirty pipe, and the young wife was nursing and petting her youngest child, who had been annoyed by the dust, heat and fatigue of travel. The father and one of his younger sons were erecting forks on which poles were laid and blankets spread, as a shelter for the night. While these preparations were going on, the company were startled by the sharp crack of a rifle, not a hundred yards from the encampment. Looking around to see who were missing from the company, the old man sang out—

"Where's Jim!"

"Gone a hunting," was the response of one of the girls. "I seed him take Bet (his rifle) soon as we camp'd, and start up the creek."

"I say," exclaimed the old lady, "that ar boy will run himself to death a' hunting."

"Never fear, Patsey, I shouldn't mind if Jim's got another deer."

And, sure enough, Jim came running, half out of breath, exclaiming at the top of his voice—

"Dad, I say dad, send Joe to help me. I've got the confoundest, biggest sort of a deer up the creek yonder. He's all over a chunk of fat."

"Have you marked him?"

"Yes; right through the body, and cut his throat, too."

Jim's bloody hands and clothes were proof direct. Off ran not only Joe, but old folks, young folks, children and dogs, leaving the supper to cook itself. In about twenty minutes they all returned with a fine, fat, young buck—a ball hole near the heart, and the throat cut. "Jim," as the family called him, had taken to the trade of hunting since they left the borders of White River, in Indiana: and this was the third piece of venison he had brought to camp. He was a slouching, slender-looking fellow, who had just entered his sixteenth year. His garments hung about him as though he had caught them flying, but he bid fair to be the Nimrod of the family.

"I say, old man, hurry up now, and get that skin off, or you don't have a bit of that ar' venison for supper."

"Well, now, Patsey, don't fret, day-light is hardly gone yet."

To skin and dress a deer in such a company was the work of a moment, and, in less time than it has taken to record a single sentence of this veritable history, the steaks were simmering in the skillet.

Night had spread her heavy cloak over the forest, and the stars twinkled through the openings in the foliage, before the supper was prepared. The fire blazed up and threw its fitful glare over the surrounding scenery. Each of the party had performed the necessary ablutions in the brook. The old woman was pottering about a sort of iron ladle, containing a strip of cotton and melted grease for a lamp, which, when hung to a limb, threw a flickering light on the party. A coarse cloth was spread on the grass, on which were several platters loaded with refreshments, of which the venison formed no small part. Around this sat the family groupe on the ground—all but the grandchildren—who, after the fatigue of the day, had fallen asleep, from which neither threats nor promises of "Jim's venison," could arouse them. In justice to their kind mother, we testify each had received a cup of fresh milk from the cows, and a piece of cold corn "dodger." The patriarch and his wife, Patsey—"Jake," as he was called, and his wife Peggy, Jim and Joe, Kate and Polly, did ample justice to the coffee, warm dodgers and venison steak. "Jim," in his own estimation, and that of his mother, was about the "biggest" of the group.

This family had sold their farm in Indiana, and were on their way to the "Black Hawk Purchase." Not one had ever been in this direction before. They had heard of a new country beyond the Mississippi, and the spirit of enterprise and restlessness impelled them to move. Very probably some of this family are now in Oregon, for the first families who migrated to that point in the "Far West," went out of Iowa.

HOUSEHOLD MUSIC.

One evening, taking my little boy, a child of two and a half years, in my arms, to lull him to rest, as have fond mothers since the world began, I took up a book of simple nursery rhymes, that some one had left on my table, containing the words and music on opposite pages. As I listlessly turned the leaves, and carelessly hummed the music, I heard a soft sigh from my child; but, without apparently noticing him, I sang on, when dewy tears welled out from beneath his closed eyelids; but still I sang, till, nestling closer to my bosom, the little fellow half whispered, his voice broken by sobs, "Oh, mamma, don't sing that!" Surprised at the circumstance, I sought for the cause. Examining the book, I found I had been humming the well-known air by Sir J. Stevenson, the Vesper Hymn. I knew no association connected with the air that could awaken such emotion in my boy; the words were entirely commonplace, and could not have been the cause; and to determine that question, many weeks after, under like circumstances, I again sang the same air to words totally different, but the same result followed,—first the silent tear, then a burst of mournful weeping.

Often, when I've heard the power of music denied or ridiculed, have I thought of this incident. Tell us, ye wise utilitarians! dwells there not a potent spell in an art that can work effects like these? Tell us, ye learned metaphysicians! what subtler chords vibrate in the human heart, than answer to its touch? Oh, ye mothers! sisters! prize your lovely gift, and by it weave strong bands, wreath the golden chains binding in one loving circle the dwellers at your hearth-stone.

Oh, ye parents! ye who bend daily at the altar of devotion, lose not the holy influence of this "most sweet" accompaniment: let with your morning orisons—let with your evening sacrifice ascend the voice of praise to the Highest! "for praise is comely, and it is good to sing praises unto our God!" Yea: with the royal psalmist let us say, "I will sing praises while I have being."

Who does not feel and acknowledge the power of the human voice? In whose memory—how thickly overpiled it may be, with a long life's gathered incrustations, with the thick layers of a stern life's realities—down, deep down in the heart's recesses,—dwells there not the echo of a mother's lullaby—the remembrance of sweet hymns heard in earliest years? In "visions of the night," in dreams of long-gone times and scenes, they come to us like whispers of distant lutes, like the harmony of soft chords, such as one conceives the angels loved to harp.

Because the influence of music is not measurable by a mathematical scale, is not reducible to a logarithmic expression, too many deem its power a fiction of poets and dreamers: but parents! surrounded by young, impressible minds, reject so false an estimate, and despise not the moulding power you may exert on plastic hearts, by your tuneful praises of the "Lord of Hosts." Silently and unseen, perhaps, you shall plant a seed that "after many days" shall prove a gentle chord to lure back to paths of peace and virtue, a wayward, erring child, who, though widely straying, shall, in some silent watch, hear the still whisper of a reproving conscience, floating in, as it were, upon his soul's ear, in tones of an old, familiar melody—

"Return, oh wanderer! return,
And seek an injured Father's face."

What a reward! what notes of rapture shall sound from the redeemed, over one so reclaimed!

It needs no great skill in the science of music for this office in social worship. Sing the old airs and melodies your grandsires sang. The older, simpler, perhaps the dearer. They have the charm of associations of your early days. They are linked with sweet memories of those, perhaps, who have long sung nobler songs, long struck golden lyres. There's no melody on earth so perfect as the blending of kindred voices. Gather, then, your households, and attune their hearts and voices to sing "the song of Moses and the Lamb." What medium more fitting by which to celebrate the praises of a Saviour such as ours—to extol a love so ineffable as His? Daily let our voices "beat the heavenward flame," preparing us to join the seraph-choir, if at last we be permitted to "Soar and touch the heavenly strings,

And vie with Gabriel while he sings
In notes that are divine."

Musical Review and Advocate.

POWER OF MUSIC.—A clergyman, says Mrs. Sigourney, possessing much knowledge of human nature, instructed his daughters in the theory and practice of music. They were all observed to be exceedingly amiable and happy. A friend inquired if there was any secret in his mode of education. He replied, "When anything disturbs their temper, I say to them, 'Sing,' and if I hear them speaking against any person, I call them to sing to me; and so they have sung away all causes of discontent, and every disposition to scandal." Such a use of this accomplishment might serve to fit a family for the company of angels. Young voices around the domestic altar, breathing sacred music, at the hour of morning and evening devotion, are a sweet and touching accompaniment.

A wise man stands firm in all extremities, and bears the lot of his humanity with a divine temper.

FARMERS' SONS.

[The following excellent story is from the New England Farmer.]

When a young man leaves his home in the country for a less desirable one in the city, or elsewhere, the inference, as a general thing, is either that he is "spoiled" by indulgence on the part of the parents, or by certain influences which may have fallen upon him, led to despise labor on a farm, and induced to seek a less laborious and more easy mode of life. That these are not the only causes which induce boys to leave a good home and farm, the following sketch may perhaps show.

"I am really very glad to see you, Mrs. Gove, this afternoon. Do you know that it is nearly a whole year since I've had this pleasure, and you my nearest neighbor?"

"I did not think it was so long, but—but, I have a great deal of care."

"Yes, you certainly must have. Let us take our work and sit on the piazza: it is much cooler there, and secluded from the sun."

"Can we see our meadow from there, Mrs. Norton?"

"Let me see—O, yes, very well."

"Mr. Gove, with the men and Billy, have gone down to the lower field fencing, and he wished me to have an eye on the meadow, as that fence is all down and our cattle are in the road. I see you have finished planting, Mrs. Norton. You have every thing done in season, and yet you never seem hurried, or fretted. You must take comfort."

"Why, as to that, we feel that there is nothing worth doing but is worth doing well; and feeling thus, we own but little land, a small farm compared with yours, and we find no difficulty in having our work done at the right time."

"Yes,—and I can hardly realize, Mrs. Norton, that this is the same place where I played, when a child, 'tis so changed, and so beautifully changed; these handsome trees—why in this very spot twenty years ago a sand bank 'twas, in which nothing grew but dock and tansey. I used to get the double tansey for grandmother, to color her cheese with. I am not surprised that my Billy should say, as he did to-day, that he was never so happy as when he was under the ash tree down by the spring. Really, Mrs. Norton, that is the only one near our house, and that is fast going to decay. You have vines, trees and shrubs, and beautiful flowers; why, it seems to me these things must tend to make home pleasant."

"You are right, Mrs. Gove; we feel that by cultivating a taste for the beautiful in nature, we improve the character and soften the heart."

"I know you are right, and not for my sake, but on Billy's account, I wish I could make Mr. Gove think as we do. But perhaps I do wrong to speak in this way, for Mr. Gove has more care now than any one man ought to have, and I know that he has no time for anything but barely to take care of what he has, without making any improvements. But I am in hopes when William grows up, that he will get time to set trees and make our home pleasant, for a more ardent lover of nature I surely never saw."

"Mrs. Gove, of course your husband knows his own business, but I've often thought that it would be for your interest all round, if your husband had less land to care for. I mean, if he would sell some, it certainly would lessen his care as well as your own."

"Perhaps so, but really Mr. Gove doesn't think it looks just right for a man to part with property which has been handed down from father to son, until it is now in the fourth generation. 'Tis true I have a good deal of care, and must work hard, but I have no reason to complain, though 'twould be very nice, what little time I have to sew, to sit in such a cool, delightful place as this. Perhaps I'm all wrong, and think too much of these things."

Mrs. Gove was returning from the visit to her neighbor, which they had mutually enjoyed, when a pat on the shoulder caused her to exclaim, "Are you tired, Billy?" as she gazed earnestly at that pale face, and sought to read the language of those dark and handsome eyes. "Are you tired, my dear?"

"Yes, mother, O, I am very tired; for don't you think after I had helped father as long as he had any thing for me to do, I went into that pretty grove where sis and I played the week before she died, and there, right by a little mossy bank, was a little larch tree; and, mother, I wanted very much to dig it up and bring it home, and set it out by your bed-room window. I am sure, mother, it would look beautifully there, and then I never should see it without thinking of little Alice."

"Did your father take it up for you?" said Mrs. Gove, as she strove to force back the tears that would come.

"No, mother; I took the spade and tried: I dug all around it, but I couldn't start it a bit, when I tried to pull it up, and then I asked father if he would let Mike take it up for me. You know, mother, that Mike is a good hand, for he helped take up and set out all Mr. Norton's trees."

"And what did your father say, my dear?"

"He said, 'don't be so foolish, child—we've no time to fool away,' or something of that kind. I wish I had strength to pull it up; but I don't know as father would let me set it out. Do you think it is foolish, mother?"

"My dear child, your father has a great deal of care and anxiety, and you heard him say this morning, when the man called to tell him his fence all lay flat, and everybody's cattle were in, that his work was driving him continually; so perhaps father thought 'twould be wrong to spend the time that is now so precious to us, in doing what we could get along without doing."

"Well, mother, does father take much comfort? He is always behindhand, and he never finishes all the jobs he begins. Why, don't you know last summer we had so much to do that we did not get time to hoe that piece of corn between the woods, and I heard father say myself, that it did not begin to pay for the plowing. And, mother, you know I heard it talked over at the store, how father had to pay for that strip of land he bought of Mr. Chase, twice, because he did not get time to make the deed, and Mr. Chase died before 'twas done. When I hear people say to father, 'you are the richest man in town,' or, 'you own the most land,' why, I think, well, I don't see as father is any happier than the neighbors, that haven't half as much. Why, I heard father say to-day that he was harassed to death."

The night after the above conversation, as Billy was quietly sleeping, and Mr. Gove sat with his arms folded, and his eyes resting on the wall, Mrs. Gove asked her husband, in rather a timid tone, if he had noticed how fully Mr. Norton's fruit trees had blown.

"Well, I believe I saw them, or heard some one speak of it. But I am tired."

"Yes, I think you must be; you've worked hard all day."

"I have worked like a dog, and what does it amount to?"

"Do you think," said his wife, "considering we have to work so hard and hire so much help, that it is for your interest to keep all the land?"

"Think—I don't think any thing about it. I've got it, and I must take care of it. I should look well spending what has so long been in the family. As long as property is in land it is safe; but change it into money, or any thing else, and ten to one 'tis soon gone, nobody knows where."

"Perhaps you are right; but it seems to me you could take much better care of less, make it more profitable, and at the same time relieve yourself of this care and anxiety, which I fear is wearing upon you. And then you know William is slender. I don't think he'll ever be able to work as hard as you have done."

"He never will, if he is brought up to think he is too good to work. He has notions in his head now, that I fancy will do him no good. You have been over to Norton's this afternoon. I suppose his wife advised you what was best for us to do."

"Why, Betsey, can't you see through it all? They have been and sold half of their farm, and laid out the money in trees, and I don't know what all,—sent the boys to school instead of teaching them to work, and so she wants us to do the same.—Ha! ha! misery likes company. The long and short of it is, Betsey, Mrs. Norton wanted to get rid of work. I wish they had sold the whole concern and cleared out, for I see plainly you nor William can go over there, but it bewitches you. No—you will never see me covering my land, or surrounding my house with boughten trees. If I had time I should like well enough to set out a maple or something near the house. I should like one or two for the horses to stand under, but I haven't the time, neither do I think it best to encourage any such notions in the boy. You know how it is—if you give an inch they'll take an ell." He begged hard for us to dig up a larch this afternoon, but indulgence will spoil any child. If I had done that for him, why he would only have wanted more, and if he got too many such notions, why he is headstrong, and the first we should know he would be off like others we know of. No; the only way to get along with children is to be strict; no arguing with them, and no giving way to their foolish wants."

"Do you think it was indulgence that made George White go to New York? I don't know but what it might be, his mother was dreadful careful of him."

"I should like to know what 'tis makes boys leave their father's homes and farms, and go off to the city, and barely get their board, if it isn't letting them have their will and way."

"I have no doubt that over-indulgence begets self-will, and overcomes a child's sense of duty, so that restraint is thrown off, and parental obligation disregarded; but, husband, I do believe one thing, and that is, if we wish Willey to love his home, we must make it happy; if we wish his warmest affections to cluster around this place, we must it attractive. You think the Norton boys are indulged too much, but this indulgence is nothing more than a 'desire on the parents' part, judiciously carried out, to make them useful and happy. And I believe they take the right course. No children love their home better than they do. Mrs. N. tells me that it is with the greatest reluctance that they leave home in the vacation, to visit their cousins in the city."

"Well, well, don't say any more, for I have as much I can do to get through the day's work, and I for one want to sleep in the night! Mrs. Norton is welcome to her notions, and I will have mine!"

While Mr. G. is wrapped in the "sweet sleep of the laboring man," and Mrs. G. is revolving in her own mind the many different plans which suggest themselves to a mother's ever watchful heart, for the good of her boy, let us take a peep at the character of both parents and child.

Had a stranger inquired of almost any one in N., "what sort of a man is Mr. Gove?" the answer would probably be to this effect: "Fine man, sir, upright, honest and firm; trifles don't move him." Granted—but let us see if there can be, with these good qualities, nothing wanting.

Mr. G. was stern; in his view, the "smoothing over" of an affair was never advisable. Billy, as a child, had much to contend with in the way of passion, pride, and self-will; like almost all children, occasional acts of thoughtlessness and hasty impulse led him into error and its painful consequences. Had his father been careful to "do justice to his better qualities, while at the same time he blamed and convinced him of his faults," all might have been well; but Mr. G. never met his errors in "love and conquered them by forgiveness." Unjust harshness actually confirmed him in error. Mr. G. was spoken of as a generous man, but to use the beautiful language of one departed, "There are those who are lavish in attention and presents to friends, but who never imagine that their own home circle has the first and strongest claim to kindness, whether of word or deed. Affections and thoughts lavished on comparative strangers never radiate on home; but when given to home first, they shed light and kindness far and near." Mr. G. never won the heart of his child. How was it with the mother? She possessed the rare combination of "gentleness with firmness, submissiveness with dignity." Her anxious desire was to do justice to his better feelings, and while she wished to educate his mind, she was more anxious that his heart should be won and taught.

But little change, outwardly, was visible in the Gove family when William had reached his eighteenth year. The homestead remained the same—save some marks which "Time's effacing fingers" had not failed to make. The "ash tree," by the spring, was gone, and the maple "for the horse to stand under," had never been "set out."

One fine morning in May, William asked his father if he might have the sorrel horse to go to the village adjoining. Permission was given on condition that he would return before dinner. Dinner came, and with it came William.

"What has our William been doing!" exclaimed Mr. Gove, as he gave a hasty glance at the window. "Cutting a wagon load of withes."

"I don't know, but I can't see very well without my glasses."

'Twas easy to see, however, that that hasty glance had ruffled the smooth current of his thoughts, for he at once knew that withes needed no roots. William took out the horse, wheeled the wagon into the shed, and entering the long kitchen, seated himself at the table. The mother, with her quick perception, failed not to understand why that shadow rested upon the father's brow. Hardly a word was spoken—Mr. G., upon leaving the table, took up a newspaper, a thing which he rarely had time to do; it was evident to Billy, however, that he was not reading very intently, for the paper was upside down. When William left the house, he went directly for the spade and hoe, and walking deliberately down the hillside, south of the house, commenced making holes twelve feet apart, where he had helped his father plow the day before. He had thus been engaged half an hour, when, rising to wipe the heavy drops of moisture from his forehead, he saw his father looking earnestly at him.

"What are you doing, William?"

"I am fixing places to set out trees!"

"What kind of trees?"

"Peach and pear trees, sir."

"Where did you get them?"

"I bought them at a tree auction to-day."

"You did! Well, you can't set them, here, sir."

"I can't—what's the reason?"

"There are reasons enough, though I'm under no obligations to tell children; yet I won't be particular this time. In the first place, I wish you to understand once for all, that you take one step too far when you buy trees without leave or license, and more than that, proceed deliberately to put them on my best corn land. And now you can do what you please with the trees. You have taken far too much liberty. You shall never set them on my land."

Without one word, William shouldered his spade and walked to the house. His mother, who stood at the corner-window, although she had heard no word spoken, understood the whole affair perfectly. She saw William shoulder the spade, and then her heart beat heavily, but quickly raising the corner of her apron, she wiped away the tears which were fast falling, and met her son with a smile.

"Well, mother, I've done," said he, as he sunk down on the old kitchen chair, "I've done trying to be anything here. He won't let me be anybody!"

"My child, don't speak so disrespectfully of your father. He, Billy, that sounds dreadfully; never say that again, my son."

"I can't help it, mother, I shan't stay here. You know what I told you, last week, mother, and to-day I have had something come across my feelings, harder to bear than all. When I was coming from the village, I met a man with a double wagon, and a beautiful larch tree in it. I was hoping to buy it, so I asked him where he got it. 'Squire Gove gave it to me,' he replied. O, mother, wasn't that too much? I asked him who took it up, and he said his Irishman, that he called Mike. I could have torn that tree in splinters, mother. I rode round by the grove, and sure enough 'twas gone, and the mossy seat all trampled and torn. Do you think after that I would ask him to let me set out the trees? No, mother, if father can do without me, I can do without him. I shall go away as soon as you can get my things ready. Of course, the folks will say—'What an ungrateful boy to leave his father alone;' but why can't father try to please me as well as others—as well as strangers? There are the Norton boys—if father had done one-quarter for me that their father has done for them, I should be very, very happy. O, mother, don't feel so bad—you must not blame me. I know you are a real Christian, mother, but I aint like you—you overlook, and forgive everything. I am some like father; I wish I was just like you."

William expected his mother would entreat him to stay at home, but no, not one word did she say in favor of it. She knew these were little things to cause the boy to leave the home of his youth for a home among strangers, but she knew also that the joys and griefs at home are almost all made up of little, very little things.

We will hasten over the particulars of William's leaving home, and only say that his father's parting words were, "I can do without you as long as you can without me, William." In four weeks from this leave-taking, William was a sort of waiter on board a Mississippi steamboat.

Mr. Gove hired an extra hand:—many people shook their heads meaningly, and said it was a pity, a great pity, but nothing new or strange, for an only child to be spoiled by indulgence; but then, he was a pretty, bright boy, and they supposed it came hard to punish him; but "Spare the rod and spoil the child," was Scripture.

The summer was passed, the golden grain was garnered, and the rich fruits secured, when Mr. Gove, who had grown somewhat moody of late, called Mike to the back door, and giving him some directions, took his hat, and passing out the other door, joined him.

"Let me see, you have the spade and hoe. Well, now, come down with me to the side of the hill where the early corn was planted, and do you remember where the holes were, that William made last spring?"

"And sure 'tis not me that's afther forgetting sich things, for didn't I put a flat stone by every bite of 'um; and didn't I in hoeing and harvest keep them from being shoved a bit? For do you mind, sir, I set a dale by the boy—he wouldn't hurt a baste, sir, and his heart is as big as a whale."

"Well, well, that's enough, Mike. Now, you bring all the trees you buried in the swamp, and set them out just as you did Norton's, and do you know which were the trees designed for the holes William had opened?"

"And faith I mind it well, for didn't I tie a string round 'um, and lay 'um jes so?"

"Well, set them right, and when you have done them, call me from the house."

Mr. G. took the arm-chair, and moving it to the bed-room window, seemed lost in thought. Surely, he must be sick, for he never was known to sit down of a week-day except at meal times.

Two hours passed, and Mike was passing the window, when he was thus accosted by Mr. G.: "Have you done, Mike?"

"Sure, sir, a plasant job to me, I was lazy to quat it."

"Now take your spade, and prepare a place by this window, where you see I've placed the stick, for a larger tree. Now, if you have it right, go over to Capt. Burns', and ask him if he will sell me that larch tree in the west corner of his birch lot. Tell him the price is no object, and be careful you don't break any of the small roots; be very careful, Mike."

"No fear o' that, sir."

"Stop, that is not all. When you come home, call at Smith's and tell him I have concluded to let him have the land, and tell him to come over, this afternoon, and Squire Norton will be here to fix the writings. Tell all who inquire for me that I am sick."

Before night, one-third of Mr. Gove's land was in Mr. Smith's possession, and the deeds on record. The larch seemed quite at home by the bed-room window.

And, now, what strange spell was this upon Mr. Gove.

"O, there are moments in our life
When but a thought, a word, a look has power,
To wrest the cup of happiness aside,
And stamp us wretched!"

The evening before, Mr. G. chanced to take up a school book of William's, and on a blank leaf were written, in a neat school-boy hand, these simple lines:—

" 'Tis the last blooming summer these eyes shall behold;
Long, long ere another, this heart shall be cold;
For O, its warm feelings on earth have been chilled,
And I grieve not that shortly its pulse will be stilled."

Mr. G. dropped the book, and wandered, he hardly knew whither, till he found himself in the swamp where William's trees were buried. What followed, the reader already knows.

Mrs. G. had finished her day's work, and was seating herself in the little rocking chair, when Mr. G. called to her from the bed-room.

"Betsey, will you sit in here? I want you to write a letter to William, to-night."

"To-night! Why it is after nine o'clock!"

"I know it, but I shall feel better if it is done to-night. I feel sick all over, and perhaps I am nervous."

"I will write what you wish me to, my dear husband."

"O, don't say so—but tell Billy I wish him to come home without delay; tell him for the love he bears his mother, and for the love I bear him, to come now. Say that my hand trembles so, I can't write this, but I say it from my inmost heart."

Mrs. G., with an overflowing heart, quickly performed the delightful task.

"And, now, Betsey, I will try to ask God to watch over that boy, and to soften my own proud heart."

"O! when the heart is full—when bitter thoughts
Come crowding thickly up for utterance,
And the poor common words of courtesy
Are such a very mockery—how much
The bursting heart may pour itself in prayer."

June, beautiful June, the "month of roses," found Mr. G. in that "old arm chair," by the bedroom window, but O, how changed!

"His hair was thin, and on his brow
A record of the cares of many a year,
Cares that were ended and forgotten now."

It was the last day of his earthly existence. The gentle breeze, as it swept through the light foliage of that beautiful larch, caused him to open those eyes so soon to be closed for ever—and as they met, for the last time on earth, those of his own Billy, upon whose arm his head rested, he whispered, "I die happy now," and the scene of life had closed.

THE SPIRIT MAIDEN OF RHINE-LAND.

BY MEETA.

It was almost evening; the sun was sinking upon its imperial couch of gorgeous clouds, whilst beautiful beams of crimson and gold were reflected through the trees. The calm, broad-bosomed Rhine slept along its green-embowered banks, and the dying sun-rays twinkled and flashed in its blue depths.

The summer air was soft, and sweet as a breath of roses; and a gush of dreamy melody from some idling bark upon the water, stole as a "spirit's presence" over the earth.

Paul stood at the door of his father's mansion, watching the changing colors of the beautiful landscape. His heart was overflowing with a burst of tumultuous emotions, thanksgiving and praise to the Watchful One. He turned his head over his shoulder, and glanced back into the chamber which he had but just left: there, in his accustomed place, the evening glow tinging his silvery locks, sat the blind and aged father, and at his side, upon a low stool, was seated his young cousin, the meek and fair-haired Bertha.

The maiden held her lute, and her white fingers glanced like snow-flakes over the glistening chords as she played a light wild melody. She was singing a Rhinish love-song, and her voice, so sweet and low, fell like the tones of a silver bell upon the evening air.

A soft and holy influence was enveloping Paul's senses; but he thought he saw a white figure glancing in the wood, and a spirit-voice seemed calling to him, as it said—

"Paul! Paul! where art thou?"

The voice called, and the echoes caught the wild, witching melody, and Paul knew that it was the voice of his spirit-maiden singing to him. He walked forth into the wood with a saddened heart, and seated himself upon a mossy stone.

"Etheria! Etheria! here is thy Paul," he called in answer; but the voice was silent, and he heard only the sound of the wind, as it moved in the leaves, or the dreamy tinklings of the fountain.

Paul had never seen his spirit-maiden, save in his dreams, when she came to him clothed in all her virgin beauty, and whispered to him of her love. But she floated upon every gold-tinted cloud. She smiled in the shining sunlight, and breathed words of love in the beautiful flowers. He saw her not, and yet he loved.

The sun was gone quite down and had left, as a remembrance of what had passed, and what was yet to be, a crown of glorious rose-clouds lingering in the sky. Paul wandered again sorrowfully towards the mansion. Bertha was sitting at the table, with her Bible open before her, and she read to the aged man the holy words. Never had she looked so lovely. Her soft blue eyes were filled with tears as she read, and her bright, fair hair fell like a beautiful veil over her neck and shoulders. As Paul gazed upon her beauty, a gleam of flashing silver light glanced through the apartment; but an instant, and it was gone again. It was not the moonlight—it was the smile of the spirit-maiden. And Paul thought no more of the fair Bertha, but mourned for his soul's shadow.

When the devotion was over, Bertha led the old man to his chamber, and returning again, found Paul sitting listless and gloomy.

"Paul," whispered the beautiful Rhinish maiden, as she laid her hand gently upon his arm, "thou art sorrowful, and I may not comfort thee."

Her tones were very sad and reproachful. Paul drew her towards him and kissed her fair brow.

"I am sorrowful, my beloved Bertha," he said, mournfully, "for I must leave this beautiful Rhineland—my spirit-love awaiteth me. Hearest thou not her voice calling me? See'st thou not her wavy tresses beckoning me?—My love awaiteth me, and I may not stay."

Bertha knew of his strange love for the spirit-maiden, and she bowed her face amid her ringlets, and wept.

"Weep not, my beloved one," said Paul, in a soothing voice; "weep not, I shall soon return again, and thy heart shall be made glad by the gay smiles and witching tones of my own spirit-maiden."

Bertha pushed back the drooping tresses from her weeping face, and gliding from his embrace, reached the door.

"Paul," she whispered, sadly, "when thou art far distant, forget not the maiden of Rhineland."

Alas! Paul knew not the deep and holy love which rested in that innocent heart for him.

Paul reclined upon his couch, but slept not. The moon looked down at him, and the stars twinkled and danced in the sky. A voice full of mirth and witchery came floating on the breeze, and whispering in the leaflets. Paul arose from his couch, and stealing from his chamber, gained the open air. With quickened foot-steps he reached the wood, and hastened to the fountain. And there, among the trees, stood a maiden of wondrous beauty, clad in shadowy garments, beckoning and smiling through the shower of the fountain.

Paul sprang to catch the beautiful form in his embrace; but, as he came nearer, it still receded—the mirthful tones still calling—

"Paul! Paul! where art thou?"

Sometimes she hid among the trees, and then again her soft breath fanned his cheek, and her dark tresses fell like a cloud over his face. Now she vanished in a wreath of spray, or seemed lost in her own strain of fairy music, and then she floated in the moonlight smiling, and waving her white arms. But ever sang she, and ever followed the youth.

Paul stood upon the summit of a high mountain, whither he had followed his spirit-love. His father's mansion was lost to view, and the spirit-maiden had vanished in a mist of snow—her voice was hushed. He had reached the highest peak: but he was alone—the clouds above, and the snow below. He thought he heard the vesper-bell ringing on the air, and Bertha's voice reading the evening devotion; the lulling sound of dreamy whisperings bewildered him, and he sank upon the ground insensible.

* * * * *

The years pass by in their varied attire, ever choosing a new devotee to worship at the shrines of bitter sorrow, or awakening hopes. The aged father was long since dead, and was buried upon the banks of the beautiful Rhine. The witchern drooped its branches over his grave, and the "sad bird" sang mournfully in the green leaves.

The gentle Bertha dwelt alone in the old mansion, more beautiful and more beloved than before. She often thought of her old love, Paul, but he had disappeared years ago, and was perhaps buried in a foreign land. Thus, like a fair lily, she bloomed in sequestered loveliness upon the banks of the Rhine, ever modest, gentle, and meek.

One lovely day, when the summer had returned again in fragrance and flowers, Bertha sat at her lattice netting a silken fillet to bind her fair tresses. Old memories came crowding around her heart, and tears trembled upon her golden lashes. She thought of one so dear to her heart—Paul. A tall, sun-burnt man, with a saddened, care-worn look upon his features, came slowly up the pathway which led to the door. He was changed—much changed and older, but Bertha's heart knew that it was Paul. He reached the door-way—Bertha threw down her silken net, and, gliding to the door, cried—"Paul! Paul! is it thou?"

In an instant, he folded her in his arms, and she rested weeping and smiling upon his breast.

"And the spirit-maiden, Paul?" asked the fair Bertha, as they sat, side by side, in the father's hall, as in days of yore.

"Ask me not, Bertha," he answered, in a low voice, as he pressed her hand still closer in his, "ask me not. It is enough, alas! too much to know, that I sought for the Ideal, and knew not the true value of the Real. Had I but dreamed how fond and true was the gentle heart that beat for me in mine own Rhineland, then would the spirit-maiden have been, indeed, as a shadow."

Bertha felt that she was beloved at last, and she rested her fair cheek fondly upon his bosom, whispering—

"Oh, Paul! shall we not be happy now?"

Many—ah, how many have deserted the substance, which was within their grasp, for the shadow, which, uncertain, flits hither and thither! Ideal bliss takes wings and flies away; real happiness folds its pinions amid the flowers of earth, nor seeks a better resting place. The substance places a wreath of emerald around the heart, unchanging in its hues; the shadow rests in the soul as an opal, with its many beauties. Then, seek not for a happiness greater than that of the present hour; the morn arises in golden beauty, but the night may be a clouded sky, starless and unsearchable.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 21.

ANGLO-AMERICAN LITERATURE.

[The Literary World makes a few running comments upon, and extracts from Philarete Chasles's new book on this country, just translated from the French, and published by Scribner of New York, which we transfer to our columns.]

No one can deny that the French writers who have directed their attention to this country, have honestly addressed themselves to the business of understanding our peculiarities from within. They have sought the centre and heart of our institutions, in order to determine the physiology of our institutions and customs. Among foreign journalists, M. Chasles, the distinguished Professor in the College of France, is the most rapid, brilliant, and sympathetic of all who have subjected our young literature to critical examination.

He derives his conclusions from no transient and temporary survey, but from a patient induction of as many facts as he could command. In these conclusions we cannot always concur; but we must acknowledge that in many of them he is more American than Americans, and consequently more right in his judgments than the majority of indigenous critics. It is true that he attaches more significance to casual and incidental ascendancy in some cases, and in others mistakes crudeness and extravagance—individual to the writers whom he discusses—further than the facts would warrant.

Several of M. Chasles's critical papers—which help to make up the present volume—we have heretofore reproduced in the Literary World, so that our readers are already acquainted with the method and treatment of the eminent French critic. The author's "Preliminary Notice" to the collection, announces his object, with a just reference to others of his contemporaries who have discussed American life from a different point of view:—

"This volume contains several 'studies' on North America, and the development of literature and manners there. You will find here no pretension to direct the age, nor to preach new doctrines—a merit, by the way, sufficiently rare in these times.

"The Americans of the United States, last-born of the great Anglo-Saxon race, and founders of the federal republic of the United States, have conquered, in the civilized world, a place which does not permit the observer to pass them by in silence.

"For a scientific analysis of their institutions, I refer the reader to the excellent works of M. de Tocqueville and of M. Michael Chevalier. My object is different. I propose to exhibit, in a series of faithful pictures, the details of manners, traits of character, phenomena and singularity, observed upon the spot by foreign travellers, or shown forth by Americans themselves."

At the very opening, M. Chasles disposes of the high claim of American literature, in sentences like these:—

"And as it is impossible for a man without remembrance to have imagination, so that intellectual quality cannot belong to a people born yesterday, whose whole Past dates from yesterday. The United States of America, for so many reasons remarkable and grand, are essentially modern; their genius is material and mechanic; their force lies in their good sense, their patient observation and industry. It is—as we have just said—a country without imagination, because without memories. Countries grown old in sorrow, Ireland, Scotland, for instance, lend much to the imagination. They have bought that brilliant faculty dear; not a castle whose walls are not blood-stained, whose legend does not tell of a murder; not a fortress whose echoes do not bring to you from afar the sound of violence; the atmosphere of the Gaelic hills is peopled with phantoms, every lake has its fay, every cavern its enchanter; the shadow of Bruce wanders through those sombre chapels; the name of Wallace sounds with the sigh of the wind through these ruined arches.

"The United States, by a phenomenon which we have just explained, wants that dawn and penumbra which give perspective. The very tongue is not native to the soil: it has crossed the sea, and naturalized itself on that side the ocean. To preserve the purity of their style, American writers are forced to keep their regards constantly fixed upon the mother country, where are found their types and their models. If they innovate, they fear vulgarity or emphasis. In this respect they are like those modern writers who use a dead language, and fancy that they can thus restore to us Cicero, Demosthenes, Livy; forgetting that it is the social life of a people which gives energy and life to a language, and that an idiom detached from national society and manners, is a branch detached from the tree, and deprived of its sap. Scotland, even, is proud of her dialect: she has her poet Burns, whose inspiration was at once extinguished when he became unfaithful to the patois of his province."

This—we submit—with due deference to the distinguished commentator, is altogether too summary; he forgets that, although we may want the perspective of history, it is the very province of genius to supply that perspective from itself. In the pictures of Hogarth, for example, which treat of immediate, every-day London life, does he not recollect the air of distance bestowed on a familiar street view—such as the Election Scene, with the half-seen procession passing on the other side of the wall? It is this very imagination which does the work of history: to say that imagination is not employed in American works is, therefore, merely to say that the writers of such works do not possess imagination—no more. Setting out with this destructive postulate, M. Chasles dispatches in rapid succession various classes of American authors, from the colonial period down to the present day.

His effort at finding philosophy in everything, is exemplified in the reason which he gives for Brockden Brown's superfluous horrors—"American society has nothing fantastic in it."

"He understood and could express passion. Instead of yielding to the timid scruples of his compatriots, he braved criticism and only looked for effect; effect, factitious and exaggerated. Brown's demons are false demons; his monsters result from predetermination; his efforts of imagination are the struggles of an intelligence which wishes to create but which produces chimeras. There is a ridiculous super-excitement in these productions; all is forced, violent, incoherent. Nothing spontaneous, natural, simple; but always convulsions, perpetual emphasis, and horrors crowded upon horrors.

"Whence comes this vehement exaggeration? Why this unheard of tendency to the pathetic, the immense, the romantic, fantastic, marvellous? Because American society has nothing fantastic in it; the drama and the dithyrambic are exotics in the United States. Brown is already forgotten. It is the inevitable fate of all outre literature. False colors soon fade; their own exaggeration destroys them."

Washington Irving, with a hit or two at his Anglicism, is dwelt upon approvingly:—

"The most lovable works of Irving are those in which the delicate observation of his youth is naively set forth. His satiric History of New York by Diedrich Knickerbocker, a parody on the Dutch minuteness, and the microscopic importance claimed for themselves by the very little—the Sketch Book, Bracebridge Hall, and the Tales of a Traveller—works which will remain, and which, indeed, are refined continuations of the style of Addison—constitute what one may call Irving's first manner. Criticism had accused him of feebleness; he wished to rise higher, and wrote the History of Christopher Columbus, and that of his companions—that of the Conquest of Grenada, and at last the Alhambra. In this second manner there is a little too high coloring and emphasis; but the research is conscientious and the style brilliant."

A peculiarity of Cooper is pointedly sketched in the following:—

"The author is as if in a jury-box, he tells the truth, and nothing but the truth. If two foemen fight with fierce rage upon the edge of a precipice, if there be between them issues of life and death, Cooper tells you the color of the rock; how many feet it rises above the level of the sea; whether it be of silex or granite; what plants grow there; what birds build there; its latitude. Another would be content to set forth the vicissitudes of the combat, the convulsions of suffering, the triumph, the agony. But this is not enough for Cooper. Every muscle of the combatants must be visible; he shows his subject not merely naked, but skinned.

"If such a system were to prevail, a grain of sand or a butterfly's wing would serve as a text for volumes; there is no reason why authors should ever stop in their descriptions."

In a chapter on "certain American novelists and travellers," this characterization is given of Mr. Mathews's "Puffer Hopkins," which, in its irony as an index of a phase of American civilization, reminds the writer of "Roman Gaul:"—

"This irony in the United States is still very rude; it will become refined, but at present it is singularly bitter and coarse. Readers upon this side of the Atlantic can only feel disgust for the odious scenes written by two satiric painters of manners, Messrs. Moore and Mathews, authors of Tom Stapleton and Puffer Hopkins. I read eagerly these sketches of American life by Americans. The impression is a mournful one; it is not popular, but low and aristocratic in the worst sense of that word; faded and corrupted vices, without grace or taste; a coward life which pursues titles, envies fortune, rushes upon success. These manners are destitute of purity, passion, simplicity, elegance, or greatness—'tis the lowest shopkeeper of Whitehall, transported into gilded drawing-rooms, and clumsily borrowing the upper vices without forgetting or losing the baser. It is no longer Washington; it has not become Horace Walpole. I cannot express the disdain and grief produced by these crazy and brutal manners, which belong by their impurity to the scandalous boudoirs of the old world, and smell of the bar-room while claiming to be aristocratic."

The satiric point of that much talked-of book, Puffer Hopkins, has not escaped M. Chasles. He does injustice to its general spirit, however. Had he at the time been acquainted, as we have reason to know he has since become, with Mr. Mathews's other writings, he would have formed a fairer idea of the book he has noticed. It possesses many high qualities which the author has since more maturely developed; but in its best descriptions, its pictures of feeling and fancy, it is widely separable from the transient literature with which M. Chasles confounds it. He appears to have received, at the time of writing these criticisms, a budget of the cheap pamphlet publications of the hour, a form into which the exigencies of the trade drove alike some of the best and worst productions of the time. The dingy paper and close type of the Brother Jonathan editions would hardly recommend the contents of a pamphlet to the cultivated and luxurious book-tastes of the Parisian. We trust M. Chasles may yet avail himself of some opportunity to present a fairer, because fuller, view of Mr. Mathews's different productions.

We have been struck with the zeal displayed by M. Chasles, in keeping himself "up" in the current American literature. He receives and imparts a suggestion with infinite readiness. He has his eye, for instance, upon "local archæology."—"No fraction of the United States," says he, "so small as not to have a historian; no city so small as not to become visible in octavo or quarto, with engravings." This glimpse, too, is from the life—"The European literature is curiously treated in the United States. In the scarcely cleared regions of the West, traversed by the railroad, children haunt the stations, shrieking out 'New novel by Paul de Kock, sir?' or some other such matter."

In fine, M. Chasles's volume is eminently readable—none perhaps the less for its French characteristic of eager generalizing, which refreshes the, to cis-Atlantic readers, somewhat worn topics. It is an excellent corrective in its frank, off-hand, suggestive way of the prevalent spirit of puffery, and we should add is generally well presented, with life and spirit in its English dress, by the translator, Mr. Donald McLeod.

INTERESTING VARIETIES.

SHAKESPEARE'S FOOLS.—Speaking of Shakespeare's "licensed fooling," which the poet sometimes carries to so great a length, Hazlitt finely remarks that nothing can justify this extreme relaxation but extreme tension. "Shakespeare's trifling does indeed tread upon the very borders of vacancy; his meaning often hangs by the very slenderest threads. For this he might be blamed, if it did not take away our breath to follow his eagle flights, or if he did not at other times make the cordage of our hearts crack. After our heads ache with thinking, it is fair to play the fool."

A PICTURE BUYER.—Some years ago, a gentleman sold the greatest part of his family pictures at a very small price, the size of them not suiting his rooms. In his travels round an auction room, hung with pictures for sale, a short time back, he saw the head of an old man, which pleased him so much that he gave a very large sum for it. On inquiry of the dealer, whose property it was, and as to the manner in which he came by the picture, he found out that he had, without knowing it, bought his own grandfather's portrait.

QUITE A DIFFERENCE.—The Springfield Republican mentions that a clergyman and warm advocate of the Maine Law, recently stopped at a hotel in that city, and on being shown into his room, ordered the waiter to bring up some drinking water. A tumbler of "colored beverage" was brought. Suspecting that it was not a glass of pure Adam's ale, the reverend gentleman cautiously protruded the tip of his tongue, till it came in contact with the suspected article, and instantly shouted with great indignation—"Waiter! why did you bring me this stuff?" "Did you not order it, sir?" asked the waiter. "Order it, no! I told you to bring me some drinking water."

"Oh!" responded the waiter, "I misunderstood you: I thought you told me to bring you some drink, in water!"

MADAME SONTAG.—Madame Sontag, says the Home Journal, has no need of gas-light to conceal any defects of complexion, or to heighten the charms of her person. She "bears" the broad light of day as well now as she did twenty years ago, when she was as renowned for her beauty as for her gift of song. If Time has robbed her of youthful bloom, Time repentant has given in return a charm made up half of queenly dignity, half of maternal grace. A more engaging, winning person, we have never looked upon, than the Countess Rossi.

GRATTAN'S FIRST SPEECH.—When he arose curiosity was excited, and one might heard a pin drop in that crowded house. It required, indeed, intense attention to catch the strange and long, deep-fetched whisper in which he began; and I could see the incipient smile curling on Mr. Pitt's lips, at the brevity and antithesis of his sentences, his grotesque gesticulations, peculiar and almost foreign accent, and arch articulation and countenance. As he proceeded, however, the sneers of his opponents were softened into courtesy and attention, and, at length, settled in delight and admiration. Mr. Pitt beat time to the artificial but harmonious cadence of his periods, and Mr. Canning's countenance kindled at the brightness of a fancy which in glitter fully equalled, in real warmth and power far exceeded his own. Never was triumph more complete.—Lord Holland.

WEATHER PROPHECIES.—If the dew lies plentifully on the grass after a fair day, it is a sign of another; if not, and there is no wind, rain must follow. A red evening sky portends fine weather; but if it is spread too far upwards from the horizon in the evening, and especially morning, it foretels wind, or rain, or both. When the sky in rainy weather is tinged with sea-green, the rain will increase; if with deep blue, it will be showery. When the clouds are formed like fleeces, but dense in the middle, and bright towards the edges, with the sky bright, they are signs of a frost, with hail, snow or rain. Two currents of clouds always portend rain, and in summer, thunder. If the moon looks pale and dim, expect rain; if red, wind; and if her natural color, with a clear sky, fair weather.

METHOD.—So much depends upon method in any pursuit, that without it, success might be considered as a sort of anomaly, even in the common affairs of every day life. It is said that "Brevity is the soul of Wit," and we say, "Method is the soul of Business." Without it nothing goes on well. Three of the chief things which tend to make any trade or profession easy and profitable, are method, application, and despatch; and without the first, the second will be as unprofitable as the third will be impossible. Be your calling what it may, study to acquire method in it. Despatch one thing before another, and be not continually running from one thing to another, which is a sort of wild-goose-chase work, out of which little and seldom satisfaction comes. Ponder well the kind of employment in which your mind is engaged: endeavor to impress yourself well with its usefulness so as to insure some valuable end in life, and this will be a powerful stimulus to seek method in carrying it out.

A FRENCHMAN FAST.—A Frenchman upon the road on "Fast Day," told a boy to hold his horse swift."

"Fast, you mean, don't you, sir?" interrogated the lad.

"Vel, fast, den; I no understand dis."

"There goes a fast horse!" exclaimed a bystander, as a lively trotting nag streaked by.

"How is zat?" nervously inquired the astonished Frenchman; "zare is von horse fast, and he goes like zunder all ze time; zare is my horse—he is fast, too, and he no move."

"This is Fast Day in reality, by the appearance of the road," said another.

"Oh, I zee den," said monsieur, "vy dis is fast day; everything is fast—ze horse zat goes is fast, ze horse dat is tied is fast, and ze folks zat eat nothing and eat it slow is fast. Vot a countrie!"

WEAKNESS OF LITERARY MEN.—Buffon was very fond of dress. He assumed the air of the grand seigneur; sported jewels and finery; wore rich lace and velvets; and was curled and scented to excess—wearing his hair en papillote while at his studies. Pope, too, was a little dandy, in a bag-wig and sword; and his crooked figure, enveloped in fashionable garments, gave him the look of an over-dressed monkey. Voltaire, also, was fond of magnificent attire, and usually dressed in an absurd manner. Diderot once travelled from St. Petersburg to Paris in his morning gown and night-cap; and in this guise promenaded the streets and public places of the towns on his route. He was often taken for a madman. While composing his works, he used to walk about at a rapid pace, making huge strides, and sometimes throwing his wig in the air when he had struck out a happy idea. One day a friend found him in tears. "Good heavens!" he exclaimed, "what is the matter?" "I am weeping," answered Diderot, at a story that I have just composed!"

THE HABITS OF AMERICANS.—Capt. Mackinnon says:—No stranger landing in New York can fail to be painfully struck by the pale, wan, slight, and delicate appearance of both men and women. After residing some time in the country, and acquiring a knowledge of their habits, instead of being surprised that so many of them die prematurely, one is astonished that they manage to live as long as they do, or look so well.

"In a lecture recently delivered in New York by Dr. Fitch, it is mentioned, as a striking fact, that in the States only four out of every hundred individuals live to the age of sixty. In England, however, he asserts that seven out of every hundred attain that age. Still, though the climate in the latter country is warmer, and more temperate, it is much damper, and has all those at-mospherical and other conditions which contribute to produce an immense amount of consumption. The people are so confined and closely packed—millions live so poorly and in such miserable habitations—that a far greater tendency to the above disease exists in England than in America. Why then should a greater mortality prevail in the United States? The reason is to be found in the different habits of the people. In England, the experience of the old is reverently regarded, and taken as a guide; while in America, experience is but little estimated, and the young consider themselves more knowing than their fathers. The result is, they often find a fool for a teacher, and die prematurely for their presumption."

In the early settlement of that territory, her present aged, queenly matrons were without many of those things now esteemed by their sex so indispensable, and amongst them the looking-glass, which had never made its appearance across the mountains. In its stead, the eye and hand of a companion, or the smooth, reflective surface of the glassy brook, were made to subserve the purpose of the toilette; and a wooden trough, or hollow stump, filled with water, not unfrequently daggerreotyped the flowing curls and tawowed heads of the backwood beauties.

But it happened, on a time, that there came along the Indian trails a Yankee pedlar, who, amongst his precious store of goods, which he was exchanging for furs and skins, had a small looking-glass, such as fits the top of an old-fashioned, round shaving-box. As soon as seen by them, all bid for the rare and desirable thing; but, with native shrewdness, under the pretence that he could not spare it—well knowing it would prejudice his trading, did he prefer a buyer then—he refused all offers, intending, in the end, to accept the highest.

At last, however, ready to pack and leave, he called upon the best bidder, and received his offer. The purchaser was a young beau, who at once presented it to a family of beautiful sisters, the rival belles of the country. It was near the time of a large ball, to which they were invited, and where they proudly appeared with pieces of the looking-glass framed in lead, suspended by yellow bark strings from their beautiful brown necks. They were at once the observed of all—the main attraction of the evening—much to the slight of others equally handsome and "quite as respectable," who were, after that night, with bitterness and wounded pride heard to reproach their late attending beaux with—"Yes, oh yes, you couldn't see us this evening; we're too common. You chose first to dance up to the girls with the looking-glasses." "And," said the lady narrator, "that night were first sowed seeds of envy and hatred that show themselves to this day between many of the leading families of old Kentucky—and all because of the looking-glasses."

ENTERING HEAVEN.

BY PHEBE CAREY.

Softly part away the tresses
From her forehead of pale clay,
And across her quiet bosom
Let her pale hands lightly lay;
Never idle in her lifetime
Were they folded thus away.

She hath lived a life of labor,
She is done with toil and care,
She hath lived a life of sorrow,
She has nothing more to bear,
And the lips that never murmured
Never more shall move in prayer.

You who watched with me beside her,
As her last of nights went by,
Know how calmly she assured us
That her hour was drawing nigh;
How she told us, sweetly smiling,
She was glad that she could die.

Many times from off the pillow
Lifting up her face to hear,
She had seemed to watch and listen,
Half in hope and half in fear,
Often asking those about her
If the day were drawing near.

Till, at last, as one weary,
To herself she murmured low,
"Could I see him, could I bless him
Only once before I go
If he knew that I was dying
He would come to me, I know."

Drawing then my head down gently,
Till it lay beside her own,
Said she, "Tell him in his anguish,
When he finds that I am gone,
That the bitterness of dying,
Was to leave him here alone.

"Leave me now, my dear ones, leave me,
You are wearied all, I know;
You have been so kind and watchful,
You can do no more below,
And if none I love are near me,
'Twill be easier to go.

"Let your warm hands chill not, slipping
From my fingers' icy tips,
Be there not the touch of kisses,
On my uncaressing lips,
Let no kindness see the darkening
Of my eye's last, long eclipse.

"Never think of me as lying
By the dismal mould o'erspread,
But about the soft, white pillow
Folded underneath my head;
And of summer flowers weaving
A rich broidery o'er my bed.

"Think of the immortal spirit
Living up above the sky,
And of how my face, there wearing
Light of immortality,
Looking earthward, is o'erlaving
The white bastions of the sky."

Still then, with one last effort,
All her weakness and her woe,
She seemed wrapped in pleasant visions
But to wait her time to go;

For she never, after midnight,
Spoke of anything below;

But kept murmuring very softly,
Of cool streams and pleasant bowers,
Of a path going up brightly,
Where the fields were white with flowers;
And at daybreak she had entered
On a better life than ours.

ANECDOTE OF A RING.

Hannibal, it is said, in terror of falling into the hands of his enemies, always carried poison in a ring, and by means of it, after his defeat and flight into Bithynia, disappointed the hopes of the Romans by destroying himself.

That such might have been the case, is clearly proved by the capabilities of the Russian lady's ring (mentioned in Thiebault's "Original Anecdotes of Frederic II."), which concealed a small syringe, and which she very offensively made use of as follows:—"While the French minister, M. de Guines, was astonishing the Court of Berlin with the grandeur he conferred on his legation (a circumstance extremely mortifying to men of the same rank, unable to keep pace with his profusion), a Russian ambassador, on his way to Petersburg with his newly-married wife, arrived at Berlin. The lot of presenting him at Court, &c., fell to the Prince Dolgorouki, who gave a splendid dinner to all the ambassadors, at which M. de Guines was placed by the side of the lady, who was aware of the existing rivalry, and anxious, it would seem, as there was no competing with him, to render him ridiculous. The ring alluded to was of great beauty, and curious workmanship—circumstances to which she invited the French nobleman's attention during dinner; and while he was stooping down to examine it, she pressed a small spring, which was turned to the inside of her hand, and spouted the small quantity of water the syringe contained, into his eyes. The latter laughed, rallied her with great good-nature, wiped his face, and thought no more of it; but the lady again filled the syringe without his perceiving her, and (while pretending to wish to speak across him to some one near them) discharged its contents again in his face. The minister, without appearing the least angry or out of countenance, in a tone such as we use when we give a piece of friendly advice, observed, "These kind of jokes, Madam, on the first experiment may be laughed at; on the second, we may be inclined to consider them as the thoughtless act of youthful gaiety, particularly in a lady; but, Madam, the third time could be deemed nothing less than an affront, and you would at that very instant receive in exchange this goblet of water that stands before me: I have, Madam, the honor to give you proper notice." But the lady, imagining he would not dare to execute his threat, filled her ring again, and holding up the glittering engine, emptied it as before in the face of the ambassador, who instantly seized his goblet of water, and threw it over her, calmly observing, "I had given you notice, Madam." The Russian husband took his share of the adventure by declaring that M. de Guines had done exactly what was right, and that he thanked him for it; and while the lady left the table to change her dress, her friends prevailed on the remainder of the company to keep the incident to themselves. It was M. Dinot de Jopecourt (says the writer) who communicated the circumstance to me as a great secret, on the evening of the day on which it happened."

In reading this anecdote, one scarcely knows which to be most surprised at, the childishness or the rudeness of the transaction. One thing, however, it proves, that poison could as readily be concealed in a ring as water, and especially the subtle poisons of antiquity and the East; the use to which Hannibal put his, therefore, becomes the less extraordinary, particularly when we remember his antipathy to the Romans, and his constant fear of falling into their hands. Of late years the most curious use to which rings have been applied is in the cure of rheumatic disorders; and many persons continue to wear them of gold or silver galvanized, and affirm their conviction of being benefitted thereby.

HOW TO BE HAPPY.

We copy, from the Boston Olive Branch, one of Mrs. Denison's beautiful lessons in life. She says:—

A boon of inestimable worth is a calm, thankful heart—a treasure that few, very few, possess. We once met an old man, whose face was a mixture of smiles and sunshine. Wherever he went, he succeeded in making everybody about him as pleasant as himself.

Said we, one day,—for he was one of that delightful class whom everybody feels privileged to be related to,—“Uncle, uncle, how is it that you contrive to be so happy? Why is your face so cheerful, when so many thousands are craped over with a most uncomfortable gloominess?”

“My dear, young friend,” he answered, with his placid smile, “I am even as others, afflicted with infirmities, ‘I have had my share of sorrow—some would say more—but I have found out the secret of being happy, and it is this:

“Until you do that, you can lay but little claim to a cheerful spirit. ‘Forget what manner of man you are,’ and think more with, rejoice more for your neighbors. If I am poor, let me look upon my richer friend, and in estimating his blessings, forget my privations.

“If my neighbor is building a house, let me watch with him its progress, and think, ‘Well, what a comfortable place it will be, to be sure: how much he may enjoy it with his family.’ Thus I have a double pleasure—that of delight in noting the structure as it expands into beauty, and making my neighbor’s weal mine. If he has planted a fine garden, I feast my eyes on the flowers, smell their fragrance: could I do more if it was my own?”

“Another has a family of fine children; they bless him and are blessed by him; mine are all gone before me; I have none that bear my name: shall I, therefore, envy my neighbor his lovely children? No; let me enjoy their innocent smiles with him; let me forget myself—my tears when they were put away in darkness; or if I weep, may it be for joy that God took them untainted to dwell with His holy angels forever.

“Believe an old man when he says there is great pleasure in living for others. The heart of the selfish man is like a city full of crooked lanes. If a generous thought from some glorious temple strays in there, wo to it—it is lost. It wanders about and wanders about, until enveloped in darkness; as the mist of selfishness gathers around, it lies down upon some cold thought to die, and is shrouded in oblivion.

“So, if you would be happy, shun selfishness; do a kindly deed for this one, speak a kindly word for another. He who is constantly giving pleasure, is constantly receiving it. The little river gives to the great ocean, and the more it gives, the faster it runs. Stop its flowing, and the hot sun would dry it up, till it would be but filthy mud, sending forth bad odors, and corrupting the fresh air of Heaven. Keep your heart constantly travelling on errands of mercy—it has feet that never tire, hands that cannot be overburdened, eyes that never sleep; freight its hands with blessings, direct its eyes—no matter how narrow your sphere—to the nearest object of suffering, and relieve it.

“I say, my dear young friend, take the word of an old man for it, who has tried every known panacea, and found all to fail, except this golden rule,

“Forget self, and keep the heart busy for others.”

A DOG STORY.

A gentleman, residing in Chelsea, says the Boston Herald, owns an English terrier, that has a remarkably intelligent face, but is otherwise undistinguishable from the “common herd” of dogs. The gentleman visited Somerville a short time since, and the dog accompanied him. There the dog made the acquaintance of another dog, and was so fascinated with the sociability of his new companion that he missed the cars, and his master came away without him. But the dog was at the station early the next morning, and came home in the first train of cars. Since that time the gentleman noticed that his dog was absent about once a week during the entire day, and has discovered the fact, that on these occasions, he goes to the Lowell depot, takes his place in a passenger car, jumps out at Somerville, spending the day with his canine friend, and returns at night. The same dog will, if his master leaves home without him, run down to the coach office, jump into the omnibus, and come to the city in search of him; and if he does not succeed in finding him, returns by the same conveyance. He appears to prefer the omnibus to the ferry-boat, and his fidelity ensures him a “free-pass.”

It is of no consequence where these sentences were found, they are worth treasuring up. A preacher once said—“If you know anything that will make a brother’s heart glad, run quick and tell it; but if it is something that will only cause a sigh, bottle it up, bottle it up.” “We never get good bread for ourselves till we begin to ask for our brethren.”

EXERCISE FOR BOYS.

We love to see boys happy. We well remember our school-days—how the joyful scenes of those golden hours rise before us as we write. After a long and labored session of school, what is finer for boys than a good frolic on the green grass? See them!—they hop and run, and toss their hats and balls;—every bone and cord and muscle of their young and active frames is brought into full and vigorous play. Their minds are unburdened as well as their bodies. Let boys have exercise. They must have it, and a good deal too; and they must have the right kind, or they will become sickly and dwarfish, their minds feeble, and their feelings peevish and fretful. The open air, and the more free and pure the better, is important to good exercise to any one, but especially to boys. Otherwise they will be pale and weak, as a plant doomed to the shade.

They must have exercise which makes them forget themselves, and all their troubles and tasks, and throws the mind and heart into a glow of life and joy. It does them good to be excited. Our natures were made to be excited. This excitement, however, must be innocent, and kept in proper bounds. The notion which some parents and teachers have, that boys must be kept as prim as soldiers, and that every motion and step must describe certain angles, is as false to nature as it is destructive to their health and happiness. Let your boys, mothers and teachers, have enough of well-cooked, nutritious (not rich) food at regular and suitable intervals, good clear water in abundance, well applied to all parts of their bodies; air, free and pure as nature makes it; studies, to the full extent of their capacities, judiciously distributed; exercise, that will stir the whole being, and keep in full play every life current; and then let them have sleep, early, and enough of it, in well ventilated rooms, and they can hardly fail to be happy, and grow up well-proportioned and strong “to the full stature of MEN.”—Mothers' Journal and Family Visitant.

SILK.

Silk is an agreeable and healthy material. Used in dress, it retains the electricity of our bodies; in the drapery of our rooms and furniture-covers, it reflects the sunbeams, giving them a quicker brilliancy, and it heightens colors with a charming light. It possesses an element of cheerfulness, of which the dull surfaces of wool and linen are destitute. It also promotes cleanliness; will not readily imbibe dirt; and does not harbor vermin so kindly as wool does. Its continually growing use by man, accordingly, is beneficial in many ways. Grace and beauty, even, owe something to silk. You cannot stiffen it, like thick woollen or linen, without destroying all its gloss and value. The more silk ribbons, therefore—the more silk kerchiefs and robes are used, instead of linen and wool—the more graceful becomes the outward aspect of mankind. A number of strange grotesque fashions, originating in the use of linen, would never have been invented during the more general employment of silk. The fluttering ribbon, the rustling and flowing skirts of silk, the silk kerchief loosely knotted round the neck, have materially contributed to make our costume more natural and pleasing to the eye. It is therefore satisfactory to see this gay material becoming every day the property of a wider circle of consumers.—Herr Kohl.

THE WAY TO HONOR AND HAPPINESS.

BY MRS. F. FARMER.

Would'st thou rise to honored greatness?
Truth and labor point the way.
Write thy motto—Perseverance;
Hope will ever be thy stay.
Firm resolve and noble action
Level mountains to a plain:
Should thy earliest effort fail thee,
Ne'er despair, but “try again.”

When misfortune overtakes thee,
Bow to her submissively,—
Lower to the earth she'll crush thee,—
Spurn her—she will bow to thee.
Waste no time in vain repining
O'er thy fate, however hard;
If it be thy lot to labor,
Labor brings a sure reward.

When above thy task thou'rt bending,
Blush not for thy humble birth;
Upright principles maintaining,
Thine is more than conqueror's worth.
Be it in the field or forum,
In the workshop or the mill,
Care not—either great or lowly,
It will bring thee honor still.

Should contempt, with jewelled finger,
Point at thine, with labor stained,
Stand erect, her false pride scorning,
In thy honest pride sustained.
Birth is but the empty casket,
Worth the brilliant gem it bore;
Wealth descended may bring honor,
Self-earned competence brings more.

When we view the clouds of even,
Like proud banners all unroll'd,
God's armorial upon them,
Wrought in purple edged with gold;
And each planetary system,
Fixed or moved by Heaven's laws,
We our admiration give them—
Reverence searcheth out the cause.

Greatness is alone dependent
On its self-sustaining powers,
Comes to us, from none descendant,
None can e'er inherit ours.
Man, on ancestors reliant
For his wealth or noble name,
Like the bird in borrowed plumage,
Has at best a doubtful fame.

Yet no more of earthly treasure
Seek than modest wants demand;
When the mind on gold is centered,
Then it ceases to expand.
And a surplus weight, tho' gilded,
Clogs the wing that fain would soar—
Earn a noble independence;
Be content nor wish for more.

FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

THE DISOBEDIENT BOY.

BY ANNIE PARKER.

Little William played truant from school one day; "Now," said he to himself, "I'll have plenty of play,

Mama will not know it, papa will not hear,
So I'll do what I choose without any fear.

"I've enough of those tiresome books, I am sure, I'll leave them, and go where the river runs pure, I'll launch the new boat Robert gave me to-day— Oh! 'twill be such fun by the river to play.

"Mama said, it is true, that I must not go there, But I don't see the harm, if I only take care, Besides, she won't know it, so why should I stay? There is nothing to hinder my frolic to-day."

Little William forgot that our Father above,
Who for all little children feels tenderest love,
Always looks with displeasure upon them, if they
Their father's or mother's commands disobey.

So he went to the river to play with his boat,
And laughing and shouting he set it afloat;
He watched it awhile, and feared 'twould be lost,
So swiftly away by the current 'twas tossed.

"I'll get it," he cried—"I'm sure I can't lose
My nice little boat—I will take off my shoes,
And wade in the water—there's nobody near,
And the water's not deep—I have nothing to fear."

But the water was deep, and the current was strong,
William struggled awhile, he could not struggle long:

The blue waves closed o'er him—poor William thought then
He would ne'er disobey his dear mother again.

A kind man at work, in a meadow close by,
Ran down to the river—he heard William cry;
He plunged in the water, and quick as a thought,
In his arms to the shore little William he brought.

Oh, many a long summer's day passed, I ween,
Before William again in the school-room was seen,
But the lesson he learned from his folly, was not Through all his long life for a moment forgot.

LITTLE MARY'S TEMPTATION.

BY MRS. M. A. DENISON.

"Shall I? shall I?" whispered little Mary to herself, standing on tiptoe with her chubby hands folded behind her.

On the polished table that her blue eyes just peeped over, laid a bright round sixpence, a new sixpence that Mary longed to see transferred to her little, red silk bag. Her mother had left the coin there, and forgotten it; forgotten it, Mary knew, because she heard her say that there was not a bit of small change in the house.

Long and eagerly Mary contemplated the treasure. What a variety of nice things took shape and floated over that table, crowding round the few sixpence, and giving it a sort of fairy value: surely, it would buy such an endless variety of pretty toys, and if she could get two sugar birds for one penny, what a countless lot could she buy with six whole pence.

She would have sugar-plums, and sticks of twisted candy: she would have peppermint hearts, and a little new doll—no, she wouldn't buy a doll on second thought, for she had two already. She would keep some of her money to carry to school, or, perhaps, all of it, and show it to her playmates, who seldom had so much.

"Shall I? shall I?" Oh! how that wicked tempter urged the fair-haired little girl! What golden visions he placed in array before her! How he kept whispering, "mama will never know it, never, never, never; for she has forgotten all about it;" and how stealthily, at last, that wicked tempter, that dwelt in Mary's dear little heart, caught her white hand, and slowly carried it till the tips of her fingers touched the very rim of the shining sixpence.

But, thank God, there is also an angel in every human being, as long as he strives to keep pure and good, whose delight it is to overthrow this wicked tempter, that assails not only little Mary, but men and women.

She came slowly up, and murmured, in a quite still voice that would not have frightened a mouse, "Oh! little Mary, little Mary, don't you know that is stealing? don't you know it's as wicked to take that bit of money, as for the great thief to rob your father's money-drawer, or steal your mother's gold ring?"

"But father and mother would find it out then; they would know that somebody had taken their treasures—this little sixpence I'm sure nobody remembers, and I want it badly;" almost insensibly the fingers had closed over the money.

"But little Mary," said the good angel in a solemn voice that quite awed the child, "there's a great God, whose eye can see away into your heart: and he knows the thoughts you're thinking: He has found out the dark corners where these wicked thoughts hide, not daring to come into the light. Oh! little Mary, remember how often your darling mother has talked to you about that sin; think that though she might not know it, God and you would, and all the time you would keep feeling, 'I'm a thief, I'm a thief; I stole sixpence, and I shall never be happy again.' No, little Mary, though you are ever so sorry, you can never be happy again."

"Shall I? shall I?" The wicked tempter had spoken for the last time; little Mary took the sixpence, with a heightened color, and heavily beating heart, but she ran as fast as she could run, never stopping to take breath till she found her mother, and eagerly holding out the money, she cried, "it was on the table in the chamber, dear mother."

Her mother smiled, took the sixpence, and kissing Mary's forehead, she said, "What a dear, little daughter I have got! some little daughters would have kept the money, and never have told of it: how can I be thankful enough to God who has given me such an honest little girl!"

Mary held down her head: the tears were gathering thickly in her eyes, but she looked up bravely, and said, almost sobbing, "oh, mama, I don't know as I am honest; am I honest if I wanted to take it ever so much, and almost did take it?"

"Bless you, my child," said the happy mother, catching her treasure in her arms; "you have safely passed the ordeal, you have been tried and not found wanting; yes, dear, you are still my honest daughter, and I have no fear, that after to-day, you will ever take anything that does not belong to you, thank God." And, in the excess of her joy, the good mother could not keep from weeping.

"But what, then, are you crying for?" said little Mary, wiping away the tears with her pretty fingers.

"For pleasure that my Mary has resisted evil; for pleasure that she did not wickedly take the sixpence when she knew her mother would never find it out. And, now, my darling, you shall have the money for your own; you shall keep it, and I will add to it till you have enough to buy poor Judy's little girl a nice warm frock for the coming winter; and whenever you see that frock on the little girl, you must pray to God that He will always lead you out of temptation, and never, never allow you even to wish for that which is not your own."

Mary's eyes sparkled; she had for a long time wanted to give something to the washerwoman's pretty little girl, and now she was as happy as happy could be. She went singing and dancing about the house; she felt by her father's warm kiss, and "God bless you," that he knew she had done right.

Do you think, dear little reader, if Mary had taken the sixpence, and bought all those nice things, she would have had that pure enjoyment that comes from doing right? On the contrary, it might have led her at last to be a wicked, sinful woman, whom nobody would ever have loved.

Do, then, as Mary did; don't take that bright cent; put down that coveted plaything; think how dreadful it would be to be branded a THIEF, if only by your own conscience, and then think, above all, that God knows it. Always remember little Mary and her temptation.—Olive Branch.

THE YOUNG LAUNDRESSES.

BY MRS. ALICE B. NEAL.

PART I.

"We should like so much to help ourselves, dear aunt, Nora has so much to do."

"And it's such a nice shady place," urged Amanda.

"But what would your mother say, my dears?" returned the quiet Mrs. Spencer. "Besides, you will never accomplish it."

"Let us try, do please," said both the girls, and at last their aunt gave a reluctant consent.

Away they flew to the little room given up to them during their visit to the Parsonage, and the tumbling of drawers and trunks that ensued, would have alarmed their mother; and certainly gave a loud note of preparation.

"Here are two handkerchiefs, one night dress, three pairs of stockings, and two skirts of mine, soiled," said Amanda, triumphantly.

"And I have this great pile of under-clothes, and my blue cambric frock," returned her sister. "It will be nice to have it all fresh for the little party, Laura Elliott is to give. I think Laura is so nice—don't you?"

"And her brother John is a perfect gentleman," added Amanda. "I think this green apron had better go in, dear, and then we shall have about the same. I wonder if Nora will let us iron our things, this afternoon. How surprised mother will be when she hears what we have done."

"What shall you wear to work in?" inquired Ellen, looking down at the neat chintz dress which she wore.

"Oh, we shall take off our dresses, of course; no one will see us there, and I will put on my white sacque, and be careful not to splash it."

"My dears," called Mrs. Spencer, as they passed through the sitting room.

It was certainly provoking to be stopped just at that moment, but they came back with their sun-bonnets in their hands, and the soiled clothes hanging over their arms, like miniature laundresses.

"Now, I wish you to understand," said their aunt, "that I do not approve of this matter at all. But as I see your hearts are bent on it, I allow it. You are to have no help from Nora, for she is baking this morning, and I expect some gentlemen to dine with your uncle, so you must be through in good season. Mr. Poland, your favorite, Ellen, is among them."

"Yes, ma'am," both of the girls answered, meekly, and hurried away as fast as they could, bent on proving to Mrs. Spencer that they were not helpless, and had no need whatever of Nora's assistance.

This, then, was the grand scheme they had formed, and now proceeded to put in practice. Amanda had quite an idea of doing impossible things. Her nature was quick and sprightly; she was busy from morning till night, but rarely finished half she undertook. She wanted at one time to be a philanthropist. It was when her mother was reading the Life of Mrs. Fry; but she never finished the coarse underclothes her mother was persuaded to take in her name from the Dorcas society. At another time, she undertook to teach Ann, their servant, to read. But Ann proved stupid; and it is to be doubted whether they ever got beyond "Ba-ker," in the spelling book.

Her activity had displayed itself several times before, during the vacation they were spending at Brook Parsonage. Once she had offered to put the china closet in complete order; but by the time every thing was out of place, she deserted her part for luncheon, and idled so all the afternoon, that Mrs. Spencer was obliged to leave visitors and finish the work herself. Then her uncle's book-cases met with a similar disarrangement, all through the helpful zeal of his little niece.

Now her genius had developed itself in proposing to her sister, that they should wash their own clothes this week, and save Nora so much trouble on Monday morning. It is true city-bred young ladies of nine and eleven have seldom any great practice in this useful art; but Miss Amanda had the theory from cross-questioning Nora, at the wash tub, and she felt fully competent to instruct her younger sister in the various mysteries of rubbing, rinsing, etc.

The Parsonage was in a very small and secluded village, and took its name from the stream that run at the foot of the garden,—a large brook, or creek, as it was called, a little lower down, where it spread into a broad bay, and emptied finally in the Hudson river.

At Brook Parsonage, however, it was but a narrow, murmuring stream, winding among pleasant trees, and gurgling over large stones that seemed as bridges, by stepping from one to another. The vegetable garden of the Parsonage overhung it; but there was a fence and a high bank to scramble down. A rude shed had been constructed, scarcely larger than a closet, to hold the washing utensils used by Nora, who made a fire-place for the occasion, of some stones piled together, and swung her kettle on a crooked tree that made the most charming gipsy arrangement you can conceive of.

It was this that had captivated Miss Amanda's fancy. I don't believe she would have given one thought to such a disagreeable task, had it been conducted under the kitchen rafters. But to make a gipsy fire, and sit under the tree while the clothes were simmering in the kettle, and to rinse them in the running brook! And then they should relieve Nora of so much trouble, and that would be right, because their mother had said the only reason she hesitated to accept their aunt's invitation, was lest they should give her too much to do in looking after them while she was so delicate.

"And now," said Laura, as they surveyed their ground, "we must have the tubs and the kettle, and make our fire. Here are some pieces of wood that were left last Monday; but what shall we do for some coals? Nora won't give us any, that's certain. She'd say we would set the house on fire, and run to Aunt Spencer with one of her stories. Oh! I see, there's Sarah Brown at the door, and you go over the brook and ask for the coals, and I will get the things out while you are gone."

"But," remonstrated Ellen, "the brook is so high! I shouldn't dare to cross it without anything in my hands, and red-hot coals, Amanda. What if I should spill them?"

"Why they couldn't set fire to anything if they fell in the brook, could they? Come now, don't be unkind, and we haven't any time to lose; its ten o'clock now."

So Ellen, persuaded, but not convinced of the feasibility of the project, departed for Sarah Brown's in fear and trembling, while her sister proceeded to inspect Nora's treasures of tubs and buckets.

PART II.

As Ellen had on a pair of new bronze boots, she thought it advisable to take off her shoes and stockings and wade over the brook, though she did not decide on this until she had once or twice dipped her foot in the stream. She reached the other side without any accident, and found Sarah Brown, a rough, coarse girl of thirteen, "sweeping down" the kitchen, preparatory to getting dinner over. She was the cook, chambermaid and waiter of her father's household, and already quite a woman in size and strength.

The little Spencers had a brook-side acquaintance with her, which their aunt did not exactly approve. However, it was an emergency, and Ellen walked boldly into the kitchen.

"La, luy," said Miss Sarah, leaning on her hemlock broom, and surveying her young visitor from head to foot, "you don't say you waded through the brook, now. How's Miss Spencer this morning. Guess your goin' to have company, ain't you? I see Nory a mixin' some cup-cake when I went round to borrrer some turn pikes. Set down, won't ye?"

"Thank you," answered Ellen, in a voice making a strong contrast to Miss Brown's nasal tones. But she declined the chair, and stated the object of her visit as briefly as possible. Her young hostess was evidently amused at the proceedings across the brook, and asked Ellen "where they'd learnt the business?" As for the coals, she could have a basket full, but what had she brought to take them in? There was but one shovel in the house, and as Sarah was baking, too, it was wanted immediately to clear the oven. At length, the expedient of a broad chip of green wood suggested itself, and away she hurried to the wood-block to select one. The bark side downwards, it was speedily heaped with live coals, and Ellen, shuddering inwardly with fear, grasped it with all apparent courage.

"Are you sure it won't get on fire?" she asked of Sarah, who said, "No, indeed, not afore it got dry," and escorted her city-bred visitor to the margin of the brook.

It was unusually swollen, this Friday morning, and the stepping-stones were quite wet with the tiny cascades that broke over them. Ellen took two or three steps quite boldly, but she could not keep her eyes on the stones and the coals at the same time: and just in the middle of the stream, she saw the wood already smoking. The great heat scorched her unprotected hand—the brook gurgled and foamed at her feet—her head grew dizzy, and the stone she had just stepped on rolled slightly in its sandy bed. She tried to preserve her balance and succeeded; but down came the coals into the water, one resting for a moment on her bare foot, causing her to scream with pain and terror. Then, after all this, her foot still smarting, her head yet dizzy—to find Amanda coolly preparing to light the fire with some matches she had discovered with the kettles—it was certainly too hard; the more so, that her sister could not be made to see how she had suffered from nervous fear, besides the actual hurt.

Ellen's enthusiasm had received an effectual damper, but Amanda's was as daring as ever. She toiled and toiled at the fire, that would blow out with every fresh puff of wind; and, finally, when a struggling, smoky flame appeared, summoned Ellen to assist her in handing out the tubs and buckets. The kettle was hardest to manage, but it was finally drawn down to the brook and filled—but, alas! then, they were unable to move it a single inch! So the water was all thrown out, and the kettle, after much tugging and straining, hung on the crooked branch, to be filled more slowly with the huge tin dipper. The tubs were distributed—a large and small one to each, for they had concluded they should "splash" each other if they worked in the same. By this time, their faces were red and heated, their white skirts bore many a long, dingy stain, and their cross barred muslin sacques were certainly not in order to wear to church on Sunday.

It was rather tiresome, sitting in the hot sun and waiting for the water to get warm enough to commence operations. Ellen's foot was now quite lame, and was marked by a deep red stripe where the coal had fallen. She began to think her sister unkind because she took no notice of it, and was not inclined to fall into raptures about how aunt would be surprised and convinced when they showed her the clothes nicely ironed, that night, and what their mother would say to their being so industrious. Amanda's position was anything but lady-like, as she sat embracing her knees with both arms. You would have thought she had assumed Nora's manners with Nora's work.

By and bye she grew very impatient; and though the fire burned so slowly that the water was scarcely lukewarm, she dipped out enough to commence with, and putting a large handful of soap on her green apron, she began to rub it vigorously, talking the while to Ellen, who proceeded more cautiously.

"Seems to me, Elly, they put clothes in soak. Yes, I'm sure they do. So I'll put everything in at once. There; I've given them a good stir. I wish I had a rubbing-board. Nora always carries hers up to the house. I never shall get along without a rubbing-board, shall you, Ellen? Oh, dear! how hot the sun is! I wish I could move this great heavy bench into the shade. I believe my neck is all blistered. Why don't you rub, Ellen? this is the way;" and so she rattled on to Ellen's mute nods, or weary, disheartened words.

At length, Sarah Brown was hailed once more, and a "wash-board" borrowed from her. Their young neighbor was particularly delighted at their proceedings, and volunteered the information that "it might be a new fashion, but she never saw blueing put into suds before, and 'twasn't best to put soft soap into calicos."

Amanda was not a little mortified about the blueing, for she had informed her sister that "Indigo was quite necessary to clear the suds. She had watched Nora, on Monday, and she dipped the bag in the water and then squeezed it, so."

The rubbing-board proved fatal to the knuckles of the young amateurs. What with the strong soft soap, and the unaccustomed immersion in water for so long a time, small blisters rapidly formed, and the skin was bruised and discolored. So after stirring the clothes about for a little while longer, the sisters concluded they were clean enough to boil, and accordingly another liberal supply of soap was given to the different articles, and they were placed in the kettle. To be sure, they did not promise snowy whiteness, and Ellen was somewhat dismayed at the appearance of her blue cambric frock, but Amanda said the boiling and rinsing would do wonders. However, even her buoyant spirits flagged as they once more seated themselves to await the boiling that would not commence, and their aching limbs, as well as aching heads, thrilled with pain.

The kettle would not boil. There was an end of it. The sticks of wood were too large, the chips too green. The flame plunged dimly through huge volumes of smoke, and the suds did not even simmer. How long they would have waited for it, I cannot tell—but just then the dinner-bell of the Parsonage rang loudly, and they started to their feet in dismay. There was not a moment to lose, for their hair was all in disorder, their faces blackened, and with the indigo, blue-blackened, and the perspiration had made a strange mingling of hues. And now was a hard task to empty the tubs, moving them from the high wash-bench, and carrying them to the brook-side, for there was not time for bailing them out with the dipper. The clothes were squeezed, not wrung, out of the warm suds in which they had been soaking, and fresh water poured upon them, but they were more dingy than ever. But the wringing out was a task they had not calculated for. They succeeded very well in the lighter pieces, but the night-dresses and skirts baffled their puny strength. They could scarcely lift the heavy cloth, saturated with water. Their arms were already stiff, their hands aching. It seemed as if Ellen's head would burst with pain. She longed to sit down on the flat stone, and cry, but she was afraid Amanda would laugh at her, perhaps scold her; so she toiled on. She saw Sarah Brown come down to the brook-side and watch them. She wished she would not look at her so strangely—and then her temples throbbed more painfully, and the brook roared louder and louder, the sky grew dark, and everything reeled before her.

Poor Ellen! when consciousness returned, she was lying on the chintz lounge in her aunt's parlor, all soiled and wet as she was, her face showing the stains all the more for her great paleness, and a strange ringing in her ears, as if the brook was flowing through them.

Her aunt was holding her, and several gentlemen, evidently just from the dinner-table, were standing around. Poor Amanda! for she was there, too, almost as pale as her sister with fright, and looking still more dirty and forlorn, with her hair hanging about her eyes, her skirt pinned back as she had seen Nora do, and the tears making blue channels down her cheeks. They were both put to bed as soon as possible, and Nora sent to finish their work, which the good-natured Sarah Brown had already accomplished!

It was not until the next day that Ellen fully understood how she had fainted through heat, and pain and fatigue, and Sarah Brown ran for assistance; and her favorite Mr. Poland, whose visit they had lost, after such pleasant anticipations, had carried her to the house in his arms.

And it was a sad sequel, when the new green apron, and pretty cambric frock, were found soaked almost white in the strong soap-suds, completely ruined. However, their mother told Mrs. Spencer, afterwards, that it was a cheap lesson to Amanda, who began to be contented to do work suited to her, and not to attempt a fresh, impossible scheme every day in the week.

THE SHINING EYES.

In the rural cemetery, near Frankfort, upon a hill overlooking the river, under the shadow of protecting trees, are two green mounds, unmarked by slab or stone informing the stranger that the remains of two honored pioneers—Daniel Boone and his wife—rest beneath. The beauty of the locality is unrivalled, and it is not far from the magnificent monument erected by Kentucky to her brave officers fallen on the field of battle; the splendid shaft inscribed with their names, and surmounted by a figure of Victory holding crowns in her hands. It is hoped that ere long the State will do justice to the memory of those whose arduous efforts won a victory not less glorious over the untamed wilderness, and opened the way to others as bold and persevering.

It will be remembered that the father of Daniel Boone had his residence on the borders of the Yadkin, in North Carolina, at no great distance from the eastern slope of the Alleghanies, then a frontier country, and the greater part of it unbroken forest. Near the farm here opened, was another, owned by Mr. Bryan, comprising about a hundred acres beautifully situated on a gentle swell of ground; the eminence crested with laurels and yellow poplars, which half concealed the farmer's dwelling. A wild mountain stream ran along the base of the hill. This Joseph Bryan was the oldest son of Morgan Bryan, of Virginia, the head of a very respectable family. His daughter, Rebecca, was born near Winchester, in Virginia.

Flint's "Life of Boone" contains the following account of his first meeting with his future wife, referred to as authentic by other biographers:—

"Young Boone was, one night, engaged in a fire hunt with a young friend. Their course led them to the deeply timbered bottom which skirted the stream that wound round Bryan's pleasant plantation. That the reader may have an idea what sort of a pursuit it was that young Boone was engaged in, during an event so decisive of his future fortunes, we present a brief sketch of a night fire hunt. Two persons are indispensable to it. The horseman that precedes, bears on his shoulder what is called a fire pan, full of blazing pine knots, which casts a bright and flickering glare far through the forest. The second follows, at some distance, with his rifle prepared for action. No spectacle is more impressive than this of pairs of hunters thus kindling the forest into a glare. The deer, reposing quietly in his thicket, is awakened by the approaching cavalcade, and, instead of flying from the portentous brilliance, remains stupidly gazing upon it, as if charmed to the spot. The animal is betrayed to its doom by the gleaming of its fixed and innocent eyes. This cruel mode of securing a fatal shot is called in hunters' phrase—shining the eyes.

"The two young men reached a corner of the farmer's field at an early hour in the evening. Young Boone gave the customary signal, to his mounted companion preceding him, to stop—an indication that he had shined the eyes of a deer. Boone dismounted, and fastened his horse to a tree. Ascertaining that his rifle was in order, he advanced cautiously behind a covert of bushes, to rest the right distance for a shot. The deer is remarkable for the beauty of its eyes when thus shined. The mild brilliance of the two orbs was distinctly visible. Whether warned by a presentiment, or arrested by a palpitation and strange feelings within, at noting a new expression in the blue and dewy lights that gleamed to his heart, we say not. But the unerring rifle fell, and a rustling told him the game had fled. Something whispered him it was not a deer; and yet the fleet step, as the game bounded away, might easily be mistaken for that of the light-footed animal. A second thought impelled him to pursue the rapidly retreating game; and he sprang away in the direction of the sound, leaving his companion to occupy himself as he might. The fugitive had the advantage of a considerable advance of him, and apparently a better knowledge of the localities of the place. But the hunter was perfect in all his field exercises, and scarcely less fleet-footed than a deer, and he gained rapidly on the object of his pursuit, which advanced a little distance parallel with the field fence, and then, as if endowed with the utmost accomplishment of gymnastics, cleared the fence at a leap. The hunter, embarrassed with his rifle and accoutrements, was driven to the slow and humiliating expedient of climbing it. But an outline of the form of the fugitive, fleeting through the shades in the direction of the house, assured him that he had mistaken the species of the game. His heart throbbed from an hundred sensations, and among them an apprehension of the consequences of what would have resulted from discharging his rifle, when he had first shined those liquid blue eyes. Seeing that the fleet game made straight in the direction of the house, he said to himself: 'I will see the pet deer in its lair,' and he directed his steps to the same place. Half a score of dogs opened their barking upon him as he approached the house, and advertised the master that a stranger was approaching. Having hushed the dogs, and learned the name of his visitant, he introduced him to his family as the son of their neighbor Boone.

"Scarce had the first words of introduction been uttered, before the opposite door opened, and a boy apparently of seven, and a girl of sixteen, rushed in, panting for breath, and seeming in affright.

"Sister went down to the river, and a painter chased her, and she is almost scared to death," exclaimed the boy.

"The ruddy, flaxen-haired girl stood full in view of her terrible pursuer, leaning upon his rifle, and surveying her with the most eager admiration. 'Rebecca, this is young Boone, son of our neighbor,' was the laconic introduction. Both were young, beautiful, and at the period when the affections exercise their most energetic influence. The circumstances of the introduction were favorable to the result, and the young hunter felt that the eyes had shined his bosom, as fatally as his rifle shot had ever the innocent deer of the thickets. She, too, when she saw the light, open, bold forehead, the clear, keen, yet gentle and affectionate eye, the firm front, and the visible impress of decision and fearlessness of the hunter—when she interpreted a look which said as distinctly as looks could say it, 'how terrible it would have been to have fired!' can hardly be supposed to have regarded him with indifference. Nor can it be wondered at that she saw in him her beau ideal of excellence and beauty. The inhabitants of cities, who live in mansions, and read novels stored with unreal pictures of life and the heart, are apt to imagine that love, with all its golden allusions, is reserved exclusively for them. It is a most egregious mistake. A model of ideal beauty and perfection is woven in almost every youthful heart, of the brightest and most brilliant threads that compose the web of existence. It may not be said that this forest maiden was deeply and foolishly smitten at first sight. All reasonable time and space were granted to the claims of maidenly modesty. As for Boone, he was remarkable for the backwoods attribute of never being beaten out of his track, and he ceased not to woo, until he gained the heart of Rebecca Bryan. In a word, he courted her successfully, and they were married."

Boone's first step, after his marriage, was to find a suitable place where he might cultivate his farm, and hunt to the greatest advantage. His wife remained at home, while he went to explore the unsettled regions of North Carolina. When he had selected a locality, near the head waters of the Yadkin, Rebecca, with the same resolute spirit of enterprise which afterwards led her to the wilds of Kentucky, bade farewell to her friends, and followed her adventurous husband. In a few months, her home had assumed a pleasant aspect; a neat cabin stood on a pleasant eminence near the river, surrounded by an enclosed field; the farm was well stocked, and with the abundance of game in the woods, the settlers had no lack of means for comfort and enjoyment. The rude dwelling frequently offered the traveller shelter; and by a cheerful fire and table loaded with the finest game, with the enhancing blessing of a hospitable welcome, was many a tale of adventure narrated, while as yet the surrounding forest was untouched by an axe. For some years, the young couple lived in this sylvan retirement, till the fields of other emigrants opened wide clearings, and dwellings rose so thickly in the neighborhood as to form villages; when Boone made up his mind to remove to some wilder spot.—Mrs. Ellet's "Pioneer Women of the West."

TO A SERAPH IN THE REALMS OF REST.

BY T. H. CHIVERS, M. D.

Thou wast to me in this dark world so lonely—
Smiling upon me with those eyes of love—
Like some bright star which shines upon me only—
So bright no other seems to shine above.

As fades that star whose looks me home have lighted

To joys as pure as its own beams divine—
Leaving me here alone on earth benighted—
So faded from my soul that face of thine!

As some lone traveller, by the night misguided,
Misseth his way when his bright star is gone;
So, left, alas! by Death from thee divided,
My soul now wanders through this world alone!

THE MORMONS, OR LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

The origin, rapid development, and present prosperity of this religious sect, is one of the most remarkable and instructive historical events of the present century. That Joseph Smith, a native of Vermont, an obscure individual, without money, education or respectability, should, under the influence of an overwhelming religious enthusiasm, successfully induce a belief in his immediate inspiration in the minds of hundreds of thousands of people, and cause a book entitled the "Book of Mormon," to be conscientiously received by them as of equal authority with the Scriptures, and a continuation of the sacred revelations of Heaven, that, in twenty years' time the disciples of Joseph Smith should have increased from six to 300,000, should have founded a State in the distant wilderness, and compelled the government of the United States practically to recognise them as an independent people with the right of self-government; that the emissaries of this religious sect should now be preaching its doctrines with success, in the most enlightened nations in Europe, and in pagan countries, and that converts should be continually flocking to the Mormon settlement, in the valley of the Great Salt Lake, from all parts of the earth; these are facts worthy the researches of the philosopher, the consideration of statesmen, and the pen of the historian. Such a revelation of the superstition and folly of humanity in modern times, throws a bright light on similar events which have occurred in former epochs of the world's history, the revelation and Koran of Mahomet, &c.

The following is the account given by Lieutenant Gunnison, [from whose interesting book just published by Lippincott, Grambo & Co., the facts set forth in this article are obtained,] of the origin of the Mormon sect:

"The founder of the Mormon sect was Joseph Smith, a native of Vermont, who emigrated when quite young in his father's family to Western New York. According to his autobiography, published in a series of letters, he was of a religious turn of mind, and, when seventeen years of age, became greatly interested in the 'revivals of religion,' often occurring among the 'denominations' in that section of country. In one of these times his feelings were so powerfully wrought upon that he gave himself up to continued prayer for some days—and meditating still at night, he at length arose while all the family were hushed in sleep, and poured forth his soul 'agonizing' to have made known to him the truth, among the conflicting opinions he heard by the various sects. His apartment became suddenly illuminated, and an angel appeared and conversed familiarly with him, and instructed him in the way of righteousness; informing him also that there was no true church upon the earth. The doctrine taught on this point is, that the church which was once established, had fallen under the rule given by the prophet, and had 'changed the ordinances,' 'broken the everlasting covenant,' and 'corrupted the faith;' for which cause it was removed from earth—or, in their figurative expression, 'the man child was caught up into heaven,' which means that the priesthood was taken away fifteen hundred years ago. And Joseph was told that his prayers were heard and registered in the books on high, and that, being dearly beloved of the Lord, he should be commissioned a priest after the order of Melchisedek, and restore that line among men, organizing a church of faithful persons, to receive the Lord in the Millennium, which time should be hastened according to their degree of mighty faith, for he was determined 'to cut the work short in righteousness.' In after visits he was further instructed that 'truth should spring out of the earth'—(Ps.)—and that, accordingly, he should be conducted to the hill Cumorah, in Palmyra, New York, and receive from out the ground holy and prophetic records concerning a family of Jews that emigrated from Jerusalem in the time of Zedekiah, and were miraculously led to America, across the Eastern ocean.

"On being guided to the spot, he found a square stone box, eight inches high, covered with a slab, cemented upon it; and made repeated trials to open it. He was struck back by an invisible blow, and informed, in answer to his earnest prayer, that the want of success was owing to his listening to the suggestions of Satan, who had walked at his elbow on the way, and had made him resolve to make use of the golden plates on which the records were engraved, as well as the contents when published, to advance his temporal fortunes. This was sin—to think he should become famous, was unholy ambition; that he should be rich and powerful thereby, was avarice.

"But, on sincere repentance and submission, four years after, the contents of the box were shown to him, the angel opening it; which consisted of the 'Sword of Laban,' brought from Jerusalem, a breastplate and two stones, 'bright and shining,' and golden plates engraved with characters, and united at the backs by rings. A portion of the records was received, constituting the Book of Mormon, in which are depicted, much in the style of the Bible Chronicles, the various fortunes of the four brothers of the emigrating family, and of their descendants—how some tribes were evil in their practices, despising reproof, and became cursed with a dark skin and loathsome habits, and were made scourges to others when falling away from the truth—the sayings, teachings, and warnings of their prophets, who foretold by name the advent of the Saviour of the world—the organization among the purer people on this continent, of a church by Christ, who came down to them after His ascension at Jerusalem, and gave them His gospel nearly in the words of the Sermon on the Mount, and how that for apostacy these Christians were finally destroyed by the Gadianton robbers and the red men—the last prophet, Moroni by name, sealing up the Records, and depositing them, with the sword, Urim and Thummim, and breastplate, at Cumorah, there to remain until 'the fullness of time' should demand their exhumation; and which should be brought forth, 'by way of Gentile,' for the 'convincing' of both Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ.' (See Preface, B. Mormon.)

"The restoring angel was the spirit of this same Moroni, the son of Mormon the Seer, who had made a compendium of the holy writings and delivered them to him; and Joseph now constituted the Seer, by means of the Urim and Thummim, placed in a bow and looked through upon the plates, began their translation, and preached the news of his important mission."

Such is the account given by Joseph Smith and his followers of the origin of the Book of Mormon. Fanaticism will ever meet with opponents in men whose minds are enlightened by science, and where Christian principles are firm and settled. It is alleged by the opponents of Mormonism, that the Mormon bible was fabricated by Joseph Smith, out of a manuscript written by the late Rev. Mr. Spaulding, at Conneaut, Ohio; and of which he became possessed. This manuscript was written by Mr. Spaulding, to account for the ruined cities and temples discovered in Central America. These remains of a past civilization, which antiquarians have not yet been able to account for, were chosen by Mr. Spaulding as the subject of his MS., which is a romance to show the manner in which America was peopled by the Jews, and the "lost ten tribes of Israel," together with the subsequent events that occurred to their descendants, and the origin of the Indian nations which overspread the continent of America when it was discovered by Columbus. A clear idea of the origin of the Mormon bible can be had from the affidavit of Mr. Henry Lake, given at Conneaut, in 1833, which is corroborated by an abundance of other testimony.

"He affirms: 'I left the State of New York in the year of 1810, and arrived in this place about the first of January following. Soon after my arrival I formed a copartnership with Solomon Spaulding * * *. He frequently read to me from a manuscript which he was writing, and which he entitled the 'Manuscript Found,' which he represented as being found in this town. I spent many hours in hearing him read said writings, and became acquainted with their contents. He wished me to assist him in getting it printed, alleging that a book of that kind would meet with a rapid sale. This book represented the American Indians as the lost tribes, gave an account of their leaving Jerusalem, their contentions and wars, which were many and great. One time, when he was reading to me the tragic account of Laban, I pointed out to him what I considered an inconsistency, which he promised to correct; but by referring to the Book of Mormon, I find to my surprise it stands there, just as he read it to me then. Some months ago I borrowed a golden Bible, * * * had not read twenty minutes before I was astonished to find the same passages in it that Spaulding had read to me, more than twenty years before, from his 'Manuscript Found.' Since then, I have more fully examined the said golden bible, and have no hesitation in saying that the historical part of it is principally, if not wholly, taken from the 'Manuscript Found.' I well recollect telling Mr. Spaulding that the too frequent use of the words, 'Now it came to pass,' 'And it came to pass,' rendered it ridiculous. Spaulding left here in 1812, and I furnished him with the means to carry him to Pittsburg, where he said he would get the book printed and pay me. But I never heard any thing more from him, or of his writings, till I saw them in the Book of Mormon."

The same in effect is the evidence of the brother of Spaulding, that he heard much of the "Manuscript" read, and that, according to his best recollection, "The Book of Mormon is the same as my brother Solomon wrote, with the exception of the religious matter." All this is confirmed by more than half a dozen other gentlemen, and by the widow and daughter of the author of "Manuscript Found."

It appears that Mr. Spaulding left Pittsburg in 1814, and that his widow, after his death, in 1816, removed to Onondaga county, New York, near to her early residence, and carried a trunk thither, containing the writings of her deceased husband. During a part of the time from 1817 to 1820, when she again married and moved to Massachusetts, the trunk was at her brother's in Onondaga Hollow, near the residence of the Smith family. When the Book of Mormon appeared, and its identity with the Spaulding MS. was discovered, the trunk was hunted up, and search made for the Spaulding MS. It had mysteriously disappeared, and the "Manuscript Found" has ever since been the "Manuscript Lost." From these circumstances it is thought that Joseph Smith obtained possession of it, and moulded it into the Book of Mormon, arranging and altering the matter so as to suit his own purposes.

A copy of the Book of Mormon was placed in our hands a few days ago, when in the Philadelphia Library, and we have no hesitation in saying that a more successful attempt to imitate the Scriptures, was perhaps never made. Its literary style and merits are, however, truly contemptible, its author having been plainly about as ignorant of the rules of grammar and composition as a Hottentot. Contrast the revelations, in the Book of Mormon with the sublime beauty and grandeur of the revelations of the unchanging laws of nature, in the "Principia of Newton." How truly contemptible is superstition!

The manner of writing the Book of Mormon was as follows: "Smith would place his pseudo gold plates in a hat, and take the stones, Urim and Thummim, which he affirmed had been delivered to him at the hill Cumorah, in Palmyra, by an angel—and, raising a screen of cloth between himself and the scribe, proceed to look through the stones, and the words, in reformed Egyptian characters, would change to his vernacular, and 'pass before his eyes by the power and gift of God.'"

He gives us a particular account of the first persecution by his neighbors, who tried to capture the "gold plates;" and to escape from this, he concealed them in a barrel of beans. We are also told that Cowdery, the scribe, was sharply rebuked for impertinent curiosity, in wishing to see the gold plates, which was the prophets' privilege only.

The Book of Mormon was issued in 1830, and on the 6th of April, of the same year, the first Mormon church was organized, consisting of only six members—the father of Smith, his two brothers, and Oliver Cowdery, a schoolmaster, being amongst the number. It is said that Cowdery first baptized the prophet, and, to render the act legitimate, there were present as sponsors, Moses and Elias, together with Peter, James and John. The prophet now baptized and commissioned elders, who began their enthusiastic preaching, and converted several visionary characters, persons without any settled opinions in Christianity, of a weak and superstitious turn of mind, and liable to be immediately carried away by the first eloquent harangue in favor of Millerism, Mormonism, or any other religious delusion. In this manner, the Mormon church gradually increased in numbers.

In the following August, Parley P. Pratt, a Campbellite preacher in Ohio, who was preaching notions on prophecy, the restoration of the Children of Israel, and the Millennium, met with the Book of Mormon, and became a convert, whilst on a visit to the State of New York. On his return, he presented the new Bible to another still more enthusiastic person, named Sidney Rigdon. He too adopted the new system. These were important additions to the Mormon Society. Both were men endowed with talents, learning and eloquence. We would remark here, that Rigdon had for three years taught the literal interpretation of Scripture prophecies, the gathering of the Israelites to receive the second coming, the literal reign of the Saints on earth, and the use of miraculous gifts in the church.

It will be readily allowed, that there are passages in Scripture which are hard to be understood, and about the exact meaning of which the learned disagree. Experience shows that men may pore over the hidden meaning of such passages until they become religiously insane, and are thus led to "wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction." When we find the most mysterious parts of the Bible, including the prophecies and revelations, invariably quoted to sustain their peculiar views by the Mormonite and Millerite preachers, and this with a degree of positiveness of assertion which will admit of no consideration, common sense as well as Christianity plainly shows such preachers to be nothing but religious fanatics or impostors. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

The first Mormon settlement was formed at Kirtland, in Ohio, in January, 1831. To this place the prophet and his people removed, where Pratt and Rigdon had already a society of over a thousand to receive them. In the month of June, Joseph Smith professed to have received a revelation, which resulted in the sending forth of a mission of elders into Missouri. The site for a city was selected, which was called Zion, and there was soon collected, in Jackson county, Missouri, over 1200 Mormons, buying lands and cultivating them peaceably. Two years thus passed away in peace, but in 1834, the people in Jackson county collected and drove them out. This attack appears to have been altogether unjust, and without any motive but the fear of the Mormons gaining a political ascendancy in the county, and a dislike to their fanatical doctrines and institutions. The Mormons again gathered rapidly together in Clay and the adjoining counties, and prosperity again accompanied them in all their efforts. In 1837 a Mormon bank was established at Kirtland, and public credit obtained to a considerable amount. This bank failed in 1838, and its managers were prosecuted for swindling. The Mormons in Missouri and Ohio were now driven out of these States, and 12,000 of them arrived on the banks of the Mississippi, in a destitute condition. Their tale of distress touched the hearts of the Illinoisians, and they received them hospitably, furnishing them with both food and clothing and a place on which to effect a settlement. The city of Nauvoo was now built by the Mormons, and the site for a temple chosen. The State favored the exiles; charters were obtained for the city, with peculiarly favorable privileges; the Nauvoo Legion was incorporated, and the arms of the State loaned, in which they were well drilled, and became a standing army, with the prophet as Lieutenant-General. Missionaries were now sent abroad to Palestine, Africa, and Europe.

One of that band, still well affected towards Mormonism, though differing on one point from its teachings, related to Lieut. Gunnison some parts of the discourse of Joseph to the Missionaries.

One main point insisted on was, that "spiritual wifery" was to be most pointedly denied; and that they taught that one man should live in chaste fidelity with one woman in conjugal relationship. In the dark concerning the revelation allowing polygamy, he sincerely declared that but one wife was ever known to any of his brethren. While zealously preaching in the city of New York, he was thought worthy, by the Apostle Lyman, to be let into the secret of the "blessings of Jacob," the privileges of the Saints. Called aside one day by the President of the Stake, he was told that God had always rewarded His distinguished saints with special privileges, such as would be wrong for sinners, but by revelation made harmless to the good. As an instance he would cite Jacob, David, and Solomon, who had many wives allowed them. In these last days, also, the like had been accorded to Joseph Smith and others; and having now full confidence in his holiness, the priest could have the same privilege of adding to the household of the faith many children, by choosing additions to the present wife. The priest says he was utterly astounded, but, on reflection, chose to dissemble, and say he would consider the matter. In the evening he was invited to witness "a sealing" of several couples, at a large boarding-house. In the front parlor the ceremony, like a marriage, was performed; and, as each pair was "finished" by the priest, they retired through the folding doors, and thus to their own apartments. The guest was so shocked, that he retired to his home, and though he never took any open part against the "church of new privileges," he was denounced as a deserter in their papers, and the public cautioned against him as a defamer.

From 1838 to 1844, Mormonism appears to have been in a state of continuous prosperity at Nauvoo. It was during this peaceful interim, that the revelation, allowing to Joseph, and the high priests of the Mormon hierarchy, as many wives as they could support, was alleged to have been received from Heaven. In vain the wife of Joseph, styled by himself and followers, "The Elect Lady," threatened, by way of retaliation, to take another husband; the only consolation she received was that a prophet must obey the Lord—"he would be obedient to the Heavenly vision."

The Mormons now boasted of having 100,000 persons in the faith, throughout the States. In 1844, Joseph sent forth his "Views on Government," and was actually put forth by the infatuated votaries of his religious imposture as one of the candidates for the Presidency! Now it was that those who had treated them so hospitably, became incensed against them. It was asserted, and with truth, that no Gentile could obtain justice in the Nauvoo courts. The property of the people of Illinois was stolen from them, and traces of it were obtained at Nauvoo. Men of influence and talent now deserted the standard of the prophet, denouncing him as an impostor, debauchee, and tyrant. Women impeached him of attempted wrong, whilst the miserably subterfuge resorted to by him, that he did it just to see if they were virtuous, only exasperated those families which he had sought to dishonor. The Expositor having published a list of the prophet's debaucheries, and those of his friends, a party of Mormons attacked the printing-office, broke the press to pieces, and scattered the type in the streets. This attack was resented on the part of the people, and justice having been refused, the Governor of the State was appealed to, and Joseph and Hyrum, his brother, together with Dr. Richards and John Taylor, were lodged in Carthage jail.

The citizens of Carthage now conspired together to attack the jail, and take justice into their own hands. Early on the morning of the 27th of June, 1844, they assaulted the door of the room in which the prisoners were incarcerated. Richards and Taylor, lying on the floor, made a stretch across the room, the feet of one against the shoulders of the other, and kept the door from fully opening. Guns were thrust in and discharged, and Joseph, with a revolver, returned two shots, hitting one man in the elbow. A ball struck Hyrum, the patriarch, and he fell, exclaiming, "I am killed!"—to which Joseph replied, "Oh, brother Hyrum!" The prophet then threw up the window, and, in the act of leaping through, was killed by balls fired from the outside, saying, as he fell, "O Lord, my God!" The people in the hall forced into the room and wounded Taylor; the other escaped "without a hole in his robe."

After the death of Joseph, the struggle for the leadership followed, and Brigham Young was elected. The persecuting spirit did not cease with the death of the prophet. Nothing would satisfy the people of Illinois but the expulsion of the Mormons from Nauvoo and the surrounding country. It was announced, by revelation, that the whole church must retire into the wilderness to grow into a multitude aloof from the haunts of civilization. The Valley of the Great Salt Lake was selected for a settlement, and on the 21st of July, 1847, the pioneer party arrived, and on the 24th the Church Presidency, which latter day is now their grand epoch.

Since this time, the Mormon church has continued to prosper. They have by their industry fertilized a barren region, and made "two spires of grass to grow where only one grew before." And there they are bidding defiance to their persecutors, and ready to fight for their rude rocks and snowy lands. They demand a recognition of their independence as a State, on the ground that they know better than all the world besides what is suited to their condition. They are a peculiar people. "They have formed everything on the model of a republican State, adopted a constitution, liberal, free, and tolerant of conscience in religion, and have a criminal code which applies to their peculiar situation and feelings;" and it is not to be presumed that lawyers and judges, however eminent in their profession at home, can understand or appreciate the statutes of this wild country. Gentile judges are, therefore, regarded by all Mormons as an unjust imposition, and they are resolved on resisting all such foreign interference.

Experience has shown that Mormonism cannot exist in these States. It must conquer or die. The Mormon settlement is at present rendered harmless by its geographical position. The Valley of the Great Salt Lake is situated midway between the Mississippi States and California, and is hemmed in on all sides by inhospitable tracts of country upwards of a thousand miles in extent. It is, in fact, a three months' journey, with the present conveniences for travelling, from the nearest civilized community to the Mormon settlement.

We have given an outline of the historical picture of Mormonism drawn by our author, and we shall now take a glance at a few interesting peculiarities in the Mormon theology.

The Mormons worship a Trinity, or rather a duality of persons in the Godhead. God the father is an infinitely perfect man; Jesus Christ is the Son of God by the Virgin Mary, and the Holy Spirit is the one mind possessing and acting in the Father and the Son. Passages are quoted from their own works to show that such are in reality their views.

"First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret. If the veil was rent to-day, and the great God who holds this world in its orbit, and upholds all things by His power, if you were to see Him to-day, you would see Him in all the person, image, and very form as a man: for Adam was created in the very fashion and image of God; Adam received instruction, walked, talked, and conversed with Him, as one man talks and communes with another."

There is a quotation extant from the author of the "Voice of Warning," to the effect that "we worship a God who hath both body and parts; who has eyes, mouth, and ears, and who speaks when, and to whom He pleases—who is just as good at mechanical inventions as at any other business."

But we are referred by their teachers to the Apocalypse, where it is written of the Redeemer:

"And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father;" and to the apostle that said, "there are gods many and lords many," to prove that the Father had "his Father," and they talk boldly of the grandfather, great-grandfather of God, thus tracing back almost ad infinitum to the "Head God, that called the grand council together, when the worlds came rolling into existence."

Our author adds:—"The prophet has not left on record, to my knowledge, the manner in which the Head God originated." And, hence, amongst the Mormons, the mode of his origin is a mere matter of opinion!

The Mormons believe that the "head devil," as they term him, retains many of the noble qualities which he possessed when an archangel; that he is a "perfect gentleman," all the meaner temptations being resorted to by the baser sort of imps.

They entertain peculiar views on the resurrection, believing that the same body will be raised, but that it will be without any blood, which they consider to be the mortal part of our nature. This peculiarity in their faith is thus expressed by the apostle Pratt, one of their authorities in doctrinal matters.

"Jesus was the exact pattern of our resurrection. 'And Jesus Christ came forth triumphant from the mansions of the dead, possessing the same body which had been born of a woman, which was crucified; but no blood flowed in his veins; for blood was the natural life in which were the principles of mortality; and a man restored to flesh and blood would be mortal, which was not the case with our Saviour;' and he was substantial, for he told his disciples to handle him, and know that he had 'flesh and bones,' which will be the constitution of all resurrected bodies."

It is believed that a person may be "moved by the spirit" to utter any set of sounds in imitation of words, the speaker knowing nothing of the ideas expressed, and that another member of the congregation may have imparted to him, by the same spirit, the "gift of interpretation of tongues," so that he can explain to the audience what has been said in intelligible language.

It is unnecessary to give further extracts from Lieut. Gunnison's book. We have written thus much on Mormonism because we think the rise, progress, present prosperity and peculiarities of this religious sect ought to be more generally known; and we wish to call particular attention to this work as a faithful and truthful expositor of Mormonism.

That polygamy is practised among the Mormons is undeniable, and, indeed, the subject begins to be more openly discussed than formerly, and it is announced that a treatise is now in preparation to prove, by the Scriptures, the right of all Christians to a plurality of wives, if not to declare their own practice of the same.

We dissent from many of the views in this volume. Mormon prosperity is attributable to their admirable system of combining labor, whilst each has his own property in lands and tenements; and also to their industry. Similar results would follow, under any other religious system, provided the laws were equitably administered; and therefore are not to be attributed to the peculiarities in the Mormon theology, or priestly government.

The success of the Mormon prophet is to be attributed more to the ignorance and superstition which is still so abundantly prevalent in society, than to the skill and science with which he was endowed. Our author speaks in terms of aggrandizement of Joseph Smith wielding "the powers of life and death over a multitude in an enlightened age and community; but the success of so transparent a system of imposture, shows that much of the darkness and superstition of past ages at present clouds the understandings of men, and that in religious matters, the intellects of a large portion of the present generation are but little brighter than those of their predecessors, anterior to the Lutheran Reformation.

WAVES FROM THE RIVER OF LIFE

AS IT ROLLED UNDER ARCHES OF SORROW.

Why so sad for her, who, sleeping,
Smiles upon thee never now?
Would'st awaken her with weeping?
She is happier than thou!

Can'st thou wish her slumber ended,
When existence still must be,
As it ever has been, blended
With such crushing misery?

Can'st thou image her reclining
In the Palestine of Peace,
And not check thy fond repining—
Bid thy cherished anguish cease?

Would'st thou bring her from the bowers
Of Elysium above,—
Where the angels lead the hours,
And the air she breathes is love,—

To be one where all are weary,
Who commingle in the strife,
With a mournful miserere,
Of the fearful battle-life?

Rather sigh that thou yet livest;
That the seraph sought not thee;
Know each sacrifice thou givest
Lifts thee nearer Deity?

She is happy—thy lost treasure!
Is there one alive, the same?
Is there one possessing pleasure
That is perfect but in name?

None, earth over! Fear and sorrow
Are our portions while of clay—
A foreboding of to-morrow,
A forgetting of to-day.

Weep! there's luxury in weeping,
When the heart of grief is full;
And the dark clouds under-creeping
Make the stars invisible.

When but God alone can hear us,
As we breathe the fervent prayer,
That His Spirit ever near us,
May make light the load we bear.

There's a sanctity in sorrow
More commanding than the air

That the proudest Prelates borrow,
From the ermined robes they wear.

O be patient! Life will linger
But a few short seasons more;
Even now the angel's finger
Turns the tear-marked pages o'er.

Soon the brightest, darkest, saddest,
The oft-prayed for leaf—the last—
When celestial harp's hymn gladdest
Will have cheered us—chilled us—past.

With a sigh for those who love us
As they mourn that we must sever,
And a Godlike glance above us,
We will throw aside forever.

With an anthem of thanksgiving,
Whose intensity none know,
This infirmity of living,
This inheritance of woe!

And re-robe by Rapture's river—
The Euphrates of the sky—
Whose sweet waters roll forever
Round the isles of Ecstasy.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN IN CITIES.

[From a series of articles, from the pen of Mrs. Neal, on the subject of employment for females, now appearing in the Lady's Book, we make the following extract of an imaginary conversation between the writer and a lady with whom she is supposed to be shopping.]

"For," continues Mrs. Jenkins, quite entering into the spirit of the subject, "just see how many young girls are growing up dependent on their brothers or fathers, and wasting their own time, or making foolish, unhappy matches, when they might much better be usefully employed. And look at the widows, worn by dependence and grudging charity, seeing their children neglected or ill used, when their hearts are aching to do something for themselves, and to make a home for these helpless little ones. If I was a widow, I'd soon find something to do, you may depend."

"But you could teach."

"Not in Philadelphia, where there are more boarding-schools now than can get supported. Many a poor soul is struggling on in difficulties and embarrassments, who would be glad to work with her hands, if she could only find something to do, and I guess it's so all over."

"But there is always plain sewing," you suggest, readily.

"Do you know what women get for plain sewing?" Mrs. Jenkins abruptly asks; "because I have had occasion to know something about that, too. I can give you, almost word for word, the answer of a dealer in wholesale clothing, who had been twenty years in the business. I went, accidentally, to his shop to make an inquiry, and it occurred to me to ask if he could give employment to some poor woman I was just then interested in.

"We give the highest prices, ma'am, and calculated to have all our work well done. Now, we have given as high as eighty-seven cents a piece for fine shirts.'

"Eighty-seven cents! Why, I always pay a dollar and a quarter.'

"Oh, we couldn't stand that, no way, ma'am. It wouldn't pay at all. Why, in these cheap clothing stores, none of 'em give over a levy and three fips, and ten cents for Canton flannel. We don't pay a great deal on that: but these are mostly made by old women, who can't see so very well, and don't depend on it for a living, so they can afford to work cheap."

"But a woman who does depend on her needle, how much can she make?"

"Why, a right steady hand can earn as high as two, and two and a half, and three dollars, by sitting to it all the time. A vest-maker can do that, if she's good at button-holes. You see, I just cut out half a dozen satin vests at once, and give them. A pantaloons-maker can't do so well, unless she has customer-work, or is uncommonly smart. Some don't make over a dollar, or a dollar and a half, if they don't bring in good work. You see, they don't stay long enough at their trade to learn. They can't afford to pay their board, and so they don't stay more than three months before they must begin to earn for themselves. That makes a great many bad hands. I pity the poor things, and get along with them the best I can. Sometimes I try to show them myself; but I have to turn them off at last; though, I must say, it goes rather hard,' said the worthy man, 'because I know half the time they haven't got money to pay their board, and dear knows what becomes of them! And those that do well, you see, they have to sit so steady to make their three dollars, and then their board has to come out of that, and they don't have much light or good air, and they mostly get sick, and just live along.'

"That's almost word for word what he told me; and, I declare, it gave me such a heartache I could not enjoy my own comforts. He was, no doubt, a liberal and humane employer. Think how many are a great deal worse off. I've no patience with people who are everlastingly preaching up the needle. If the sword has its thousand victims, the needle has its ten thousands, small and inoffensive as it seems, because we women know how intolerably irksome the unvaried labor must be. I like sewing, and should not know what to do with myself often without it; but to sew only one morning without stopping, always gives me a pain in my side."

We all can certainly testify to the truth of this.

"Some of my Sunday-school girls," continues the good woman, whom we have never before suspected of knowing anything more of social economy than appertained to the management of her own household, "when I used to teach—that was the first I ever thought about the matter; they were quite large girls: I had a kind of Bible class; and nearly all earned their own living. It was very easy for me to go round in my silk dress and white kid gloves, and preach up self-denial and industry to them, out of our Sunday's lesson, and they practising it all the time, in those little, dark, filthy alleys, swarming with pigs and children. One of them sewed straw bonnets—no wonder they can sell them so cheap, when they only give ten cents a piece for them! others worked in crowded milliner shops from Monday morning till Saturday night, for a dollar and a half, mixing with good and bad—the Monday's talk with their comrades undoing all the good of Sunday's lessons. I soon found that out. A young girl could hardly have a worse moral atmosphere than one of those work-rooms; they themselves, and their mothers, have told me so many a time. I always had a heartache while I taught those girls: it was the first thing that made me think of what a woman ought to be, or might be, in the way of influencing society—her own sex in particular—without any public gatherings, or speech-makings either."

Mrs. Jenkins has certainly spoken very energetically in all those intervals of our shopping in Second street, where we have still been waited upon by our own sex as well as though the hands that displayed the ribbons and muslins had been twice as large and coarse; and now we are driven to Eighth street, to be fitted for a pair of gaiters—still by a woman—and here the comfort and propriety are self-evident; there is no need of soiling your own gloves, or ruffling your temper in bending over a refractory lacing.

Eighth street is the paradise of cheap shopping, as we all know; but it is remarkable for one other feature: so many of these little stores are not only kept, but owned by women, many of whom have accumulated a sufficient sum to retire upon comfortably, when they shall choose. This we are told from the lips of one of them, a bright, tidy, little body, who shakes back her black curls, and snips a little bit of paper with her scissors as she talks.

"You have been here some time, Mrs. White," says Mrs. Jenkins, choosing a sacque for her youngest boy.

"Yes, ma'am; eight years now. I came when there were very few stores along in this square, and I have made my own business, as you may say, and a great deal for other people. I've been a widow now fifteen years," (she scarcely looks old enough for this, so round, so comely are her face and figure,) "and I was left without anything; and now I've got enough to live on, the rest of my days, if I choose; but I know I couldn't be satisfied to sit still, after such an active life. I bought my goods myself, and sewed, and 'tended the shop, and saved, and I knew all I was making was for myself. My rent was always ready when rent-day came, and I never had to ask the favor of security from anybody, though this house and store is seven hundred a year. Please God, I'm quite independent now." And yet, withal, she is as womanly a little body as one could wish to see.

But we must not neglect to sketch the three sisters that we find next door, dispensing their pins and tapes, and polite sayings over their little counter. Mrs. Jenkins commends them to our especial notice; but this is not necessary—we have made their acquaintance before. They are always dressed precisely alike, it seems to us, in subdued half mourning black dresses and lead-colored ribbons, and each with a mourning brooch, their only ornament. We cannot tell them apart yet, although it is three years since we first chanced to notice the neat shop windows, with their collars and cuffs, and ribbons, and such beautifully shaped combs and brushes. They are all tall, with full fine figures, appear to be the same age, or certainly very near it. They have kindly dark eyes, and black hair neatly arranged, and speak in a soft, measured voice; they seem to have one voice as well as one mind. Many an errand we have made there, for a moment's glance at so much quiet goodness and content.

"Pins, Miss?" Perhaps our feminine vanity is conciliated by this, for they have never recognized our claim to the dignity of madamship. "Which sort, if you please? Oh, English pins; quite small, I recollect; they do not tear one's collars so, and though they cost a little more, are better in the end. Lovely day, Miss; quite cool after the shower yesterday. Yes, ten cents for those; this size are a levy. Was there anything else? Combs? I suppose you would like them well finished. Sister, will you be so good as to show this young lady some tucking combs? At the other counter, Miss;" and we turn to the other counter to find the ditto of the first speaker, in appearance, voice, and manner.

"Wore your last comb two years? That's the fault of our goods, though," (with a low mellow laugh;) "all our customers say so; they last too long for our profit. But then we always have the best, as you say the best is the cheapest in the end. Yes, Miss, that's a beautiful pattern; we had a great deal of trouble to get it again. The street is quite lively this morning. A great many people are out of town though. This one, did you say? Eighty-seven cents, if you please. We would just as soon change a five dollar piece as not. Thank you, Miss; sometimes we have a heavy payment to make, and it is all the better. This is the change, I believe; all but five cents. I'm sorry to keep you waiting. Sister, could you give this young lady five cents? Good morning; good morning, Miss." And both sisters bow and smile as pleasantly as if we had expended ten dollars instead of one.

We have often longed to know something of their history, there is such an air of placid content and innate refinement about them and their little shop; their very ribbons rustle, with an old-style gentility, as they are folded and unfolded in their soft white hands.

And now the carriage rolls beyond what we have always considered the business part of the town, down Tenth street, to a range of low frame houses, each with its narrow window of cheap muslins, and tawdry ornaments; shops, as the author of the "Charcoal Sketches" has said, "which bring a sensation of dreariness over the mind, and which cause a sinking of the heart, before you have time to ask why you are saddened; frail and feeble barriers they seem against penury and famine, to yield at the first approach of the gaunt enemy. Look at one of them closely. There is no aspect of business about it; it compels you to think of distraining for rent, of broken hearts, of sickness, suffering, and death."

"It is a shop, moreover, we have all seen the like, with a bell to it, which rings out an announcement as we open the door, that few and far between there has been an arrival in the way of a customer, though it may be that the bell, with all its untuned sharpness, fails to triumph over the din of domestic affairs in the little dark room, that serves for parlor, and kitchen, and hall, and proves unavailing to spread the news against the turbulent clamor of noisy children. The owner is one of those women you may recognize in the street by their look of premature age, anxious, hollow-eyed, and worn to shadows. There is a whole history in every line of their faces, which tells of unceasing trouble; and their hard quick movement, as they press onward, regardless of all that begirts their way, indicates those who have no thoughts to spare, from their own immediate necessities, for comment on the gay flaunting world. Little does ostentation know, as it flashes by in satined arrogance and jeweled pride, of the sorrow it may jostle from its path; and perhaps it is happy for us, as we move along in smiles and pleasantries, not to comprehend that the glance which meets our own comes from the bleakness of a withered heart, withered by penury's unceasing presence."

Ay, it is too true a picture to spare one tint, one shade of the sombre coloring, for such is the worn face that tries to smile—such a wintry gleam!—as we are welcomed, though there is scarcely room to stand, outside the narrow empty counter. And why has industry failed in its reward? "It is those fairs," the woman tells us—speaking bitterly, poor soul! and what wonder?—"that kills all our business. Some ladies won't pay a fair price when they can get things there so much less, and even think they are giving to charity besides. It's poor charity, to my thinking, ma'am, that takes the bread out of our mouths, and works our hands to the bone. And then they come here, and bring their work, and we must do it for next to nothing, because we can't starve, and they know it. Some ladies don't seem to have no conscience, ma'am."

But Mrs. Jenkins is not of these; she has come far out of her way to give out this bundle of plain sewing, and she will pay a fair price for it, too. "I know it won't be done quite so well," she says to us confidentially, "but it will wear quite as long, and nobody will look at the stitches. That poor soul used to sew beautifully when she was first a widow, but she set up a little shop for muslins and trimmings, as you see, and sunk all she had, because ladies will buy where they can get things under price, without looking at the justice of the thing. Now she has to slight her work; but I never say a word. I see just how things go."

Reader, thus far we have spoken under the guise of a pleasant morning's talk; but we have given you no fancy sketches. What we have related are studies in a life school, vouched for by our own actual experience and observation; and yet the task we have set for ourselves seems so feebly executed that we could almost lay down our pen despairingly, when we think of the hundreds of our own sex, everywhere around us, wasting life and energy in idleness, or ill-paid and wasting labor. And we have our own share in the wrong—those of us, at least, who allow the weakness or poverty of our sisters to minister to our own luxury and selfishness. "The laborer is not unworthy of her hire;" and when, by trifling self-denial of ostentatious luxuries, the needlewoman has her just and equitable recompense, hers will cease to be the wearisome and dreaded task it has now become. But this cannot be, so long as it is the only avenue open to our sex. It is a principle of our social economy that the price shall be equal to the demand; and where so many are forced into competition, justice cannot be rendered. But we have said what we could, with deep and earnest feeling, and must leave, for a time, a subject so full of interest to us all, believing, with Fredrika Bremer, that—

"He who points out a new field for the employment of female industry ought to be regarded as a public benefactor; and any means by which such a field becomes accessible to woman, recommends itself to society as an important agent in the civilization of the future."

THE OCCULTATION OF A LIFE.

TO R— M'C— JR.

Another shrine is dim!
Another altar desolate: Another star
Hath passed into sublimer regions; seraphim
Enthroned around it are.

Another light hath died
From out the world, and left a waste of gloom;
And mourners weeping bitterly beside
A consecrated tomb.

Who shall breathe comfort now?
What music linger sweetly? Who that weaves
Garlands of blossoms for the bridal brow,
Shall braid the cypress leaves?

What sympathy can ope
The emptied chambers of a troubled heart,
And touch the Darkness with a wand of Hope,
And say to it: "Depart"

What words can cool the brain,
Or make the eyelids, heavy with their tears,
Lift up to drink the dawn of peace again
Which breaks through coming years?

Alas! we can but pray
That she who was so beautiful, and crowned
With all the elements of glory, may Extend her arms around,

And raise you up to her.
We feel, with you, the majesty of Woe,
And tread in awe her court-yards, holier,
Waiting our turn to go

Into her presence. All,
Aye, all have heard her summons, or must hear;
It may be blessings from her lips will fall,
Even beside the bier.

We strengthen in the trust,
That of this withering of the heart at morn—
This crumbling of our idols into dust,
A rapture will be born:

Far off, perchance, but sure;
For He who smiteth, loveth us; He sayeth,

And if in faith, the evil we endure,
We shall not taste of death.

Hark, and a voice will come
Far downward through the fathomless abyss
Of Heaven, to woo us sweetly to a home,
More beautiful than this;

And islands of the Night,
As we glide silently from shore to shore,
Entrance us with effulgency of light
That floats the darkness o'er.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

If girls would have roses in their cheeks, they must do as the roses do—go to sleep with the lilies, and get up with the morning-glories.

Few things are necessary for the wants of this life, but it takes an infinite number to satisfy the demands of opinion.

"Nothing," once said an old gentleman to us, "so much indicates the nature of a man's taste, as the style of the pictures which decorate the walls of his dwelling." "But," we inquired, "suppose he has no pictures?" "Then he has no taste!" quickly responded the sage.

"There's our Gershom," said Mr. Shelton, "he must go off to the city, to get his living by his wits!" "Well, how dim he make out?" asked a friend. "Ah!" said the old man, with a sigh, tapping his forehead significantly, "he failed for want of capital."

When Horne Tooke was called before the commissioners, to give an account of the particulars of his income; having answered a question which was asked, one of the wise men said, peevishly, that he did not understand his answer. "Then," said Tooke, "as you have not half the understanding of another man, you ought, at least, to have double the patience."

Dr. Johnson was asked by a lady what new work he was employed about. "I am writing nothing, just at present," he replied. "Well, but, doctor," said she, "if I could write like you, I should be always writing, merely for the pleasure of it." "Pray, madam," retorted he, "do you think that Leander swam across the Hellespont merely because he was fond of swimming?"

A lawyer was once pleading a case that brought tears into the jurors' eyes, and every one gave up the case as gone for the plaintiff. But the opposing counsel arose and said:—"May it please the court—I do not propose in this case to bore for water, but—." Here the tears were suddenly dried, laughter ensued, the ridiculousness of the case was exposed, and the defendant got clear.

We see it stated, in an English paper, that a man, in the vicinity of London, undertook, lately, for a bet of twenty-five dollars, to lay a gun upon the ground, throw a potato up, turn heels over head, pick up the gun, and hit the potato once out of five shots before it fell to the ground. He afterwards actually performed this feat, winning his bet the first shot.

INTERESTING FACTS IN SCIENCE.

The twenty-second meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, was held at Belfast during the first week in September. From the London Athenæum, and London Literary Gazette, we condense a number of interesting facts and items of scientific intelligence brought forward at this meeting: which we do, without regard to the order of their occurrence in the general proceedings of the Association, and in the language of the reports from which we quote: Sir David Brewster gave an account of a remarkable case of mirage in Radnorshire. Travellers in Switzerland observe not unfrequently their own shadows projected against the mists upon the mountains; but the peculiarity of the case described by Sir David, and what is extremely rare, is, that it is not a case of shadow but of reflection. A little girl saw her own image—her clothes with all their hues—painted against a cloud. She waved a victorine, and the image did the same, returning not only her motion, but also every color, with the utmost fidelity. Sir David also gave an account of a singular case of vision without retina. In mentioning the case, he said: ‘In the course of last summer I met with a gentleman who had a peculiarity of vision of a very remarkable kind, and one of which I believe there is no other example. While hunting he fell from his horse, and received such a severe blow upon his head, as to deprive him entirely of the sight of one eye, and to a great extent of the sight of the other. Neither of the eyes had suffered the slightest local injury from the blow, and, therefore, the total blindness in one eye, and the partial blindness in the other, arose from the insensibility of the retina, caused by the disorganization of the part of the brain more immediately connected with the origin of the optic nerves. The degree of vision which remained in one eye was such as to enable its possessor to recognize any friend at the distance of 400 or 500 yards, or more generally speaking, at a considerable distance; but in society he could not recognize his most intimate acquaintance. He could see only the eye or the mouth of his friend; and he was not able to obtain, from the duration of the impression of light, and the rapid transference of his eye from one feature to another, such a combination of the separate impressions, as to give the likeness which they composed.” In the case, as explained by Sir David, the retina was ineffective; the man saw with choroid, which at one small place—the foramen centrale—is uncovered by the retina. The minuteness of this space permitted only a small amount of light to be seen at a time.

Lord Rosse was present at the meeting, and exhibited diagrams of Nebulæ obtained by observations made with his immense telescope. In many cases these Nebulæ presented a vortical appearance, as if the mass had been twirling round in space, and thus became furnished with a number of spiral wings. This spiral figure was a prevailing character in most of the diagrams. Sometimes a star is observed in the centre of the Nebula, and the latter appears to recede a certain distance from the star, and to arrange itself symmetrically round the latter. In other cases the Nebula is coiled round the star, like an Archimedean spiral, till at length, reaching a certain limit, it is suddenly broken, and thrown, like a reflected sunbeam, in another direction.

A report was made by Dr. J. H. Gladstone, on the influence of the solar radiations on the vital powers of plants growing under different atmospheric conditions. As a preliminary matter of enquiry, he had tested the effect of colored media in accelerating or retarding the growth of various kinds of plants. Hyacinths were chosen as the sample of the bulbous-rooted plants. Roots of as nearly as possible the same size and description in every respect were grown under the various bell-glasses. Certain differences were described, both in the rootlets and the leaves, which might fairly be attributed to the character of the light; the time of flowering, and the flowers themselves, were not affected by it; and the greatest growth—(estimated quantitatively in each instance) took place in the plant exposed to all the rays of the solar spectrum: the next greatest was under the blue glass. Wheat was also grown in a similar manner; the method of arrangement of apparatus being minutely detailed, and the character of the corn-plants which appeared under the various glasses. Those under the yellow were the most sturdy in their growth; those under the blue the least healthy; whilst some grown under a nearly darkened shade grew quickly nine inches long, put forth no secondary leaves, and died in a month. Mallows were grown in a similar manner. The detailed observations were to much the same purport as in the preceding instance. Plants kept in an unchanged atmosphere appear to enter into a sort of lethargic condition; experiments were instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether the alteration in light produced by colored media made any marked variation in this matter. The pansy and the Poa annua were the plants selected; and comparative experiments were made with a darkened shade, and with no covering at all. The results were various,—but scarcely conclusive, unless in reference to the fact that plants survive much longer for being in unchanged air. The colorless and yellow media appeared most favorable to the healthiness of the plants.

An illusion, similar in character to the Fata Morgana seen in certain states of the atmosphere on and about the Straits of Messina in Italy, have, at various times, appeared on the northern coast of Ireland. Records of these appearances exist even prior to the twelfth century, and subsequent mention is frequently made of them. Mr. McFarland read an interesting paper on these Fata Morgana of Ireland, in which he mentions that, in June, 1833, himself and a party of friends, when standing on a rock at Portbalintra, perceived a small roundish island as if in the act of emerging from the deep, at a distance of a mile from the shore; at first, it appeared but as a green field, afterwards it became fringed with red, yellow and blue, whilst the forms of trees, men and cattle rose upon it, slowly and successively; and these continued for about a quarter of an hour, distinct in their outlines, shape and color; the figures, too, seemed to walk across it, or wandered among the trees, the ocean, bathed it around, the sun shone upon it from above; and all was as fresh, fair, and beautiful as a dream of Heaven, till the sward assumed a shadowy form, and its various objects, mingling into one confused whole, passed away as strangely as they came. Mr. McFarland considered that these various exhibitions of the Fata Morgana might all be accounted for by applying to those parts of the coast on which they had been displayed, the theories of Minasi, and M. Honel, as advanced by them in explanation of similar phenomena, seen on and about the Strait of Messina. The Northern Channel of Ireland presents, to a very great degree, the same data, as regards shape, indentations, currents, and bitumen as that strait does, and on which their theories rest; and he believed that, to some extent at least, so did the sea in the neighborhood of the Isles of Arran and town of Waterford. Where the Marine Morgana was found, the Aerial might be expected, and the Prismatic was a mere corollary to the first.

Sir David Brewster next read a paper "On the Form of Images produced by Lenses and Mirrors of different sizes." He showed that by using large lenses, photographers introduce parts into their pictures which should be totally unseen: an addition is made to the nose, chin, or other feature, which the eye cannot discern in the original; and from this sole cause arises almost all the hideousness and monstrosity of photographic pictures. Childhood is deprived of its smile, youth of its beauty, and the vigor of manhood is reduced to the decrepitude of quaking old age. The lens, instead of being three or four inches in diameter, as is usually the case, ought, strictly speaking, to be only two-tenths of an inch. Sir David exhibited an experiment, which was strikingly confirmative of his view.

Sir David also read a paper "On an Account of a Rock-Crystal Lens and Decomposing Glass found in Nineveh." Sir David said that he had to bring before the Section an object of so incredible a nature that nothing short of the strongest evidence was necessary to render the statement at all probable:—it was no less than the finding in the treasure-house at Nineveh of a rock-crystal lens, where it had for centuries lain entombed in the ruins of that once magnificent city. It was found in company with several bronzes and other objects of value. He had examined the lens with the greatest care and taken its several measurements. It was not entirely circular in its aperture, being 1 6-10ths inches in its longer diameter and 1 4-10ths inches in its shorter. Its general form was that of a plano-concave lens, the plane side having been formed of one of the original faces of the six-sided crystal of quartz, as he had ascertained by its action on polarized light,—this was badly polished and scratched. The convex face of the lens had not been ground in a dish-shaped tool in the manner in which lenses are now formed, but was shaped on a lapidary's wheel, or in some such manner. Hence it was unequally thick, but its extreme thickness was 2-10ths of an inch, its focal length being 4 1/2 inches. It had twelve remains of cavities which had originally contained liquids or condensed gases; but ten of those had been opened probably in the rough handling which it received in the act of being ground; most of them therefore had discharged their gaseous contents. Sir David concluded by assigning reasons why this could not be looked on as an ornament, but a true optical lens.

Sir David then exhibited specimens of the decomposed glass found in the same ruins. The surface of this was covered with iridescent spots more brilliant in their colors than Peacock copper ore. Sir David stated that he had several years since explained how this process of decomposition proceeded, on the occasion of having found a piece of decomposed glass at St. Leonard's. It had contained manganese, which had separated from the silice of the glass, at central spots round which circles of most minute crystals of true quartz had arranged themselves; bounded by irregular jagged circles of manganese, these being arranged in several concentric rings. When this process reached a certain depth in the glass it spread off laterally, dividing the glass into very thin layers, and new centres seemed to form at certain distances, and thus the process extended.

ANECDOTES OF ANIMALS.

PLAYFULNESS OF ANIMALS.—Deer often engage in a sham battle or a trial of strength, by twisting their horns together and pushing for the mastery. All animals that pretend violence in their play stop short of exercising it; the dog takes the greatest precaution not to injure by his bite; and the orang-outang, in wrestling with his keeper, attempts to throw him, and makes feints of biting him. Some animals carry out in their play the semblance of catching their prey; young cats, for instance, leap after small and moving objects, even to the leaves strewn by the autumn wind,—they crouch and steal forward ready for the spring; the body quivering and the tail vibrating with emotion, they bound on the moving leaf, and again watch, and again spring forward at another. Rengger saw young jaguars and cougars playing with round substances like kittens. Young lambs collect together on the little hillocks and eminences in their pastures, racing and sporting with each other in the most interesting manner. Birds of the pie kind are the analogues of monkeys, full of mischief, play and mimicry. There is told of a tame magpie, that it was seen busily employed in a garden gathering pebbles, and with much solemnity and a studious air dropping them in a hole about eighteen inches deep, made to receive a post. After dropping each stone, it cried "Currack!" triumphantly, and set off for another. On examining the spot, a poor toad was found in the hole, which the magpie was stoning for amusement.

INSTINCTS OF THE TIGER.—In a work entitled "Brown's Anecdotes," we see it stated that on a certain occasion, a party of gentlemen from Bombay, while visiting the stupendous cavern temple of Elephanta, discovered a tiger's whelp in one of the obscure recesses of the edifice. Desirous of kidnapping the cub, without encountering the fury of its dame, they took it up hastily and cautiously, and retreated. Being left entirely at liberty, and extremely well fed, the tiger grew rapidly, appeared tame and fondling as a dog, and in every respect entirely domesticated. At length, having attained a vast size, notwithstanding its apparent gentleness, it began to inspire terror by its tremendous powers of doing mischief to a piece of raw meat, dripping with blood, which fell in its way. It is to be observed that, up to that moment, it had been studiously kept from raw animal food. The instant, however, it dipped its tongue in blood, something like madness seemed to have seized the animal—a destructive principle, hitherto dormant, was awakened—it darted fiercely, and with glaring eyes upon its prey, tore it with fury to pieces, and, growling and roaring in the most fearful manner, rushed off towards the jungles.

INSTINCT OF BEES.—Bees revisit their old haunts, the trees and the flowers where they have been used to find honey; they recognise their own hive among many others, returning to it in their homeward flight in a direct line, and never hesitating between it and the surrounding ones. It is highly remarkable that they know their own hive more from its locality than from its appearance, for if it be removed during their absence, and a similar one be substituted, they enter the strange one. If the position of the hive be changed, the bees for the first day take distant flight till they have thoroughly scrutinized every object in its neighborhood; and it is asserted by Kirby and Spence, that the queen-bee does the same thing, making several probationary flights before the swarming of the hive, as if to select the proper spot. They also mention the circumstance of a number of bees having been attracted in the autumn to some honey which had been placed in a window, and of their visiting the same spot, in the ensuing spring, in search of it again. The mason-bee contrives holes as receptacles for its young, in which it lays up their food; and if a hole be closed up during its absence, it searches for some time along the wall, after its return, without noticing other holes, and having found it, it removes the obstruction and continues its work: a clear proof that these bees distinguish between their own holes and those of others. * * * Bees are remarkable for the cleanliness of their dwellings: they are extremely solicitous to remove such insects or foreign bodies as happen to get admission into their hive. When so light as not to exceed their powers, they first kill the insect with their stings, and then drag it out with their jaws. But it sometimes happens that an ill-fated snail creeps into the hive; this is no sooner perceived than it is attacked on all sides, and stung to death. But to attempt to carry out so heavy a burden would be labor in vain; and, therefore, to prevent the noxious smell which would arise from its putrefaction, they immediately embalm it, by covering every part of its body with propolis, through which no effluvia can escape. When a snail with a shell gets entrance, the disposal of it gives much less trouble and expense to bees. As soon as it receives the first wound from a sting, it naturally retires into its shell. In this case, the bees, instead of pasting it all over with propolis, content themselves with gluing all round the margin of the shell, which is sufficient to render the animal forever immovably fixed.

THE ELECTRIC EEL.—The gymnotus, or electric eel, is a tremendous assailant, both of the inhabitants of its own element, and even of large quadrupeds, and of man himself, if he puts himself in its way. Its force is said to be ten times greater than that of the torpedo. This animal is a native of South America. In the immense plains of the Llanos, in the province of Caraccas, is a city called Calabozo, in the vicinity of which these eels abound in small streams, inasmuch that a road, formerly much frequented, was abandoned on account of them, it being necessary to cross a rivulet, in which many mules were annually lost in consequence of their attacks. They are also extremely common in every pond, from the equator to the ninth degree of north latitude.

Humboldt gives a very spirited account of the manner of taking this animal, which is done by compelling twenty or thirty wild horses and mules to take the water. The Indians surround the basin into which they are driven, armed with long canes or harpoons; some mount the trees whose branches hang over the water, all endeavoring, by their cries and instruments, to keep the horses from escaping. For a long time, the victory seems doubtful, or to incline to the fishes. The mules, disabled by the frequency and force of the shocks, disappear under the water; and some horses, in spite of the active vigilance of the Indians, gain the banks, and, overcome by fatigue and benumbed by the shocks they have encountered, stretch themselves at their length on the ground.

There could not, says Humboldt, be a finer subject for a painter: groups of Indians surrounding the basin; the horses, with their hair on end, endeavoring to escape the tempest that has overtaken them; the eels, yellowish and livid, looking like great aquatic serpents, swimming on the surface of the water, in pursuit of their enemy.

In a few minutes, two horses were already drowned: the eel, more than five feet long, gliding under the belly of the horse or mule, made a discharge of its electric battery on the whole extent, attacking at the same instant the heart and the viscera. The animals, stupefied by these repeated shocks, fall into a profound lethargy, and, deprived of all sense, sink under the water, when, the other horses and mules passing over their bodies, they are soon drowned. The gymnoti, having thus discharged their accumulation of the electric fluid, now become harmless, and are no longer dreaded. Swimming half out of the water, they flee from the horses instead of attacking them; and if they enter it the day after the battle, they are not molested, for these fishes require repose and plenty of food to enable them to accumulate a sufficient supply of their galvanic electricity.

Recreation is only valuable as it unbends us. The idle know nothing of it. It is exertion that renders rest delightful, and sleep sweet and undisturbed.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

There is, at the present time, among certain American writers, who are gifted with rare abilities, a tendency to use their fine powers in the mere anatomizing of morbid states of mind, or in the creation of human monstrosities. The appearance of their books is hailed by a class of critics, who judge of a work more by its intellectual skill than its usefulness, in terms of extravagant laudation, thus encouraging these authors to explore the still profounder depths of a morbid imagination, and enticing other writers into literary efforts of the same gloomy and unprofitable character.

In reading current criticisms on the various books teeming from the prolific press of our country, few think of the personal characters, or professed principles, of those who write them—too rarely, nothing whatever is known as to the authorship of a criticism—or reflect upon the bias which these may give to the judgment! In too many cases, the more intellectually discriminating critical writers judge of a book by the mental power it displays, and lose sight, almost altogether, of its ability to make the reader wiser and better; and, what is still worse, these critics, in too many instances, speak lightly, coldly, and often with covert condemnation of books written with the high purpose of doing good, and with an honest truth to nature, because the authors have not the morbid, we might almost say insane, strength and wild, unnatural beauty of the favorites they hold up to public admiration. Better for the world would it be, if they justly condemned the perversion of power in the one, and encouraged and fostered, by fair, but strengthening criticism, the other.

Above all things, we want a healthy, life-like, progressive literature; and, to gain this, we need a stimulating criticism far different from anything that has yet been vouchsafed by those who have assumed the high office of passing judgment upon our literary men and women.

In literature, as in architecture, what we most need are fitting habitations in which mind and heart can dwell with all their healthy thoughts and social and home affections; not elaborate edifices, built to display the artist's wonderful abilities, that, within, contain no pleasant apartments, nor sweet resting places; but sombre arches, gloomy and vaulted chambers, where no warm sunlight finds its way, and never-ending passages, among the intricacies of which we go wearily and faint with the close and stifling atmosphere. But such is not the literature fostered by the critical dogmatists, and their imitators of the present time. A few are bold enough to dissent, and to ask, "What good is there in all this?" but their voice is scarcely heard.

To be a good critic, a man must be wise and good. He must be so far a lover of his fellow men as to regard their well-being. He must not only be able, from his cultivated taste, to see the evidences of skill and power in an author; but he must be so far a man as to decide, at once, how far the author, in his performance, has been true to humanity. Other criticism we have, in plenty. Right gladly will the public hail the juster, the better order to which we have referred.

Grace Greenwood met, incidentally, with the author of "Alton Locke," and thus mentions him briefly, in one of her letters to the National Era: "While lingering there, I observed Lord Carlisle greet, with much cordiality, a slight, pale, refined, clerical-looking man, who stood near us. After a few moments' conversation, his lordship introduced this gentleman to me as the Rev. Charles Kingsley, author of 'Alton Locke.' I did not meet him without emotion; for I had been most deeply impressed by the power and purpose, the terrible earnestness of his writings—the heart-crushing pathos, the fearful vividness of his pictures of misery, of the mortal desperation of the struggle of the poor with want and wretchedness, and all the horrible shapes of sin and despair. You see few indications of the impassioned strength of Mr. Kingsley's genius in his countenance or conversation. He is quiet in the extreme, even while talking of art, like an artist and a poet. I should think his mental life inwardly intense, rather than outwardly demonstrative, except through the pen. He spoke of America with much interest, and with fine appreciation of the spirit of her institutions."

How often is respectable and promising mediocrity robbed of its power and usefulness, by unsought comparisons with superior ability? Unjustly are young authors, artists and performers condemned, censured, or their true merit slurred over by unwise or ill-natured critics, because they are not equal to some brilliant genius who is all ablaze before the world. Gifts are various, and all have their appropriate use. When a man does the best he can, according to his natural ability, let his merit be acknowledged as far as it goes. To condemn or insult him because he does not possess another man's talents, indicates either great weakness or exceeding ill-nature. Perhaps singers and musical performers suffer in this particular way as much as any others; and we are pleased to see, in a London periodical, a well-expressed plea for musical mediocrity, a part of which we extract:—"Mediocrity has its uses, and is not to be indiscriminately crushed. If the friends of Miss A. declare her singing of 'Ah, non giunge,' at her concert, was remarkable, it was not at all necessary that the critics should inform the public that the lady, here called Miss A., is not Jenny Lind. The public know that right well; and they understand the word 'remarkable,' as applied to Miss A.'s performance, in a sense perfectly different from the same word when applied to Giulia Grisi or Madame Castellan. And Miss A. herself, however she may feel herself flattered by such applausive epithets, will hardly think of coming out, upon the strength of them, in the arduous character of the heroine of the Somnambula."

Yet, all this notwithstanding, Miss A. is really the centre of a small circle, in the midst of which she performs a function by no means unimportant.

"However it may be with science, it should be recollected that elegant art has always thriven most under the fostering sunshine of favor and patronage. The highest talent requires success for its full development. Genius, as Prince Albert reminded the artists assembled at the last anniversary festival of the Royal Academy, 'is a tender plant, which will thrive only in an atmosphere of kindness—kindness towards the artist personally as well as towards his production':—a sentiment wearing a positive artistic beauty in the princely mouth from which it emanated. It is not, as we said, an incontrovertible truth that mediocrity should be extirpated. Is it not out of the level plain that the mountain rises? and we all remember the pleasant mistake which the Edinburgh Reviewers made about Lord Byron."

The cutting-up, fault-finding, captious spirit indulged in by certain critical writers for the press, who look at the performances of others in order to search out defects instead of merits, is very properly rebuked in the following extract:—"Criticism is mostly held in esteem in proportion as the critic is severe and inflexible. The literary charioteer is accounted to be a good driver in proportion as he lashes the animals subjected to his mercy. Let us, however, bear in mind that truth and ill-nature are not precisely the same quality. An allegation is not true, simply because it is defamatory. Let any one look carefully round upon the proceedings of his acquaintance, and we will find that a greater amount of falsehood originates in splenetic ill-humor, even than results from polite flattery so proverbially insincere. If a man be determined to enlighten his neighbors on the subject of another's demerits, he seldom allows his resolution to be restrained by so feeble a barrier—so metaphysical a limit—as truth: and, we suppose, the same may hold of written and printed criticisms on the works of others. A 'cutting-up,' as it is technically called, is no doubt a very good thing in its way; but it is not to be considered honest only because it is a cutting-up. It is, at any rate, a very unamiable thing; and when it comes itself to be cut-up, it often turns out to be as foul as it is ill-favored."

Some weeks since, the Saturday Evening Post had the following editorial paragraph: "We recently noticed in the daily papers some resolutions in honor of three boys who died during the vacation. One of those boys we frequently met last winter in the Germantown cars, carrying a heavy load of school books. His face interested us much—fine and intellectual, but sadly pale. We feared then that he was studying beyond his strength; and we should not be at all surprised if a proper verdict in his case, as in that of various others, would be:—Died of the High School."

The Boston Olive Branch copies the above, and then remarks thereon:

"There was a beautiful child in one of our villages. A more brilliant scholar was never known. 'Give me books, give me books,' was his constant and eager cry, and his parents paraded him before admiring company, as parents too often do. They sent him early to the best school in the State, and attributed his thin face and delicate figure, to 'growing;' he grew, it was true, too fast. At sixteen he was laid in the family vault, at Cambridge; 'he was never well,' said his sorrowing parents. He never had the chance to be; he died of High School.

"How many sweet young creatures have we known, growing up into the fairest promise, who have 'died of High School.' And the victims increase; studies that should never be attempted, till the age of thirty, are thrust upon poor pale girls of twelve and fourteen—and ambition is the goad that urges them to their death.

"Parents be careful that your beloved ones do not die of High School."

There is matter for thought in this; and parents who have bright, but pale and studious boys, should ponder the subject well. Of what value is a brilliant education, if health is destroyed thereby? Of what avail will be a full mind, if there is not a strong body, in manhood, to sustain its activity? But, we by no means call the forcing system adopted in most of our public and noted private schools, by the word, education. The mere crowding of the memory with a jostling variety of facts and theories cannot strengthen the mind: cannot give the habit of concentration, nor that confidence in its own powers which inspires the will, and overcomes difficulties.

We published an article last month on the education of girls, from the pen of Elizabeth Blackwell, M. D. That article contains a paragraph that bears with such force on the subject to which we now refer, that we re-print it, and call to it the especial attention of parents and teachers:—

"There is no end to the list of 'English branches,' which the child has to 'go through' during the few years of school training: the enumeration would have frightened our most studious ancestors; they did not understand what is meant by 'going through the English branches;' they in their simplicity supposed that there was some use attached to every study—that it must be acquired thoroughly, and be made either a means of mental discipline, or an object of investigation and discovery. But it would puzzle the most ingenious observer to discover the good use of most of our children's studies. If the object be mental discipline, there is no surer way of defeating such an object, than to attempt to give the mind a superficial view of a subject too difficult for it to grasp—to confuse it with a multitude of disconnected studies—to hurry it from subject to subject, so that the simple studies, more suited to the young mind, are imperfectly acquired, and soon forgotten. Thus the greater part of the time devoted to the so-called cultivation of the intellect is really wasted: and it is no uncommon thing to find the young girl who has gone through all the English branches, quite unable to write a lady-like note, or read aloud a single page with right emphasis, ease and accuracy.

"How can it be otherwise, when the young mind has to apply itself, during the limited term of school-study, to such a list of subjects as the following: Grammar, Ancient and Modern History, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Botany, Astronomy, Mental and Moral Philosophy, Physiology, Rhetoric, Composition, Elocution, Logic, Algebra, Geometry, Belles-Lettres."

What an appalling list of studies for tender childhood and youth! What reasonable person can contemplate it, and not feel an overpowering conviction of the injustice to children involved in our present systems of education!

"To-day," writes Grace Greenwood in her interesting letters to the National Era, "I have made a devout pilgrimage to the grave of Milton, in the parish church of Cripplegate. The spot where the divine poet sleeps the sleep of the blessed is marked alone by a fine bust and a small tablet—pews are built over the vault which I do not like; for Milton's grave is too sacred, even to be knelt upon by strangers, and the inconsiderate, it may be, in mechanical obedience to a mere religious form.

"This is a quaint, shadowed, old church, where at night one would step softly, in breathless awe, and listen, half-hoping to hear angels chanting solemn anthems over the dust of him who so grandly told the wondrous story of creation, of the fall and redemption of man, and who sung God's praise in such high, seraphic strains.

"In this church Oliver Cromwell was married. Who ever thinks of the stern Puritan leader as a lover? And yet, such grand, craggy natures as his have often the peaceablest, most sheltered nestling places for the gentlest human affections. I doubt not he felt for his young bride a deep and manly devotion; and that he dearly loved at least one of his daughters, we have pathetic evidence in the history of his last sad days."

It is to be hoped that a better spirit in regard to the treatment of candidates for office will, ere long, prevail in this country. The present wretched system of abuse has been carried quite far enough. We were pleased, a few evenings since, in passing by a rostrum from which a political speaker was haranguing a crowd, to hear the orator strongly condemn this abuse of candidates, and call upon the members of his party present to set their faces against it. The candidates for office on both sides, he said, were good and true men, and it was false, and a high outrage, to allege anything different. This is a better doctrine, a more worthy spirit; and until it becomes the spirit of party, we cannot hope to have our best men stand forth as candidates for office. Hear what General Cass says on this subject. The extract is from one of his speeches in the United States Senate:—"I speak, perhaps, with the more warmth on this subject, because I have had some experience, and I believe that in the whole catalogue of human enormities you can scarcely find a single crime that was not charged to me in 1848, except, perhaps, the murder of my wife and children; and if Providence, in its wrath, had taken them from me, I verily believe that I should have been charged with their murder; and I have just as little doubt that a large portion of the Whig party would have believed the story. Sir, I bore it well, I think quite philosophically; but no man can bear such charges with total indifference. Why, if Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, were here, it would try his patience to be subject to such aspersions. I think, if I had gone through some portions of this country in that year, many a good Whig would have peeped out from safe covert, seeking to discover my horns and hoofs, firm in the conviction that if I were not the archfiend himself, I stood pretty high in his conclave, and was one of his fittest associates."

Referring to some anecdotes of birds, published in the October number of the Home Magazine, a correspondent at Deep River, Conn., writes:—"Anecdotes of Birds remind me of a statement made to me some three years ago, and confirmed about a month since, by Mr. Ezra Bull, of Saybrook. In 1827 he attached a skull of a horse to an out-building, when some wrens soon took possession of it, and raised two broods of young, each year, for three years in succession. He then moved some four miles, and took the skull with him (in the winter.) In the spring some wrens, apparently the same family, took possession, and have occupied it regularly for twenty-two years, raising two broods of young annually, averaging six birds to each brood."

A correspondent, who sends us a poem, full of good promise, as to what the author will in the end achieve, speaks thus hopefully. We like his spirit, and say to him, work and wait. There is a future of success to all who labor diligently in the present: "If Fame has any gift for me, it is in the future's keeping. I will cheer the hour with song as best I may, and bide my time. I am still on the sunny slope of life, with a strong hand and a willing heart. My only schooling has been the discipline of misfortune, and the hard bulleting with the rude world. Yet, often, in the want of outward culture, will the mind find gain of inner development; and, from sore conflict with grosser natures, be evolved the inspiration of heaven-born sympathies."

Sensible people cannot but feel amused while reading some of the dogmatic criticisms on musical artists of the highest ability, which appear in certain daily, weekly and monthly publications. Referring to this, a musical writer says, with exceeding pertinency:—"The only objection we can see to criticisms of this nature is, that it seems a little absurd for a scribe, perhaps without name or character, to think of setting right an artist of high fame, and to assume a judicial irresponsibility in doing so. Are great artists often the wiser for the very profound suggestions which issue from the anonymous tribunal?"

That the happiness of life depends on the regular prosecution of some laudable purpose or calling, which engages, helps, and enlivens all our powers, let those bear witness, who, after spending years in active usefulness, retire to enjoy themselves.

HEROIC WOMEN OF THE OLDEN DAY.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

CHARLOTTE DE LA TREMOUILLE,
COUNTESS OF DERBY.

The Countess of Derby may well be pronounced one of the noblest, greatest, and most heroical women that England or the world ever has produced. I write England advisedly, for, although she was a Frenchwoman by birth, and that of the very highest rank short of royalty—being a daughter of the princely house of La Tremouille, it was still in England that all her great exploits were performed—all her extraordinary qualities displayed; and as she was married in very early youth to the gallant and noble Derby, nearly, indeed, at the same period when his royal master, Charles I., espoused the beautiful daughter of the last hero-king of France, Henry, the Bearnois of Navarre, it is not unnatural to conclude, that it was in her adopted, rather than her native country, that she learned those lessons of strong persistency, cool endurance, and patient fortitude, which would appear in all ages to have been characteristic rather of the English than of the French temper, which is generally held to be conspicuous for impulsive gallantry and offensive valor, rather than for perseverance under the pressure of evil or iron sufferance of inevitable calamity.

Still, heroism is of no age or country—although there may be peculiar shades or hues which appear to belong to the attributes, and to constitute, as it were, almost general traits of national character. Even in this view, however, there are discrepancies to be noted by the wise observer, which quickly show the injudiciousness of those who, from general traits, would seek to establish absolute principles, or to constitute individual actions the basis of invariable laws.

Thus, in spite of the generally prevailing notion that the French, however admirable at attack, are greatly inferior in the defence of fortified places, the most wonderful instance of endurance, under horrors of famine, pestilence, and exhaustion almost unparalleled, recorded in modern history, is the protracted resistance of Massena within the walls of Genoa, against the combined armies of Austria and fleets of England, by which, in point of fact, he neutralized all the successes of the victors, and converted defeat into triumph, by holding out until the French columns had already crossed the Alps, and thus making possible the almost miraculous campaign of Marengo.

VOL. I.—No. 3.

Again, it was Charlotte de la Tremouille, who, with unparalleled feminine heroism, defended Latham House long after hope had been extinct in the hearts of the bravest of its masculine defenders, while her Lord was fighting afar off for his church and his king—who, a second time, after the noble head of Derby had fallen on the gory scaffold, last token of his adherence to that holy cause which he could uphold no longer, defended the Peel Castle in her hereditary realm of Man, fighting for the rights of her son, and the hereditary dignities of his race, long after the weak unworthy monarch, Charles II., had departed a fugitive from his kingdom—and who so earned the noble praise of being the last person in all the territories, provinces, dependencies, of Great Britain, who laid down arms which she had taken up for the rights, and which she resigned only—she the sovereign of a mere mimic realm almost within gunshot of the shores of England—after Virginia, the Bermudas, Antigua and Barbadoes had submitted to the Parliament; after the sister islands of the Channel, Scilly and Guernsey had surrendered, and the narrow seas were swept far and nigh, cutting off all supplies, and prohibiting all egress or ingress to her island fortalice, by the unrivalled fleets of Blake.

Equally heroical with that heroine of all time, the Maid of Arc, her heroism was yet of a character entirely different and distinct. The character of the latter was essentially French—French of all ages—though modified assuredly by the peculiar influences of her own era—deeply imbued with romance—full of impulsive fire, burning with generous ardor, deeply imbued with the sensibility to the call of glory, kindled at a word to the wildest enthusiasm, not unresponsive to the breath of superstitious fatalism, yet despondent when held inactive, and recovering her high courage and unflinching heroism only when actually called upon to do or to suffer.

Widely different was the noble Charlotte de la Tremouille—for of her it might have been said, as it is said of the greatest man of the present day, that duty was everything and glory nothing, except indorsed as it arose incidentally from the consequence of duty done. Not in the slightest degree touched by romance as to her own secret nature, although the history of her career is, in itself, the wildest of romances—scarcely, if at all, influenced by impulses—a person of slender imagination and few sensibilities—superior to all superstitions—superior also to all reverses of fortune, she was greater by far in suffering than in acting—and it was rather by supporting with unmoved constancy what her enemy did unto her, than by doing unto them what they might not have half so hardly supported, that she earned her undying fame and spotless reputation.

It is said, that in her younger days she was remarkable for delicate and extraordinary beauty; if it were so, anxiety and a life harder and exposed to vicissitudes more man-like than are wont to break the calm tenor of female ways, early destroyed all its vestiges; for in the magnificent painting of Vandyke, which still exists, as do those of most others of the celebrated ladies of her day, she is represented as a stout and somewhat coarse-featured matron, of middle age, richly attired, but possessing none of that refined and gentle haughtiness—if I may so express myself—which we somehow or other expect to see in the carriage and lineaments of those who, themselves great, have mingled much in the society of the great, and yet more who have themselves been the doers of great actions.

There is none of this haughtiness, or dignity, then, call it which you will, in the air or features of Charlotte de la Tremouille; nor is there any marked impress on her brow and lip either of deep thought and high intellect, or of brilliancy, daring and courage almost superhuman. On the contrary, she has the air of a genuine country matron of high class, in her own age; something, one would think, of a lady Bountiful; apt at distilling simples and dispensing medicines to the ailing, good things to the hungry of her tenantry and neighbors—yet this was she, who for two successive kings of England did more, held more, suffered more and lost more, than any other woman who ever drew the breath of life—who, after the death of one monarch on the scaffold, and the despairing exile of another, for whom her noble lord had died devoted, endured the utmost of persecution from the cruel and victorious Parliament—who, after the restoration of that monarch's worthless son, endured yet more from his base ingratitude than she had done from the rancor of his enemies, herself coming nigh to perishing on the same scaffold which had drunk her husband's gore, charged by the perjured monster Oates, with participation in that Papish plot, which never had an existence without the brain of that most mean and odious of all murderers.

Early in the war of the Commonwealth and the King, that war through the furnace and fierce ordeal of which, through so much misery to the kings, the nobles, and the people of England, was wrought out at last the wonderful edifice of her present constitution, with all its inestimable blessings—that constitution, which alone possessing the power of self-modification, can be progressive without being iconoclastic or destructive, can undergo change without fear of revolution, and therefore bids fair to be coeval with the chalk cliffs which wall its empire. Early in that war, or rather, I should say, at its very commencement, the Earl of Derby had taken arms for his sovereign, believing it wiser to trust to the king, whose prerogatives were already strictly limited, whose leaning toward absolutism might be supposed to be, in a great measure, checked, and to whose encroachments all constitutional means of resistance existed, in full force, or rather reinforced and greatly strengthened by the passage of the bill of rights, and the adoption of the general remonstrance—than to submit to the self-constituted authority of the Parliament, now evidently bent on wresting everything beyond the bare name of regal power from the almost helpless monarch, whose proceedings had no limit save their own consciences and their own will; and whose violence and outrage, the kingly power once gone, and the ministers of the law merely their own creatures, there was no means in the kingdom constituted for disputing legally or resisting forcibly.

Steadfastly, gallantly, he had fought to the last—nor less nobly had his Countess contended, as all men know—for the defence of Latham House is history—and there are few to whom its details are not facts, as it were, of every day allusion. How she held out alone, with her lord afar, not fighting unwomanly with the sword, not donning the attire or buckling on the armor of a man—for heroine as she was, she saw the indelicacy and inutility alike of such procedure—but aiding, assisting, comforting, inspiring all, by the unmoved composure of her noble face, by the unvarying and placid smile with which she received all evil tidings; with which she endured all personal inconveniences and sufferings—including toward the end the want of common necessities, of bread and water to support human life. Limiting her own table to the quantity and quality allotted to the meanest sentinel; braving the hottest fire of the assailants to carry refreshments to the weary, assistance to the wounded, of the combatants; nay! as defender after defender, fell slain outright or sorely wounded at his appointed station, carrying arms and ammunition, clad in her full magnificence of court attire, to any member, as they failed him, of that weak, yet invincible garrison; and in that last assault, when the ladders were reared against every bartizan and buttress, when the volleying death-shots raked every embrasure and window, when the clash and clang of broadsword on cuirass and helmet were mingled with the roar of the culverins, the sharp rattle of the musketry, and savage shouts and execrations of her combatants, standing with her maidens side by side with their defenders, and loading musketoon and harquebuss as fast as they might fire them, until all was ended.

Vainly, however, fought the Earl in the field, vainly the Countess in her guarded fortalice—for the good cause might not prevail, until England should have supped deeper yet on horrors, and her king should have bowed down that "gray discrowned head," erewhile so fair and noble, to the base felon's block. If Charles lost kingdom, crown, and life, Derby and his young wife lost all they had in England, princely estates, high rank, wealth almost royal, title most exalted—all was gone save the feudal royalty of the little Isle of Man; save the lives which both had risked so freely, one scarce had thought they valued them.

And even these they held, not as their own possessions, but as things to be devoted to the cause, to be cast self-sacrificed to the winds of Heaven, so soon as the service of the king should desire it.

So for the time all was over. Hopton, the king's best leader in the west, was defeated, and his army utterly dispersed at Torrington by Fairfax. Montrose was hors du combat deprived of all his men by the decisive route of Philipbaugh—and Astley—gallant Astley—who, before the first encounter of the Cavaliers and Roundheads at Edgehill, knelt at the head of his lines, and prayed this short prayer memorable through all time: "O Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me!" and then springing to his charger cried, "March on, boys!" and led a charge so fiery and so well sustained, that it won the day. That same Lord Astley, defeated at Stowe by Morgan, with superior forces, and himself made prisoner, said to the Parliamentarians, "You have done your work, and may now go to play, unless you choose to fall out among yourselves!"

And in truth their work was done—and their cruel play was about to commence, which had for stakes the fortunes of a country, and the life of a king.

In the short insurrection which broke out, when the tidings were proclaimed how that the Parliament had determined to try the king by a high court of justice, and to bring him, whom they dared not murder, to the block, Derby bore no part. Ill-planned, uncombined, irregular, it had neither concert, nor the chances of success—it could be fatal only to its projectors, and fatal to them it was—for after it was shed on the scaffold the first blood that flowed during the war, save by the sword, flagrante bello, when sword was met by sword—the blood of Lisle and Lucas and Lord Capel shamefully slaughtered—Cromwell's first deed of cruelty and shame—in spite of capitulation after Colchester.

So far from that insurrection deferring, or tending to prevent, it accelerated only the murder of the king, by harassing the apprehensions, without alarming the fears of the Parliamentarians. But, as I have said, in it Derby bore no part, it was too suddenly concerted to permit him to be present, even if his military sagacity and clear political foresight would have permitted him to join so rash a rising.

But he was in no condition to have done so in any event, for so soon as he saw that for the present all was lost, he made good his retreat, rather than his escape, with his Countess, her son, and the trustiest of his adherents, to the strong walls and castles of his island kingdom, which he put in order at once to make the most vigorous defence of his own rights, and to wage war for his own crown of Man, and for that of his brother, king of England.*

Treton, meanwhile, who commanded in the north for the Parliament, and had a strong force afoot in Lancashire, sent him a trumpet, with a summons to surrender on good conditions, to whom the Earl returned this answer of high and stern defiance:

"I received your letter with indignation, and with scorn return you this answer, that I cannot but wonder whence you gather any hopes that I should prove, like you, treacherous to my sovereign; since you cannot be ignorant of my former actions in his late majesty's service, from which principles of loyalty I am no whit departed. I scorn your proffers: I disdain your favor; I abhor your treason; and am so far from delivering up this island to your advantage, that I shall keep it to the utmost of my power for your destruction. Take this for your final answer, and forbear any further solicitations; for if you trouble me with any more messages of this nature, I will burn the paper, and hang up the messenger. This is the immutable resolution, and shall be the undoubted practice of him who accounts it his chiefest glory to be his majesty's most loyal and obedient subject."

"DERBY."

Scarce had these stirring and memorable lines flowed from the pen of the brave and noble cavalier, before he was again called to prove in the field that indomitable loyalty, for which his race was so nobly conspicuous.

The Second Charles, proclaimed by his Scottish subjects, who had revolted against the grim intolerance and fanaticism of the Independents, had remained well nigh two years in their camp, rather indeed as a prisoner than a king, but had still in spite of the fatal defeat at Dunbar maintained his position as monarch, and kept up his own hopes and those of his well-wishers, of one day recovering his English crown. And now, at length, had the day arrived. Profiting by a false movement of Cromwell, who, being pressed for supplies, was compelled to leave the way into England open to the Scots, he rushed down, high of hope, into the centre of his native realm, trusting to rally on himself all the stout cavaliers of the northern and the midland counties, and by a daring stroke to master the metropolis before Oliver could retrace his steps, or come up with his rear.

But little knew he of the giant with whom he had to do.

Rapidly he marched southward, but tardily and feebly came in the levies of the cavaliers. Defeat and death had thinned their numbers, had tamed their high, hot blood, had rendered them, although brave as ever, hopeless and averse to further struggles. Sequestrations and confiscations had narrowed their resources, their plate, their silver candlesticks, and posset dishes had been melted down in the late king's service; their trusty war horses were dead or aged; their gallant sons were dead on the field or on the scaffold; their brave tenants were decimated, and the survivors given to other masters. Never have men so fought, so bled, so suffered for any cause or king, as have the cavaliers of England for that most lamentable and disastrous house of Stuart—never have men met with such ingratitude.

Levies and men came in slowly—but at the first trumpet call, the foot of Derby was in the stirrup, the blue scarf of the king upon his breast, the

*It must be borne in mind that this was not a mere ceremonial or nominal title; but that this Countess of Derby was received by Charles II. as notre tres chere et tres puissant seur, Reine de Man et Contesse de Derby—and that it is only within the memory of persons now alive, that the feudal title of kings of Man was extinguished by its cession to the crown of England, by the then Earl of Derby.

king's black feather in his hat—he left his castle to the keeping of his noble wife, and as he kissed her proud fair brow at parting, "It may be," he said, "that we shall meet no more on earth, but we shall meet in Heaven! Mourn not for me, therefore, Charlotte, if I fall, but be strong and brave in duty."

And she replied, "Do but your duty, and I will not mourn, save in the secret heart; and when you are saint in Heaven, look you down on us, and see if I do not mine."

His race was soon run, and his days numbered. His small detachment cut off and overpowered at Wigan Lane, he still made good his way to Worcester, and fought there the last desperate fight for Charles—nor when that day was lost, stern Cromwell's crowning mercy, did he desert his king, but saw him placed in safety, before he thought, too late, of his own preservation,

A skirmish, a prisoner—a court martial, a convicted culprit—a block and a martyr—that was the last of Derby.

She heard, but wept not, nor despaired, but did her duty, mourning in the secrecy of her heart only.

Until not one English flag, save of the commonwealth alone was flying, she held out her island fortalice, and so stern had been her defence, so great was their fear of her desperation, that the Parliament, on the surrender of her strongholds and her submission to their usurping government, permitted her to retain her estates, and enjoy their revenues, and she dwelt there, educating her orphan son, as such a mother only can educate a man; adored by her islanders, respected by Englishmen in general, and unmolested, if unreverenced by the Parliamentary chiefs, until the restoration of King Charles II. renewed her persecutions, and perhaps brought her nearer to the block than the worst enmity of his enemies.

She escaped all the perils of the Pretended Plot, bore all her sufferings to the last, as she had borne the first; returned to her island home, not the least instance of the ingratitude of kings, lived in perpetual weeds for her lost lords—and died a good wife, a good mother, a good mistress, a good subject—truly a heroine of all time, and conspicuous on the page of history, as the last lady that has levied war, or that shall levy war again forever within the kingdoms of Great Britain.

There was a certain dignity about the person of Louis XIV. which awed those who for the first time came into his presence. An old officer who had come to court for the purpose of soliciting some favor from the king became embarrassed and hesitated in his speech. Being unable to finish his address, he said in conclusion, "Sire, I am not accustomed to tremble thus before your enemies." It is unnecessary to add that he obtained his request without further difficulty.

Experience, which tells us many a home truth, and which disabuses the most romantic of their dearest prejudices, leaves no doubt that clerical despotism is quite as bad as military or any other despotism.

THE WHIRLWIND.

FROM "ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH," BY MRS. MOODIE.

The 19th of August came, and our little harvest was all safely housed. Business called Moodie away for a few days to Cobourg. Jenny had gone to Dummer, to visit her friends, and J. E—— had taken a grist of the new wheat, which he and Moodie had threshed the day before, to the mill. I was consequently left alone with the children, and had a double portion of work to do. During their absence it was my lot to witness the most awful storm I ever beheld, and a vivid recollection of its terrors was permanently fixed upon my memory.

The weather had been intensely hot during the three preceding days, although the sun was entirely obscured by a bluish haze, which seemed to render the unusual heat of the atmosphere more oppressive. Not a breath of air stirred the vast forest, and the waters of the lake assumed a leaden hue. After passing a sleepless night, I arose, a little after daybreak, to superintend my domestic affairs. E—— took his breakfast, and went off to the mill, hoping that the rain would keep off until after his return.

"It is no joke," he said, "being upon these lakes in a small canoe, heavily laden, in a storm."

Before the sun rose, the heavens were covered with hard-looking clouds, of a deep blue and black cast, fading away to white at their edges, and in form, resembling the long, rolling waves of a heavy sea—but with this difference, that the clouds were perfectly motionless, piled in long curved lines, one above the other, and so remained until four o'clock in the afternoon. The appearance of these clouds, as the sun rose above the horizon, was the most splendid that can be imagined, tinged up to the zenith with every shade of saffron, gold, rose color, scarlet and crimson, fading away into the deepest violet. Never did the storm-fiend shake in the face of day a more gorgeous banner; and, pressed as I was for time, I stood gazing, like one entranced, upon the magnificent pageant.

As the day advanced, the same blue haze obscured the sun, which frowned redly through his misty veil. At ten o'clock the heat was suffocating, and I extinguished the fire in the cooking-stove, determined to make our meals upon bread and milk, rather than add to the oppressive heat. The thermometer, in the shade, ranged from ninety-six to ninety-eight degrees, and I gave over my work and retired with the little ones to the coolest part of the house. The young creatures stretched themselves upon the floor, unable to jump about or play; the dog lay panting in the shade; the fowls half buried themselves in the dust, with open beaks and outstretched wings. All nature seemed to droop beneath the scorching heat.

Unfortunately for me, a gentleman arrived about one o'clock from Kingston, to transact some business with my husband. He had not tasted food since six o'clock, and I was obliged to kindle the fire to prepare his dinner. It was one of the hardest tasks I ever performed; I almost fainted with the heat, and most inhospitably rejoiced when his dinner was over, and I saw him depart.

Shortly afterwards, my friend, Mrs. C——, and her brother called in, on their way from Peterborough.

"How do you bear the heat?" asked Mrs. C——. "This is one of the hottest days I ever remember to have experienced in this part of the province. I am afraid that it will end in a hurricane, or what the Lower Canadians term 'L'Orage.'"

About four o'clock they rose to go. I urged them to stay longer. "No," said Mrs. C——, "the sooner we get home the better. I think we can reach it before the storm breaks."

I took Donald in my arms, and my eldest boy by the hand, and walked with them to the brow of the hill, thinking that the air would be cooler in the shade. In this I was mistaken. The clouds over our heads hung so low, and the heat was so great, that I was soon glad to retrace my steps.

The moment I turned round to face the lake, I was surprised at the change that had taken place in the appearance of the heavens. The clouds, that had before lain so motionless, were now in rapid motion, hurrying and chasing each other round in the horizon. It was a strangely awful sight. Before I felt a breath of the mighty blast that had already burst on the other side of the lake, branches of trees, leaves, and clouds of dust were whirled across the lake, whose waters rose in long sharp furrows, fringed with foam, as if moved in their depths by some unseen but powerful agent.

Panting with terror, I just reached the door of the house as the hurricane swept up the hill, crushing and overturning everything in its course. Spell-bound, I stood at the open door, with clasped hands, unable to speak, rendered dumb and motionless by the terrible grandeur of the scene; while little Donald, who could not utter many intelligible words, crept to my feet, appealing to me for protection, while his rosy cheeks paled even to marble whiteness. The hurrying clouds gave to the heavens the appearance of a pointed dome, round which the lightning played in broad ribbons of fire. The roaring of the thunder, the rushing of the blast, the impetuous down-pouring of the rain, and the crash of falling trees, were perfectly deafening; and in the midst of this uproar of the elements, old Jenny burst in, drenched with wet, and half dead with fear.

"The Lord preserve us!" she cried, "this surely is the day of judgment. Fifty trees fell across my very path, between this an' the creek. Mrs. C—— just reached her brother's clearing a few minutes before a great oak fell on her very path. What thunner!—what lightning! Mischance, dear!—it's turn'd so dark, I can only just see yer face."

Glad enough was I of her presence; for to be alone in the heart of the great forest, in a log hut, on such a night, was not a pleasing prospect. People gain courage by companionship, and in order to reassure each other, struggle to conceal their fears.

"And where is Mr. E——?"

"I hope not on the lake. He went early this morning to get the wheat ground at the mill."

"Och, the crathur! He's surely drowned. What boat could stan' such a scrimmage as this?"

I had my fears for poor John; but as the chance that he had to wait at the mill till others were served was more than probable, I tried to still my apprehensions for his safety. The storm soon passed over, after having levelled several acres of wood near the house, and smitten down in its progress two gigantic pines in the clearing, which must have withstood the force of a thousand winters. Talking over the effects of this whirlwind with my brother, he kindly sent me the following very graphic description of a whirlwind which passed through the town of Guelph in the summer of 1829.

"In my hunting excursions and rambles through the Upper Canadian forests, I had frequently met with extensive wind-falls; and observed with some surprise that the fallen trees lay strewn in a succession of circles, and evidently appeared to have been twisted off the stumps. I also remarked that these wind-falls were generally narrow, and had the appearance of a road slashed through the forest. From observations made at the time, and since confirmed, I have no doubt that Colonel Reid's theory of storms is a correct one, viz., that all wind-storms move in a circular direction, and the nearer the centre, the more violent the force of the wind. Having seen the effects of several similar hurricanes since my residence in Canada West, I shall proceed to describe one which happened in the township of Guelph during the early part of the summer of 1829.

"The weather, for the season of the year (May), had been hot and sultry, with scarcely a breath of wind stirring. I had heard distant thunder from an early hour in the morning, which, from the eastward, is rather an unusual occurrence. About 10 A. M., the sky had a most singular, and I must add a most awful appearance, presenting to the view a vast arch of rolling blackness, which seemed to gather strength and density as it approached the zenith. All at once the clouds began to work round in circles, as if chasing one another through the air. Suddenly the dark arch of clouds appeared to break up into detached masses, whirling and mixing through each other in dreadful commotion. The forked lightning was incessant, accompanied by heavy thunder. In a short time, the clouds seemed to converge to a point, which approached very near the earth, still whirling with great rapidity directly under this point; and apparently from the midst of the woods arose a black column, in the shape of a cone, which instantly joined itself to the depending cloud. The sight was now grand and awful in the extreme. Picture to your imagination a vast column of smoke, of inky blackness, reaching from earth to heaven, gyrating with fearful velocity—bright lightnings issuing from the vortex; the roar of the thunder—the rushing of the blast—the crash of timber—the limbs of trees, leaves, and rubbish, mingled with clouds of dust, whirling through the air;—you then have a faint idea of the scene.

"I had ample time for observation, as the hurricane commenced its devastating course about two miles from the town, through the centre of which it took its way, passing within fifty yards of where a number of persons, myself among the rest, were standing, watching its fearful progress.

"As the tornado approached, the trees seemed to fall like a pack of cards before its irresistible current. After passing through the clearing made around the village, the force of the wind gradually abated, and in a few minutes died away entirely.

"As soon as the storm was over, I went to see the damage it had done. From the point where I first observed the black column to rise from the woods and join the clouds, the trees were twisted in every direction. A belt of timber had been levelled to the ground, about two miles in length and about one hundred yards in breadth. At the entrance of the town it crossed the river Speed, and uprooted about six acres of wood, which had been thinned out, and left by Mr. Galt (late superintendent of the Canada Company), as an ornament to his house.

"The Eremosa road was completely blocked up for nearly half-a-mile, in the wildest confusion possible. In its progress through the town, the storm unroofed several houses, levelled many fences to the ground, and entirely demolished a frame barn. Windows were dashed in; and, in one instance, the floor of a log house was carried through the roof. Some hair-breadth escapes occurred; but, luckily, no lives were lost.

"About twelve years since a similar storm occurred in the north part of the township of Douro, but was of much less magnitude. I heard an intelligent settler, who resided some years in the township of Madoc, state that, during his residence in that township, a similar hurricane to the one I have described, though of a much more awful character, passed through a part of Marmora and Madoc, and had been traced, in a north-easterly direction, upwards of forty miles into the unsurveyed lands: the uniform width of which appeared to be three quarters of a mile.

"It is very evident, from the traces which they have left behind them, that storms of this description have not been unfrequent in the wooded districts of Canada; and it becomes a matter of interesting consideration whether the clearing of our immense forests will not, in a great measure, remove the cause of these phenomena."

A few minutes after our household had retired to rest, my first sleep was broken by the voice of J. E——, speaking to old Jenny in the kitchen. He had been overtaken by the storm, but had run his canoe ashore upon an island before its full fury burst, and turned it over the flour; while he had to brave the terrors of a pitiless tempest—buffeted by the wind, and drenched with torrents of rain. I got up and made him a cup of tea, while Jenny prepared a rasher of bacon and eggs for his supper.

Jarvis, the painter, was painting Bishop——, and the venerable prelate began to remonstrate with him upon the dissipated course into which he had fallen. Jarvis, dropping his pencil from the forehead of his portrait to the lower part of his face, said, with a slight motion to the reverend sitter, "Just shut your mouth, bishop!" By painting upon that feature, he "changed the subject."

ESQUIMAUX TRACES.

[From Lieut. Osborn's "Stray Leaves from an Arctic Journal," just published by Putnam, we take the following:—]

I will now, with the reader's permission, carry him back to a subject that here and there has been cursorily alluded to throughout these pages—the Esquimaux traces and ruins, everywhere found by us, and the extraordinary chain of evidence which, commencing in Melville Island, our farthest west, carries us, link by link, to the isolated inhabitants of North Greenland, yclept Arctic Highlanders.

Strange and ancient signs were found by us in almost every sheltered nook on the seaboard of this sad and solitary land,—signs indubitably of a race having once existed, who have either decayed away, or else, more probably, migrated to more hospitable portions of the Arctic zone. That all these traces were those of the houses, caches, hunting-posts, and graves of the Esquimaux, or Innuits, there could be on our minds no doubt; and looking to the immense extent of land over which this extraordinary race of fishermen have been, and are to be found, well might Captain Washington, the talented compiler of the Esquimaux vocabulary, say, that they are one "of the most widely-spread nations of the globe."

The seat of this race (arguing from traditions extant during Baron Wrangell's travels in Siberia) might be placed in the northeast extreme of Asia, the western boundary being ill-defined: for on the dreary banks of the Lena and Indigirka, along the whole extent of the frozen Tundra, which faces the Polar Sea, and in the distant isles of New Siberia, rarely visited by even the bold seekers of fossil ivory, the same ruined circles of stone, betokening the former abode of human beings, the same whalebone rafters, the same stone axes, the same implements of the chase, are to be found as to this day are used, and only used, by the Tchukches of Behring's Straits, the Innuits of North America, or the Esquimaux of Hudson's Straits and Greenland,—a people identical in language, (of which they all speak different dialects), habits, and disposition.

Supposing, then, that from the east of Asia these people first migrated to the American continent, and thence, eventually wandered to the eastern shores of Greenland, it became an interesting question to us, how the lands upon our northern hand, in our passage to the west up Barrow's Strait, should bear such numerous marks of human location, whereas upon the southern side they were comparatively scarce; and how the natives residing in the northern portion of Baffin's Bay should have been ignorant that their brethren dwelt in great numbers southward of the glaciers of Melville Bay.

Some amongst us—and I was of this number—objected to the theory summarily advanced, that at a remote period these northern lands had been peopled from the south, and that the population had perished or wasted away from increased severity of climate or diminution of the means of subsistence. Our objections were argued on the following grounds:—If the Parry group had been colonized from the American con-

THE OLD MAN'S BRIDE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The evening of the party at Mr. Lane's had come, and the interest now manifested therein by Helen, was a matter of surprise both to her husband and parents—pleased surprise to Mr. Bullfinch and her mother, and, to her father, who had observed, with a sad hopelessness of feeling, the unnatural changes which were taking place in the character and mental states of his daughter, a source of at least some small degree of satisfaction.

If, in anything, Mr. Bullfinch was dissatisfied with the appearance of his wife, when she joined him, on descending from her chamber, dressed for the occasion, it was in the lack of certain showy points which her good taste had led her to reject. Yet, for all this, never had she appeared so beautiful in his eyes—never had he felt prouder of her than now.

"You really look charming, Helen," he said, as he gazed upon her with lover-like admiration. "Charming," he repeated, as his eyes ranged over her person.

"Do I?" was her simple response; yet, in the tones of her voice, the most indifferent ear could have detected an expression of pleasure.

"And you would have looked more beautiful still," he added, "if you had consulted less carefully your too severe taste. A little more ornament would have made the whole effect perfect."

Helen smiled rather feebly, as she answered—

"My own opinion is, that I am rather overdressed."

"O, no, no; not in a single particular," said the ardent, admiring old man. "Your excellent taste will always prevent your falling into that error."

"Others may see with different eyes," replied Helen, as a shadow flitted over her face.

For the sober moods of his wife, Mr. Bullfinch had no fancy. He saw the passing shadow, and said, instantly—

"Come, dear; the carriage is waiting."

Without further remark, Helen passed from the house, and was soon whirling away towards the elegant residence of Mr. Lane.

It was not without sore conflict, and bitter self-denial, that Helen had decided to make one of this party, the second of any promised brilliancy which she had been induced to attend since her marriage. After her decision, she came under the influence, as has been seen, of a new state. A certain worldliness of feeling overlaid the instinctive qualities of her mind, and gave birth to a spirit of emulation, and a desire to make an impression. She was too conscious that, in marrying an old man, she had forfeited the good opinion of her sex. She had but to take counsel of her own thoughts and feelings, to know how the act would be regarded. She had but to refer to her own loss of self-respect, to know how she would be esteemed among right-feeling women. She could not, therefore, go into society hoping to win regard and love—hoping to gain a position such as she might be proud to occupy. As she must appear on the social stage, it was needful to act a part; and her latent pride of character prompted her to choose a brilliant part, and to act it well. If she could not inspire a sentiment of respect, she was resolved to win admiration.

This was the state of mind which the unhappy victim of a false marriage was endeavoring to superinduce upon her real character. The effects of her last struggles with good impulses were visible in the fitting shadow that darkened her young brow, as she was about passing from the scene of rehearsal at home to make her appearance on the stage at Mr. Lane's.

As Mrs. Bullfinch entered the brilliantly-lighted and already well-filled drawing-rooms, not a trace of weakness could be seen on her beautiful countenance, that was flushed with hues warm from her now lightly beating heart. Leaning on the arm of her husband, she moved amid the crowd, extorting admiration, and conscious that it was given.

"Who is she?" "Is that her father?"

Such questions, in suppressed tones, or low whispers, reached, ever and anon, her ear. They did not awaken in her bosom a quicker throb. She was fully prepared for them. None knew better than she, that her husband was old enough to be her father, and she did not expect strangers to the true relation that existed, to be guiltless of error on the subject. Her pride had been wounded, over and over again, from these mistakes, so naturally made; but she had covered her coat of mail with new plates of harder and more highly polished steel, and especially for this occasion; and now the arrows rebounded from her protected bosom with scarcely a jar against the armor.

"Beautiful!"

"What a splendid creature!"

"Not her husband?"

Was it a well-bred company, that remarks like these were loudly enough uttered to reach her ears—in fact, uttered at all?

Well-bred, or not, such whispered remarks were made, and were heard by the young wife. We only note the fact. If such things indicate want of good-breeding, then there is a sad lack of this essential of truly good society in many of our fashionable drawing-rooms, and among people who affect to hold everything vulgar in abhorrence.

But Helen was protected at every point. She knew the quality of those among whom she was going, and was well enough read in the book of human nature to understand the lessons that were profitable to be learned. And, yet, while she was altogether unaffected by a reference to her position as the wife of an old man, she was far from being insensible to the admiration she had designed to awaken. That produced a warmer glow in her bosom, and deepened the rose that spread its beautiful petals on her cheeks.

As the wife of Adam Bullfinch, Helen attained at once a social position. The standing thus settled, her personal attractions made her the centre of a circle, in which she was no shrinking girl, timid of her powers, but a self-possessed woman, entirely equal to the maintenance of her position, yet never guilty of over-acting or in-delicate boldness; and, therefore, extorting a sentiment of respect as well as compelling admiration. While she made no overtures, she rejected no proffered attentions; and all who came in contact with her were, in a measure, constrained to a favorable impression.

It was not long after Helen entered the drawing-rooms of Mr. Lane, before she became aware of the presence of two persons, who, if she did not hold her natural feelings with a double rein, would have power to break down her assumed character, and compel her to retire in utter inability to sustain the part, in acting which she had made so good a beginning. These were Henry Wellford, and the niece of her husband, Fanny Milnor.

What she was to endure, from the presence of Wellford, may be imagined from the fact that she had not met him since her marriage, and had ever looked forward to such a meeting as a trial of all others to be dreaded. Far away, in the most sacred chamber of her heart, a chamber with the door closed, and the secret of ingress known only to herself, was enshrined an image—the image of Henry Wellford. He was her first love and her only love, and to him would her heart remain true as the needle, even until its last feeblest pulsation. How many an hour had she brooded over the picture of a meeting, which must sooner or later take place, and striven to school her heart into an icy calmness; but never in imagination could she compel the quick, throbbing pulses to beat low and evenly. Never did she unlock the door of that secret chamber, open it, and stand reverently before the inshrined image, that she did not suffer from profound agitation. How, then, was she to meet her heart's idol, face to face, in utter hopelessness, and maintain a composed exterior? We may not wonder that she grew faint, nor that her cheek paled, as her eyes first rested upon him. An electric consciousness of her position, and the fatal consequences that might follow a betrayal of her real feelings, brought back the color to cheeks and brow, and restored the fire to her eyes. To aid in the recovery of her self-possession, she turned her eyes from him, and strove to forget the changed face that came upon her suddenly, like an apparition. It was some time before she ventured to look in the direction where she had first seen him.

Although frequently urged by his largely increasing circle of friends, to go into society, this was the first time that Wellford had been dragged from his self-imposed and, to most of those who knew him, incomprehensible seclusion. But for the importunities of Mr. Lane, who disregarded all excuses, he would have spent this evening in his quiet home, instead of in the agitating sphere of a fashionable party.

It so happened that, soon after Wellford's entrance into the drawing-rooms, he received an introduction to Fanny Milnor, whose thoughtful, subdued, and rather retiring manners, combined with an agreeable address, gave him a prepossession in her favor. Change and trial had left their marks on her also. He was conversing with Fanny when he first became aware of Helen's presence. He was remarking, with more than usual animation, upon something which she had said, when, on lifting his eyes, he encountered those of Mrs. Bullfinch. They were fixed upon him with an intenseness that seemed like fascination. She seemed to be reading not only his countenance, but his very soul; and, while she did so, betrayed to him the secret of her own heart. No oral language was needed to tell him that he was still beloved; and with a devotion far greater than he had dreamed of, in the earlier and happier days, when lip-language falteringly told the story of affection. For a few moments, he was stunned—bewildered. Ere he recovered himself, or Helen could withdraw her eyes from his, Fanny's gaze took the direction of her companion's, and she too first became aware of the presence of her uncle's wife.

There was a heightened color in the face of Fanny Milnor, when Wellford turned to her again, and her voice had lost its steadiness at her next utterance. His voice was also changed and husky. Both suddenly lost interest in the subject on which they had been conversing; were less pointed in their remarks, and gradually lapsed into silence.

They were sitting, each busy with new thoughts, when a young lady friend came to the side of Fanny and said, in a low voice, as she glanced across the room,

"Have you seen Mrs. Bullfinch?"

"Yes," was the low, seemingly reluctant reply.

"She makes quite a showy appearance," said the other.

"Yes."

"I'm afraid she's utterly heartless," was added.

"How could you look for anything else?" said Fanny, with a bitterness of tone that almost caused Wellford to start.

"Young ladies with much heart don't usually enter into marriages of this kind," remarked the friend.

"Heart has nothing to do with it," said Fanny. "None but motives the most sordid could ever have induced Helen Lee to marry my uncle. I told him so, but he would not listen to me. He has had good cause, I have reason to believe, long ere this, for a correction of his opinions in regard to her."

"Do they not live happily together?" inquired the young friend.

"Happily! What a question to ask? One might as soon expect repose on the eternal billows as happiness in such a union. They may tolerate each other, but as for happiness—it comes not within the range of their experience. Look at Helen's face."

The young lady turned her eyes toward Mrs. Bullfinch.

"Did you know her before her marriage?" asked Fanny.

"I used to see her sometimes," was answered.

"Do you remember her countenance as it was then?"

"Distinctly. I used to think it a very sweet, innocent face."

"Look at it now!"

"It is much changed, certainly; but is more womanly and brilliant, if I may use the word. What splendid eyes!"

"Their splendor has been acquired at too great cost."

"At what cost?"

"They shine not from heart-fires, kindled by the breath of love. Dead embers and ashes lie upon the altar whereon she has offered up her sacrifice. Their light comes from without,—they reflect only the glare of a vain, weak, debasing desire for admiration."

"You speak strongly," said Mr. Wellford, now first trusting himself in utterance; yet not venturing to look Fanny steadily in the face, lest he should betray something of what he felt. He was now first aware that his companion was the niece of Mr. Bullfinch, of whose indignant withdrawal from her uncle's house he had heard at the time of its occurrence.

"I do, and with reason," answered Fanny.

"Mr. Bullfinch is your uncle?"

"He is."

"Excuse me; I was not aware of this, until a moment ago. You did not approve the marriage?"

"How could I?"

"You knew Helen Lee?"

"She was my teacher."

"How did you regard her?"

"With a respect and esteem amounting almost to affection."

"Upon what were these based?"

"On her supposed qualities."

"May not your uncle have been as much attracted by these as you were?"

"I have tried not to blame him," said Fanny, in a low, troubled voice, partly speaking to herself. "She must have acted on him with consummate art!"

"How often did she visit your house?" asked Wellford, now resolved to gain all possible information on a subject that had been, to him, a blight and a mystery.

"Twice a-week."

"For what purpose?"

"To give me lessons, according to engagement."

"Was your uncle home on these occasions?"

"Rarely during the earlier times of her visits; but, towards the last, quite frequently."

"Did you then see any thing in her manner towards him that awakened suspicion?"

"Nothing. The announcement, when finally made, came upon me like a thunderbolt. I was utterly unprepared for it."

"The art must have been consummate, indeed," said Wellford, with an irony that Miss Milnor did not fail to perceive, "if it could win your uncle's regard, without in the least exciting your suspicion. When and where did she act upon him? Did they meet except at your house?"

"I know not. Nothing that occurred ever led me to think so. But, it strikes me, Mr. Wellford," said Fanny, with a frankness that his rather close interrogations fully warranted, "that your questions are rather searching, and betray more than an idle interest in the wife of my uncle. It is said that she had a lover."—And she turned her eyes full upon the young man's face. "Did you ever hear whether this were so or not?"

Vainly Wellford strove to keep down the tell-tale blood that a quicker heart-throb sent bounding up to his face. He was only in part successful. Ere he could frame a reply, they were joined by two or three friends, and the conversation took a new shape, much to his relief.

CHAPTER XIX.

It was on this occasion that Mr. Bullfinch and his niece met for the first time since Fanny turned from him with so stinging a rebuke. As each became conscious of the other's presence, each felt that a time of trial had come. Neither knew the exact feeling of the other, nor how the other would act. It would not do—each felt this—to meet without recognition; and it would little comport with good breeding to make any marked exhibition of coldness or ill-feeling. As long as it could well be done, each avoided the other; but, at last, they were thrown into immediate contact, and in such a way, that they must act as total strangers, or pass a few words with each other. Many eyes were on them, and they knew it.

They met, but not a ripple on the surface was discovered even by the closely observant. A few pleasantly uttered common-places passed between them, and then they were separated by the crowd, each to breathe more freely, and with a sense of relief that the first meeting was over.

In the meantime, Mrs. Bullfinch was drawing an admiring circle around her, and acting her part with consummate skill. In assuming a new character, she seemed to have become a new creature, with new powers, and a new education. Surprise and pleasure were elicited on all sides. If there was, as might naturally be expected from one in her circumstances, a little over-acting, the defect was seen only by a few. Most of those who were in pleased contact with her, saw nothing in the assumed character but what was real. She did not force herself into a prominent position; she exhibited nothing of boldness; did not act so much as re-act—and in no case inordinately. In a word, a strongly grounded admiration of the woman soon came to be a prevailing sentiment, and even Fanny Milnor, who kept rigidly aloof, yet maintained a close observation, felt her prejudices insensibly melting away.

"What a sacrifice!" "And she the wife of that old man?" "It is inconceivable!" "What could she have seen in him?"

These, and similar expressions, passed, occasionally, from lip to lip.

"I am altogether puzzled," said one.

"She is an enigma to me," said another.

"She is a brilliant, fascinating woman," remarked a third.

"There'll be a rich young widow for some body before long," said a fourth, shrugging his shoulders and arching his eyebrows. "I rather think I will defer my matrimonial speculations for a few years."

"Do you think old Bullfinch so very rich?" was responded to this.

"I should like to be worth about half what he is," replied the first speaker.

"There is some difference of opinion on this head. His paper has been hawked about rather freely for the last six months."

"That may not be his fault."

"Though the fault of his credit. Some of the banks, I know, will not touch it."

"You surprise me."

"What I say is true, nevertheless. I saw a man, only yesterday, who had over fifteen thousand dollars of his paper, which he was offering at one-and-quarter per cent."

"That looks a little dubious."

"So it strikes me. You can wait for the widow; but, take my advice, and don't build too strongly on the fortune."

"I don't know," was returned with a smile. "that I could resist the lady's personal attractions, if they survived to her widowhood."

"That may not be for these twenty years. Old Bullfinch comes of a long-lived generation."

"O dear!" lightly responded the other. "We can't have everything just our own way. But, what could have possessed her to marry that old man? Not love, certainly."

"No, it was money."

"Then she must be a heartless woman."

"Something is wrong, without doubt. The marriage is unnatural, and must have had its origin in constraint, or overweening cupidity. There has been a lack of womanly virtue somewhere. Do you know that the niece of Mr. Bullfinch, whom he had raised almost as his own child, left the house on the very day she entered it, and has not crossed the threshold since?"

"No!"

"It is yet true."

"Who was she?"

"A Miss Milnor; and she is here to-night."

"Ah! Can you point her out to me? I should like to observe her conduct in relation to them. It will present a fine study in human nature."

"There she is in conversation with Mr. Wellford."

"Ah! That's the young lady. Well, there is certainly a look of spirit about her."

The two men observed, in silence, for some moments, the personages alluded to. They were in earnest conversation.

"Did you see that look?" said one of them, suddenly.

"What look?" asked the other.

"The look cast upon them by Mrs. Bullfinch."

"No." And, as he spoke, he turned his eyes towards Helen. "There's something in that I don't just comprehend," he said, after a brief observation.

"Nor do I. Unless I err, there was something of the fire of jealousy in her eyes."

"Just so I read them. There! See! She is looking at them again. What can it mean? Ah! Now I remember having heard something of a lover. Can Wellford possibly be the man?"

"Why should she give him up for an old man like Bullfinch? His worldly condition, if not quite so good now, promises, in my opinion, to be much the best. You know he is a member of the house of Lane, Latta & Co."

"I do. But little more than a year ago, he was only a clerk in that house. His prospects at the time Miss Lee was married, and his prospects now, are very different."

"I must know something further in regard to this matter," said the other. "There's a new study in human nature here, at least, for me."

"If you would probe the matter pretty effectually, I will suggest a mode of procedure," remarked the friend.

"Well?"

"Are you acquainted with Mr. Bullfinch?"

"I am not."

"Does he know you?"

The friend shook his head.

"He is on the side of the room from his wife just now."

"So I perceive."

"As a stranger you are not supposed to be aware of the fact, that so beautiful a young creature—a mere girl as it were—holds to an old man like him the relation of a wife."

"Go on. I am all attention."

"Approach, and enter into conversation. It will then be the easiest matter in the world to make allusion to the charming Mrs. Bullfinch."

"Ah! I take your drift. You wish me to excite his jealousy?"

"Make allusion to Wellford. It will be the more effectual if Mrs. Bullfinch should happen to cast upon the young gentleman a glance or two, such as we detected just now."

"I understand my part fully," was replied.

"Thank you for the suggestion. If I don't awaken a tempest in at least one mind to-night, then I'm mistaken."

"Take care that you don't do harm," said the friend, in a warning voice.

"Harm! what harm?"

"You may destroy the peace of that old man."

"Would it not be a just punishment for his wickedness in marrying that young creature? What right had he to rob her of her true dower in life? To lay a sacrifice like that upon the reeking altar of sensuality. Hah! I burn with indignation at the thought. If I can lay upon him a scorpion lash, right freely will I do it."

"As you choose. But, to my thinking, you are assuming towards him, rather unadvisedly, the joint office of judge and executioner. In matters like this, all are free to act as they think best. Consent must precede marriage. His wife, therefore, is quite as much a party in this business as himself. Why he alone should be punished for a mutual fault, is what I do not clearly comprehend."

"I can't stop to argue this matter," was replied. "My mind is already made up. So now for introducing my probe into this festering sore."

And, as he said this, the young man moved away from his friend, and was soon at the side of Mr. Bullfinch. In a little while, with much adroitness, he succeeded in engaging the old man in conversation.

"What a charming creature that is!" said he, breaking in, with well-managed abruptness, upon a remark of his companion. And he glanced towards Mrs. Bullfinch.

The countenance of the latter became lit up with pleasure in an instant; but ere he had time to indicate the relationship in which he stood towards her, the young man added—

"I'm told that she is the wife of old Adam Bullfinch. But, I presume, there is a mistake in this."

"I believe not," was the rather grave answer.

"That Mrs. Bullfinch!"

A formal bow was the assenting reply.

"You surprise me! Well, I can only say, that I admire the old fellow's taste. When I want a wife, I'll get him to look out for me."

This rather familiar way of speaking about himself and his affairs, made Mr. Bullfinch hesitate as to a declaration of identity. To avow himself now, would be, he felt, rather embarrassing. He, therefore, determined to let his companion talk on in supposed ignorance as to the true personality of his auditor. He merely remarked—

"Mrs. Bullfinch is certainly a charming woman."

"Oh, delightful! If I were her husband I should feel strongly inclined to cage her up at home. Why, half the men here are in love with her already."

The arrow had struck. A cloud fell instantly on the brow of Mr. Bullfinch.

"She had a lover I'm told," was the next remark. "I wonder if there is any truth in it. Some one said he was here to-night."

The old man's eyes turned instantly towards Wellford.

"There! Did you see that look?" said his companion, touching familiarly the old man's arm.

"What look?"

"The look Mrs. Bullfinch cast on Mr. Wellford, who is in earnest conversation with that young lady—said to be the niece of her husband, and to have left his house indignantly on the very night of their marriage."

The eyes of Mr. Bullfinch were instantly fixed upon his wife, who was regarding the two persons just mentioned, with the peculiar look before described. Well might he take the alarm. Such a look never rested upon a man in whom the heart had no interest.

"Wellford is the man; I'll wager a kingdom of it!" said the evil genius of Mr. Bullfinch, triumphantly.

The old man started, as if stung by a serpent. Thrown off of his guard, he said, in a low, angry voice—

"Who are you, sir, that dares to trifle with me after this fashion!"

The young man instantly shrunk away, and retiring to another part of the drawing-rooms, spent the rest of the evening in observing the result of his evil handy-work.

CHAPTER XX.

Not until this unlooked-for meeting with Henry Wellford, did Helen fully comprehend the nature of the passion with which she loved him. As we have said, his image lay enshrined far away, in the most sacred recesses of her heart; not dust-covered, nor dimmed with gathering mould, yet as she had believed, forever hidden from the light. An image, before which, if her spirit sometimes bowed in its weakness, it bowed with a consciousness of sin, and, in bowing, prayed to Heaven for strength ever to stand upright.

Now that she had looked upon his living face for the first time since their last sad meeting in the street, she felt that she was unequal to the trial. More than an hour had glided away since her eyes rested upon him, and, from that time, while she compelled herself to act even more skillfully, than at first, her part, ever and anon, her glances would go searching after him, and when desisted, linger on his form for moments, as if she were spell-bound.

A strange feeling, almost suffocating in its intensity, seized upon the unhappy woman, when she saw that Wellford remained by the side of Fanny Milnor, much of the time engaged in earnest conversation. Was it a spirit of jealousy that, constricting her chest, gave to respiration a quickened impulse?—or, did she shrink from the personal detraction of herself, which she had good reason to believe would be poured into the ear of her former lover?

However this might be, the good understanding and mutual interest which seemed to exist between Wellford and Fanny Milnor, were to her a source of most exquisite pain. Yet, for all this, she hid beneath the garment of a well-assumed exterior, the fox that was tearing her very vitals. A few, more observant than the rest, noticed, occasionally, the manner in which she regarded these two persons; but no one dreamed of the agony that was veiled by her winning smiles, or concealed under the buoyant tones of her rich, mellow voice. What a task had she imposed upon herself! The only wonder is that she was able to sustain her part.

An hour had glided away since she became aware of Wellford's presence; and now, for the first time, she found herself about coming into immediate personal contact with him. This was not accidental, but from design on his part, as she plainly saw. A gentleman with whom she had been conversing had just left her side, and she was sitting alone. This opportunity Wellford seized for the renewal of an acquaintance, broken off under such painful circumstances, nearly two years before. As he approached her, the heart of Helen fluttered, and then grew still, as if overpowering emotions were actually about extinguishing her life. He bowed with considerable formality, and showed an embarrassed manner.

"I am pleased to meet you again," said he, with less steadiness of voice than he had hoped to maintain.

The lips of Helen moved, but no words came therefrom. There was a welcome, however, in her eyes; and Wellford failed not to see this. He sat down by her, forced a smile to conceal the real agitation he felt, and made some commonplace remark, to which she now found voice to reply. How soon each would have regained an easy self-possession, we cannot say. A third party joined them almost immediately—the husband of Helen.

The two men, who had met in business circles, and had a slight business acquaintance, bowed formally, as each gave utterance to the other's name. It was at once apparent to Wellford, that the old man was disturbed from some cause; and he did not fail to observe, that with a singular want of good breeding, he seated himself on the narrow portion of the sofa that intervened between him and Helen.

A few unimportant remarks were made by Wellford, to which Mr. Bullfinch gave constrained answers. Perceiving that his presence was, from some cause, disagreeable, the former soon retired to a distant part of the room, and from an unnoted point of observation, saw that sharp words were passing between the young wife and her husband. Another might not thus have interpreted the manner of Mr. and Mrs. Bullfinch; but his knowledge of the past, as well as his peculiar state of mind, gave to Wellford a more than ordinary keenness of vision.

"Did you see that?" said the young man, who had, so unwisely, and, we might say, wickedly, awakened in the breast of Mr. Bullfinch the evil spirit of jealousy. He addressed the friend with whom a previous conversation had been held.

"See what?" asked the other.

"Mr. Wellford, only a moment ago, took a seat near Mrs. Bullfinch; but, scarcely had they entered into conversation, ere the old man came up and coolly thrust himself between them."

"Indeed!"

"That tells the story, doesn't it?"

"What story?"

"Of a young lover and a jealous old husband. I thought there was something peculiar in the way Mrs. Bullfinch looked at Wellford, when he sat talking so earnestly with her husband's niece."

"You seem to take a singular interest in their affairs," said his friend—"an evil interest, I am afraid. Pardon me for plain speaking."

"I'm a student of human nature you know, and this is one of its phases."

"It is one thing to study human nature, and another to mar its beauty. I'm afraid the lover was more in your imagination than anywhere else, and that all the cause for jealousy that exists you created. This is hardly to be justified on any plea."

"Oh, as for that," was replied with indifference, "I act pretty much as fancy prompts. As for self-justification, I rarely give it a thought."

"Some people would say," remarked the friend, half seriously and half in earnest, "that you had either a wrong head or a bad heart."

"People will say almost any thing that suits their fancy. For one, I never give much heed to the opinions of others regarding myself. The worst is usually judged of our actions. I seek compensation for these things in saying and doing pretty much as I list; and I presume the world thinks quite as well of me, as if I were guarded about the effect of my words, and over nice as to the consequences of my actions."

"There is something more to be desired than the world's opinion."

"So I think."

"Our own self-respect, and consciousness of right actions."

The other merely shrugged his shoulders.

"If we can do no good, let us do no harm. The casting of an evil seed may seem a light thing; but, the small acorn becomes, in time, a giant oak. Think of this. You have, carelessly, sown a seed of jealousy in the mind of Mr. Bullfinch. Already it has germinated. The fruit, which must be eaten, will be bitter to the taste; nay, may poison the whole system. Will it add any thing to your pleasure in life to know that you have made others inconceivably wretched? I should think not."

"You make a serious matter of my little pleasant annoyance of Mr. Bullfinch," said the other, in a slightly changed tone.

"If I err not, it will prove more than a pleasant annoyance to the old gentleman and his young wife. The passion of jealousy, when once excited, rarely burns out. It makes fuel of every thing within its reach. Ever suspicious, and prone to misjudge, it becomes insatiate and cruel. Ah! I fear you have put thorns in the already uncomfortable pillow on which the head of that young wife uneasily reposes."

"Oh, dear! Don't grow sentimental," was replied, with forced levity. "Her pillow is soft enough, I'll warrant you. She'll sleep sound for all the thorns my hands have planted."

As this was said, the piano, which had been silent for some time, was touched by softly falling fingers, and, in a moment after, a clear, sweet, mellow voice arose and filled the rooms.

"Ah! who is that?" remarked one of the young men.

"It's Mrs. Bullfinch, as I live," said the other, as he moved half involuntarily towards the instrument.

There was an instant hush throughout the crowded and buzzing drawing-rooms. Every ear seemed penetrated with the unexpected melody. Several brilliant performers had, from time to time, during the evening, executed some of their best pieces; but, they had played only to a narrow, music-loving circle, while most of those present were rather annoyed than otherwise at the loud, incessant thrumming, which made conversation an effort. But now, an involuntary attention was awarded by all, and soon there was a crowd around the piano.

Piece after piece was played and sung, in accordance with the requests or suggestions of those who gathered near the singer. Yet, all the while, Mrs. Bullfinch played for the ear of only one—though he never asked for a song, nor even made one of the delighted group that clustered around her. It was not that she designed to play for Wellford; she could not help it. With every note she struck, every skilful modulation of her voice, every expression that was breathed forth, went also a thought as to how his ear would be affected! And so entirely was this the case, that it totally obscured her consciousness of the fact. She played for her old lover, yet knew it not.

Never had the old man been so struck with the charms of his young wife as now. Never had he observed such a witchery in her voice. How proud of her he felt! Yet, with this pride, was a feeling of uneasiness not before experienced. The seed of jealousy was in his heart; it had already quickened into life, and was sending down its sharp, piercing rootlets. In the eyes of those who looked on her, his newly acquired vision perceived something deeper than mere admiration; and when he saw a gay, handsome young man, bending to her ear, and speaking in tones so low that he could not hear them, suspicion imagined the words that were uttered, and troubled the waters of his spirit to their deepest depths.

The fact that Wellford did not join the listeners who had gathered around the piano, was not unobserved by Mr. Bullfinch. The meaning of this he interpreted in his own way, and made it the aliment on which to feed his jealousy.

At last, Helen retired from the piano, receiving, as she did so, thanks and compliments from many voices, and accompanied by one or two young gentlemen, who were completely charmed with her. Mr. Bullfinch tried to get between these and his wife, as the latter was handed to a seat. The effort did not prove so successful as in the case of Wellford. But he remained standing near, unconscious that, in countenance and manner, he was betraying to all eyes the real state of his mind. Nor was this state rendered any the more endurable by parts of sentences, over-loudly spoken or whispered, that reached his ears, such as—

"She's a charming creature!" "Old Bullfinch had better cage her up at home." "Somebody'll run off with her before a year." "The maudlin old fellow! how she must despise him!" "She can't love him." "A chattel, bought with gold."

At an early hour, Mr. Bullfinch suggested to his wife that it was time for them to return home.

"It is only twelve," said she, in reply, "and the carriage was not ordered until two."

"Two—two—so late as that?" he answered, in a confused manner, "I had forgotten."

Cotillions were now forming, and a young gentleman, whose attentions to Helen had not escaped the keen eyes of her husband, pressed forward, and asked if she would dance with him.

A graceful assent was given, and the couple took their places on the floor.

An ill-concealed gesture of impatience marked the effect of this upon Mr. Bullfinch, who, with a lengthened visage and contracted brow, took his place, moodily, among those who were too old, or disinclined, to dance.

Set after set were formed; in each of these, always with a new partner, Mrs. Bullfinch was to be seen. With color warm from exercise, and eyes glittering with excitement, she looked as happy as she was beautiful. None noticed, as she went circling through the mazy evolutions, her quick glance thrown, ever and anon, towards a point in the room, where, in close conversation, sat Henry Wellford and Fanny Milnor. Only once during the evening had she been thrown into the immediate company of Fanny, when they met as strangers.

Nothing more dramatic than the incidents we have chronicled, took place during that evening. Once again Helen and Wellford met and exchanged a few words; but, in doing so, there was no betrayal of feeling on either side. At two o'clock, Mr. and Mrs. Bullfinch retired; each with sharper thorns in the pillows upon which their heads were to recline hereafter.

In Helen's Book of Life, a new leaf had been turned; and, as she brooded over the yet unwritten page, her heart trembled at thought of the probable record. She had tasted a new cup—the sweet and bitter exquisitely mingled—and she felt that she was destined to drink it to the very dregs.

"It was no seeking of mine," said she, gloomily, to herself, as she pondered the future. "The consequences rest with those who dragged me into a position fraught with trials and temptations beyond my power to sustain or resist. But the step has been taken, and I must now press onward in the new and dangerous path that opens before me. I have pride enough to enable me at least to tread it boldly. No one must see a step falter—and no one shall!"

CHAPTER XXI.

It was mentioned, in a previous chapter, that sharp words had passed between Mr. Bullfinch and his wife, while at Mr. Lane's party, occasioned by the renewal of intercourse between the latter and Mr. Wellford. Such, at least, was the young man's inference, and he did not err. Excited by the rude conduct of her husband, the moment Mr. Wellford retired, Helen said to him, warmly, though in a low tone, "I don't understand you, Mr. Bullfinch! What is the meaning of this?"

"The meaning is," was quite as warmly answered, "that I do not wish you to hold any intercourse with that person."

"Why not, pray?"

"I have good and sufficient reasons, Madam," said the old man.

"They must be good and sufficient to me, before I act from them," replied Helen, firmly.

"What have you against him?"

"It should be enough for a wife, that her husband objects to her being on terms of intimacy with a particular man."

"It is not enough for me, at least," said Helen. "If you know anything wrong of Mr. Wellford, say so."

Beyond this, nothing further passed between them on the subject, at the time: others were too near to render a continuance of such a conversation at all prudent.

The uneasiness of Mr. Bullfinch during the evening, and his broad exposure of the jealousy which had taken possession of him, did not escape the observation of Helen. It produced in her mind a strange blending of emotions; among which were mortification at his obtrusive weakness, mingled with a flutter of triumph. She, in no degree, pitied his suffering, but felt like adding thereto by acts that would increase, rather than allay, the suspicions that were fretting him. Not that there was any guilty purpose in her mind—she was too pure for that; but a certain perverseness, born of unnatural and constrained relations, was beginning to influence her.

Mrs. Bullfinch at Mr. Lane's, and Mrs. Bullfinch immediately on her arrival at home, was another person, altogether. A stranger could scarcely be made to believe that the wearied-looking, silent, almost sullen woman, who sat, half unrobed, one glove on the floor, and the other partly drawn—her hood tossed upon the bed, and her elegant shawl just falling from the back of a chair where she had thrown it, with an indifference amounting almost to contempt—was the same with the brilliant, beautiful, fascinating creature, who had been for hours the centre of an admiring circle.

"You have met Mr. Wellford before, I believe," said Mr. Bullfinch, breaking in upon a state of mind in his wife, that it would have been far wiser for him had he left undisturbed—at least, by such a remark. It was thus that he renewed the subject now nearest to his heart, a subject which the presence of others had interrupted a little while before, and which had not since been a moment absent from his thoughts.

Helen raised her eyes quickly, and with a slight start, fixing them, in a steady, half-frowning glance, upon her husband. In no other way did she answer his remark. A few moments she continued to look at him, and then her eyes drooped to the floor again, and her mind fell back into reverie.

"Helen!"

The wife looked up again.

"You might at least reply to my question. Common politeness, if no higher feeling, should prompt to this," said Mr. Bullfinch, with ill-concealed excitement of feeling.

"What was your question?" asked Helen, again looking up, and now speaking with a coldness of tone that was almost chilling.

"It was in reference to Mr. Wellford. I said that you had met him before."

"In that you said truly," was the frigid answer.

The whole mind of Mr. Bullfinch was now inflamed. It was with difficulty that he could restrain an outbreak of feeling, or school his voice into anything like calmness of utterance.

"He is an old acquaintance, I believe," he next remarked.

"He is," was the composed response.

"Well, I now repeat what I said at Mr. Lane's."

"And I repeat the answer then given," replied Helen. Her voice had in it not the least perceptible weakness.

"Helen!"

"Sir!"

The whole manner of both husband and wife underwent a sudden change.

"You must be to that man as a stranger from this day henceforth!" said Mr. Bullfinch, speaking with an angry vehemence that it was impossible to restrain.

"This is your command, I suppose," retorted Helen, with a proud, defiant air, that showed a will fully equal to the emergency.

"It is my command, if you will," said the old man, speaking with undiminished warmth.

"I am your wife, and equal," replied Helen, her former coolness of manner returning; "not your slave. If you expect to influence my conduct, you have got to use reason, not command."

"Then, Madam," said the old man, calming down a little, and speaking with mock deference, "I desire you not to hold intercourse with this gentleman in future."

"A desire will have no more influence with me than a command, unless accompanied by a reason. Do you know anything wrong of Mr. Wellford?"

"He is not the man for you to associate with."

"Why?"

There was more of interest in her voice than Helen wished to betray.

"Is it not enough for you that such is my impression of the man?"

"No, Mr. Bullfinch, it is not enough for me," was answered. "He is an old and valued acquaintance; and, until now, not a whisper against him has ever reached my ears. To say to me that we must hereafter be strangers, and this without the assignment of a single reason, does not satisfy me."

"He is a bad man!" exclaimed Mr. Bullfinch; his strong excitement returning.

But, the assertion did not, to all external appearances, in the least move his wife.

"A designing, bad man," repeated Mr. Bullfinch.

"It will be wisest to drop this subject," said Helen, with a coldness that contrasted strongly with the passionate manner of her husband. "It seems to involve a poor suspicion of your wife, as weak as it is unworthy of you. You have committed an error, sir, that it may be difficult to repair. I did not wish to go to this party. I would have been happier at home; but you dragged me there against my will. It would have ill become me, as your wife, to carry into such a company a clouded brow, or to have failed in doing my part towards the general enjoyment of the evening. I, therefore, as best I could, entered into the spirit of the hour; when, strange to say, you insulted our entertainer by a rudeness towards a guest who was polite to me, that nothing can justify; and now, add to your fault by demanding the surrender of an acquaintance partially renewed after the lapse of nearly two years. You have, I repeat, committed an error, Mr. Bullfinch, that it may be difficult to repair."

In more than one contest with his wife, Mr. Bullfinch had come off far from victorious; and the result was in no way different on the present occasion. There was, to his ear, a threat involved in the closing sentence of his wife, that slightly troubled, and caused him to regret having so unguardedly betrayed his awakening suspicions. He made no reply; and both soon relapsed into moody and abstracted silence.

Scarcely a week passed, ere invitations were received for another large and fashionable party.

"What is this?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, when the complimentary note was handed to him by his wife.

"Read it," said she.

The old man's countenance did not brighten as his eye took in the contents.

"Do you think of going?" said he.

"Certainly I do," was the prompt reply.

Mr. Bullfinch did not look very happy.

"Consult your own feelings about the matter," said he. "If you would prefer remaining at home, I shall be content. Don't go, therefore, simply on my account."

"I thought," remarked Mrs. Bullfinch, a little maliciously, we are sorry to say, "that you always enjoyed society. I am sure such has been your unvarying declaration. Heretofore I have, I confess, been unjust to you in this respect. All my preferences were for retirement—even seclusion. But, I have learned to overcome this weakness. It is not good for me. We are social beings, and only in mingling with each other socially can we hope to maintain a cheerful mind."

"True; very true," said Mr. Bullfinch. His assent was not made with any heartiness; and he added,—"But there is always danger of carrying things too far. All pleasure tends to excess."

"Two parties, in a season, can hardly be called taking pleasure to excess!" replied Helen, in a way that left little room for dissent on the part of her husband.

"No—no—of course not. Though two fashionable parties in the space of a single week might be thought rather verging on to dissipation," was her husband's answer.

Little more was said on the subject, until Helen asked for fifty dollars. Now, it so happened, that, on the very day this request was made, Mr. Bullfinch had a large amount of money to pay, while the sources from which it was to come were by no means as apparent as he could wish them. In fact, the difficulty of making his payments in bank had been on the increase for some time, and he was, naturally enough, rather troubled on this account. His thoughts were busy with the ways and means of raising some ten thousand dollars, when his wife said to him, as he was about leaving the house, on the morning after the invitations just referred to were received—

"I want fifty dollars, Mr. Bullfinch. Will you send it to me in the course of an hour?"

"I can't do it to-day," was replied.

"Oh, but I must have it this morning," said Helen.

"Is your want so very pressing, Helen?" was coldly inquired.

"Indeed, it is. I must get a new dress for the party at Mrs. Levering's; and there is no time to be lost. Unless I get it into the hands of the mantua-maker, to-day, there will be danger of disappointment."

"A new dress, Helen!" said the old man, a little surprised. "Where is the one that was worn at Mr. Lane's? You could not find anything more becoming."

"Why, Mr. Bullfinch! Would you have me go to two successive parties in the same dress?"

"And why not, pray?"

"People would think I hadn't but a single dress fit to appear in. You would hardly like that thought, much less said."

The old man was thrown altogether aback by this unexpected, and, in his case, rather unanswerable argument.

"Won't the money do as well, to-morrow?" said he, after musing for a little while.

"Oh, no!" promptly answered Helen. "I must buy the dress this morning, so as to be certain of having it made up in time."

"Very well; I will see about it," replied Mr. Bullfinch, and then hurried away to his store, there to devise the ways and means for meeting the heavy liabilities which had fallen due.

See about it! In no case, before, had Mr. Bullfinch thus replied to his wife's applications for money, which, we will say, had never been very extravagant. She did not attribute his reluctance to supply her demand to the true cause, for of that she had no suspicion. She gave it a different explanation altogether. It arose, in her view, from a desire on his part to diminish, if possible, the personal attractions of which, a short time before, he had been so proud; and this view determined her to increase these attractions.

The day proved, to Mr. Bullfinch, one of anxiety and great trial—a day in mercantile life that makes an impression on the mind rarely, if ever, forgotten. Up to one o'clock, he was on the street, in the effort to raise money, or in his counting-room, devising ways and means for the same purpose; and it was not until after this hour that he began to breathe at all freely. Merchants, who had heretofore given him the usual temporary loans with the utmost readiness, were now all, strangely enough, short of money. His bank, from which he had enjoyed a fair line of discounts, had, this morning, thrown out notes of hand for over five thousand dollars; an event entirely unlooked for, and which added very seriously to the difficulty under which he was laboring.

As a last resort, he was obliged to raise a considerable sum of money at an exorbitant rate of discount.

It was nearly three o'clock when his last note was taken out of bank, and then, in no comfortable state, he turned his steps homeward. Not since he entered his store, had a thought of the fifty dollars, required by his wife, crossed his mind; and, it may be doubted whether, if it had done so, the sum would have been despatched to meet her want. The pressure of business needs for money would, in all probability, have forced that matter aside.

Not until Mr. Bullfinch was in the act of entering his house, did he remember the omission; and then it flashed upon him with a presentiment of trouble. He doubted not that a clouded brow would meet him on his entrance, and he was not mistaken.

"I declare, Helen," said he, and he spoke in a perplexed, half-troubled manner, "I entirely forgot about the money you asked for. In fact, I have had a very busy day of it, and hardly wonder at myself."

Helen made no answer, but the look she gave him said, so plainly, that she regarded this as a mere excuse, if not a subterfuge,—so plainly, that he could not be mistaken in her thoughts.

"I assure you, Helen," said he, seriously, "that I meant to bring you this money. If you knew how much worried I have been, you would not blame my omission. But you shall have it to-morrow morning."

No response, whatever, was made to this by Mrs. Bullfinch, nor did the cloud on her brow lift itself up, or permit a gleam of light to break through its dark masses.

A cheerless meal was that of which the family partook. Mrs. Lee, who was cognizant of her daughter's disappointment, looked quite as sombre and more indignant than Helen. Mr. Lee, who usually made an effort, not always unsuccessful, to introduce pleasant topics of conversation, was, unfortunately, too much indisposed to leave his room. So poor Mr. Bullfinch was left alone to encounter the suffocating sphere of two injured and indignant women, who, if they could punish him in no other way, were quite ready to visit on his head the terrors of a moody silence. This was quite as much as he could bear. A shorter time than usual he remained at the table, and then, instead of the half hour's siesta, went immediately from the house. A hurried walk soon brought him to his store.

"How much money is in the drawer?" said he of the clerk who had the cash in charge.

The young man opened his money-drawer, and, after counting over a few small bills and loose change, replied—

"About eight dollars, sir."

"Is that all?" Mr. Bullfinch manifested considerable disappointment.

"Yes, sir; we had to scrape pretty close, to-day. How much do you want?"

"Fifty dollars," was replied.

"I can borrow it for you, I presume," said the clerk.

"Do so, if you please, Mr. Williams. I want that sum particularly."

The young man went out, and was gone for over half an hour.

"Really," said he, on coming in, "I never had so much trouble to raise a small amount of money in my life. Everybody's deposits were made, and nobody had anything 'out of bank.'"

As he spoke, he drew three small rolls of bills from his pocket, and laying them on the desk, unfolded and counted them over.

"Just fifty dollars. I had to get it from three several places; and such money as it is! It hails from nearly every point of the compass—is, in fact, the very debris of depositable funds. I don't know that it will be of any use to you, now."

Mr. Bullfinch took the bills, and, with a dubious look, turned them over slowly.

"It will have to do," said he, in mimic desperation. So writing a hurried note—addressed to his wife—he enclosed and sent her, by the hands of his porter, the money.

What remained of the afternoon was devoted to an examination into the financial resources of the next day, which did not show a very hopeful state of things, although the payments were far from being as heavy as those just made.

When Mr. Bullfinch again took his way homeward, it was not with any pleasing anticipations. He half dreaded to meet his wife, notwithstanding he had sent her the money she wanted; but was a good deal disappointed, on his return, to find that she was out.

"Where has she gone?" he inquired of her mother.

"To Levy's," replied Mrs. Lee.

He asked no further question. The answer was altogether sufficient.

From Levy's, Mrs. Bullfinch went to the dress-maker's, and did not get home until nearly an hour after the usual tea-time, her absence delaying supper, and fretting her husband almost beyond endurance. Their meeting, when she at last came home, was not with any excess of kind words.

For the party at Mrs. Levering's, Mrs. Bullfinch made even more thoughtful preparation than for the one previously attended. Her new dress was of the richest material, and its style and trimming such as to show off her person and complexion to the best possible advantage.

"How beautiful! How attractive!" was the mental exclamation of her husband, as he gazed upon her, when fully attired for the evening, and ready to enter the carriage that was to convey them to Mrs. Levering's. Yet, with this involuntary feeling of admiration—this consciousness of his young wife's charms, Mr. Bullfinch looked forward to the gay assemblage in which she was to shine, with a feeling of uneasiness so profound as to rob him of peace entirely. Too fully was he satisfied that Helen did not regard him with any real affection. But, of this, he had no right to complain; for, had she not declared to him, most unequivocally, before marriage, that she possessed no heart to give; that, if he took her hand, he must be content with that alone? Then, he did not give to her declaration its full force; alas! how fraught with meaning had he since proved it to be! And now, when he saw the admiration she was eliciting, and believed that at least one man, with whom she must come into immediate contact, loved her with the fervor of a first passion, his jealousy became feverish in its intensity.

As for Helen, although she knew it not, the leading impulse from which she was acting sprang from a desire to meet Mr. Wellford. In all her toilette arrangement, now most carefully made, every effect sought to be produced was for his eyes. At Mr. Lane's party, during the earlier portion of the evening, gratified vanity fed the flame of excitement, and enabled her to act her brilliant part. But, now, another state had supervened; she felt indifferent to all save Henry Wellford, whose image was scarcely ever absent from her mental vision. The moment she entered Mrs. Levering's drawing-room, her eyes began ranging about in search of her old lover; and the search did not end until, with a feeling of disappointment, she ascertained that he was not present. Then a certain listlessness came over her, and to many of those who, at Mr. Lane's, had been charmed by her free, social manners and lively conversation, she was dull, distant, and abstracted. By several, the change was noticed and remarked upon. Mr. Bullfinch, who was quite as uninteresting as his wife, remained close by her side, and did his part, fully, towards keeping young gallants at a distance.

Suddenly, after the lapse of nearly an hour, the rather pale face of Mrs. Bullfinch was seen to flush and her eyes to light up with a new interest. Those who noticed this, and followed the direction of her glances, saw the handsome person of Henry Wellford, junior partner in the extensive house of Lane, Latta & Co. From that time, Mrs. Bullfinch, to all external seeming, was another creature. A new beauty came into her young face. No longer did she repel those who approached her; and soon, as on the evening at Mr. Lane's, she was the centre of an admiring circle. Yet, even beyond this circle, went eyes and thoughts to one who did not approach her; nor, indeed, so far as she was able to detect, seem even to know she was in the room.

Not long after Mrs. Bullfinch became aware of Mr. Wellford's presence, she saw the attractive face of her husband's niece, Fanny Milnor; and almost at the same moment, the young man approached her, and the two were soon engaged in earnest and familiar conversation. Lip and cheek paled for a moment; then, an effort, born of conscious weakness, sent the blood back again. How instantly wretched became the excited woman; while a feeling of bitter dislike towards Fanny took possession of her bosom. It required, now, a far stronger effort on her part than before, to maintain an interested exterior; to meet and adequately respond to the social attentions which were freely accorded. As for Wellford and Miss Milnor, no full minute of time passed, in which Mrs. Bullfinch did not turn her eyes upon them, and note, with a quick instinct, from signs none but a woman can read, the state of feeling that existed between them. Disappointed beyond measure was she, in not receiving from Wellford a single glance. Not once was a look cast towards her; and there was nothing in his manner that indicated a knowledge of her presence. As this manifestation of ignorance or indifference continued, it seemed to Mrs. Bullfinch as if her feelings would suffocate her. In the midst of this unhappy state, she saw Wellford accompany Miss Milnor to the piano, and watched him while he stood by her, as she sung, with skill and fine taste, two or three popular airs. She did not hear the complimentary words he uttered; but she imagined them; which was all the same, so far as the effect upon her state of mind was concerned.

"Now, Mrs. Bullfinch," said a gentleman, as soon as Fanny retired from the piano, "you will favor us with a song."

There was not a moment's hesitation. The invitation just accorded with her wishes. She arose, and, crossing the room, took her seat at the instrument. Never, perhaps, in her life, had Mrs. Bullfinch thrown so much power and expression into her voice, as on this occasion. For a time, conversation was hushed; and, as her voice died away into silence, murmurs of pleasure and admiration reached her ears from all sides; but, she listened in vain for the voice of Wellford. What would she not then have given, could she have looked upon him; but too many eyes were on her; she dared not turn herself towards the part of the room where she knew he was standing in company with Fanny Milnor.

The moment Mrs. Bullfinch retired from the piano, she threw a hurried, but stealthy glance, towards Wellford. How her heart sunk, and fluttered. His back was towards the instrument at which she had been seated, and he was bending to Miss Milnor, whose countenance manifested the interest she felt in his words.

Soon after this, Mrs. Bullfinch's absence from the drawing-rooms was remarked. She had complained of indisposition to her husband, and he, quite ready to withdraw her from a company so fraught with trial and temptation, suggested their return home, to which she consented. Their retirement was made unobtrusively, and was known, at the time it took place, only to their hostess. Many questions and surmises followed, as soon as they were missed, and, as is usual in all such cases, some of the latter, from a slight suspicion of the truth, took the form of rather distinct affirmations, in which the presence of an old lover, and his indifference, or attentions to a new idol, made a pretty broad foundation.

The true cause of Helen's wish to retire, was a sudden and overwhelming conviction of the danger and sinfulness of the thoughts and feelings that were permitted to rule in her bosom. Some good angel had lifted the veil from her eyes, and enabled her to see herself as she was; the sight produced a fearful shudder, that thrilled her whole being.

"Am I not a wedded wife?" she whispered to herself,—and as the full meaning of the words stood out in living relief before her, the shudder went, if possible, still deeper.

Crouching beside her husband, a feeling almost like guilt in her heart, the unhappy woman rode home in silence. To his kind, even tender inquiries, and obtrusive suggestions of remedies for her indisposition, Mrs. Bullfinch forced herself to reply gently, and with some small acknowledgment in her tones of the real interest of which she was the subject. That her husband had full cause for the jealous suspicions he had manifested, she acknowledged to herself, with a sense of painful humiliation. This produced something of a new feeling towards him; duty, more clearly seen, became the prompter of different actions, and led to a new, if compelled, external.

But, oh! What a trial was before her! These meetings with Wellford had blown into a flame the damped fires kindled years before, and which could not be permitted to blaze forth again without destroying honor and virtue; and now, though she sought to cover them from view, they burned still, consuming the very altar where they rested.

It was not in Mr. Bullfinch to comprehend the change which, from this time, was apparent in his wife. That it had something to do with Mr. Wellford, he, indeed, suspected, for he had not failed to notice the total indifference manifested by him; as well as his marked attentions to his niece, between whom he most sincerely hoped a matrimonial arrangement might take place. But he was far from giving his wife credit for the real state of mind from which she was acting. He had seen her but a little while before, apparently wholly absorbed in Wellford, and utterly indifferent to him;—Wellford made no return of this interest, while he plainly enough showed that, if he had ever loved her, he was about transferring his affections to another. The change in his wife, therefore, he attributed to no higher sources than disappointment and chagrin; and while he was gratified at her softened manners towards him, respect for her was in no way increased; nor did his jealous feelings lose their active suspicion.

The suddenly awakened interest in society, which Mrs. Bullfinch had manifested, as suddenly died out. The social season promised to be unusually gay, and invitation after invitation came in, often as many as two in a single week; but, in every case, regrets were sent, and the old man and his young wife were missed from the festive circles. Thus more than two months passed. Awakened to a sense of her duty as a wife, Helen had striven, during this time, though in a weak way, to make the home circle more cheerful than it had been. Her father's health was growing feebler every day, and it was now but rarely that he could venture abroad into the open air. His spirits, too, were low. A sense of dependence on Mr. Bullfinch, whose manner towards him had never been frank and cheerful; and worse than this, a consciousness that the food he ate, and the house that covered him, were obtained at the cost of his daughter's happiness, lay ever like a weight upon his bosom. In brooding over the ruin of her own hopes in life, Helen had failed to comprehend, as fully as the case required, her father's state of mind; but, now, her thoughts were turning to him with a wiser appreciation, and a loving desire to brighten, with warmer colors, the later days of his waning life.

Changed in her manner towards her husband, and more interested and cheerful in the home circle than before; and, at the same time, aware that such was the case, Helen was disappointed at not meeting from Mr. Bullfinch a looked-for appreciation of this new and better state of things. He had grown, all at once, silent, abstracted in manner, moody, and often captious. Money was supplied for the use of the family more sparingly, and with what seemed a grudging spirit. Frequently he would sit the evening through without speaking a word, unless addressed, and then his replies indicated an entire indifference on the subject to which his attention was called. Everything that did not exactly suit his tastes, was the subject of complaint, while nothing that was agreeable met with a single word of commendation. How often was his ear greeted with a sigh, that an expected pleasant look or tone would have prevented.

Thus the season was passing away, and Mr. and Mrs. Bullfinch had not ventured into any of the fashionable assemblages, since the evening at Mrs. Levering's. But now, invitations were received from a source that made the sending of regrets a doubtful expedient. They could not absent themselves without being misunderstood, and producing a state of coolness in friends particularly regarded.

So, with much reluctance, Mrs. Bullfinch prepared for another evening abroad. Even if she had desired a new dress for the occasion, the recent closeness exhibited by her husband, in regard to money, would have caused her to suppress the desire. That worn at Mrs. Levering's had never been used since, and her present love of appearance was not strong enough to make her desire another. So, making a few changes in this dress, which was of rich material, by which the effect was diminished instead of heightened, she attired herself for the occasion, and in doing so, studied simplicity instead of ornament, to an extent which, governed as it was by good taste, rendered her appearance really more attractive than before. With the effect produced, Mr. Bullfinch was particularly struck, while, at the same time, he was puzzled. The change in his wife, dating from the evening at Mrs. Levering's, he had never been able clearly to understand, although he had endeavored to account for it, and, at one time, pretty much to his satisfaction. That it had something to do with want of attention on the part of Mr. Wellford, he still believed. And now, he was at a loss to determine whether the new effects produced in her appearance by his wife, were really the result of indifference or design. Suspicious jealousy favored the latter view, while her total want of interest in society, manifested for some two months, led to a different conclusion. Be the reason what it might, Mr. Bullfinch resolved to keep an eagle eye upon her.

Much as Mrs. Bullfinch had striven to avoid effect in her dress, she was far from going to this third party, at the residence of Mrs. Floyd, in a state of mental indifference. While, under a strong sense of womanly virtue, she was repressing all voluntary interest in her old lover; and had sought, by avoiding society, to shun temptation; now, that there was a prospect of meeting him once more, she could not repress the wish to note the progress of events between him and Fanny Milnor. Hopelessness had produced, on the surface of her feelings, an icy calm—at least in reference to Wellford; and, if the waters beneath were at any time troubled, threatening to break the congealation, a strong effort of the will repressed the agitation. She did not, therefore, wish to attract attention; but rather desired the privilege of an observer without being observed.

There were few who had met Mrs. Bullfinch at Mr. Lane's and Mrs. Levering's, who were not struck with the marked difference in her appearance, and who were not as much interested in her as before; but the interest was altogether of another kind. Before, there was about her much of the brilliant woman of the world, and many, while attracted and admiring, said, in their secret thought, that she was heartless. Now, changed states of mind had subdued what before led to a light estimation of her character; and evidences of suffering softened towards her many who, on the previous occasions, would not have hesitated in the utterance of words that would have struck her like barbed arrows.

Wellford was present, and also Miss Milnor, and it was plain to see that a very good understanding existed between them. Not, as before, however, did the former keep entirely aloof from Mrs. Bullfinch. At Mr. Lane's, he had observed her closely, and listened to the observations of others. The character she had assumed and the impression she made, produced on his mind an unfavorable conclusion. At Mrs. Levering's, he was less pleased than before. In fact, he was shocked at her taking the piano, immediately after Miss Milnor had risen from it, and striving, as was too evidently the case, to eclipse her performance. That she was playing and singing for his ears, he understood too well; and while not insensible to the fact that she still regarded him with affection, his virtuous feelings were shocked at her effort to awaken an interest in his mind when she was the wedded wife of another. Purposely, therefore, did he refrain from manifesting even a knowledge of her presence; and when she so suddenly retired, at an early hour, and he heard her indisposition remarked upon, he did not err in his interpretation of its meaning.

Once drawn from his self-imposed seclusion, Mr. Wellford, after tasting the pleasures of social life, and, more particularly, after making the acquaintance of Miss Milnor, needed no persuasion to induce him to mingle in society. Helen was married; and, in her marriage, violence to his respect for her had been committed. Why, then, should he make himself a hermit on her account? She was no longer any thing to him. An impassable gulf had been thrown between them. Thus he reasoned with himself, and gradually gained accessions of internal sustaining power. He felt that social intercourse was good for him; and from this preception, as well as from inclination, he was led to go much into company.

Wellford did not, of course, fail to notice that, after the evening at Mrs. Levering's, Mrs. Bullfinch, from some cause, no longer went into company. Nor did he fail to notice, on her reappearance at Mrs. Floyd's, that she had assumed a new character altogether; or, rather, fallen back into her own. After carefully observing her for some time, and remarking an entire absence of what he had before thought a gay, almost heartless, manner; and also remarking that she no longer fixed on him the strangely penetrating glances that really haunted him, at Mrs. Levering's, and which he avoided, by seeming not to be aware of her presence, at Mr. Lane's, he began to feel differently towards her, and very soon made his way to her side.

Even the sharp, suspicious eyes of Mr. Bullfinch saw little in the manner of either his wife or Mr. Wellford to add fuel to the flame of jealousy. Both were guarded carefully, and guarded by the surest protection, that of virtuous principle. While the latter had no desire to rob the husband of his true dower, the affections of his wife, the former, conscious that every truant thought, or cherished regard for her old lover, was sin, kept even, by a powerful effort, the pulsations of her heart.

What a trial—shall we say a triumph?—it was to both! No, not altogether a triumph. "Love never dies. The heart that has once loved truly, loves on forever." The fires may be hidden, but they burn on. Ashes may lie on the altar, but there is a latent fire beneath them.

For a while they conversed—the old lover and his lost idol—and, to each ear, how full of music, sweet as the songs of childhood, were the voices that filled them! Then, Mr. Wellford, feeling that his soul was going out towards her, as if drawn by a spiritual magnet, forced himself away. The struggle was not apparent, even to Mrs. Bullfinch; nor did the quick ear of her husband detect the sigh that breathed from her lips, as the young man withdrew from her side.

And now, for Wellford's eyes, a strange eclipse had come over the face of Fanny Milnor, and her voice had lost many tones of melody. He drew again to her side, but failed to become interested as before. He wondered at this, sighed, yet not audibly, and then experienced a sense of relief, as he remembered that he had not, up to this time, uttered a word for her ears that could be construed into lover-like preference. It did not escape the observation of Fanny, that, from this time, during the evening, Wellford was less constant, than heretofore, in his attentions. Why this was so, she had no suspicion, or she would not have been so unwise as to remark, on finding him near her—

"My uncle's wife looks twenty years older than when married. The wine of her life has soured. Yet, who wonders—or who pities her?"

There was, certainly, no pity in the tones of the young lady's voice, but rather a feeling of triumph. Wellford made no reply; but, in a little while, he left her side, and did not seek her company again during the evening. From that time, she had no attractive power for him. Occasionally he had been a visitor at her residence, but he called there no more, and, when, on the next occasion of her being in company, her eyes searched the crowded rooms for the form now most attractive to her eyes, it was nowhere to be seen. Nor did she meet him again at any of the closing parties for the season.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Winter closed, and spring came with its genial airs and the fragrance of budding leaf and opening blossom. To Helen, the season had been one of no light trial. Another page in the book of her life had been turned, and the writing thereon told the story of a new and a bitter experience. And now, sorrow was to be added to her cup. She must stoop to the waters of Marah, yet untouched by the leaf of healing.

Through the long winter, Mr. Lee's health had been growing worse and worse. To the milder season, his wife and daughter looked forward with anxious interest. It had come, but, to the drooping invalid, it came not with a blessing. Anxiety changed to alarm. Instead of gaining sufficient strength to ride out, the softer airs of spring relaxed his system; and now, when he had permission to leave his room, a mere descent to the parlors caused so much fatigue, that it was not again ventured upon.

An occasional walk across his chamber, supported by his wife or daughter, soon made the extent of Mr. Lee's bodily exertion. This did not long continue. Next, the sitting up for a few hours each day was as much as his strength would bear—then, entire physical prostration came. Life's pulses beat weaker and less evenly—the end was nigh.

From some cause, the feelings of Mr. Bullfinch had been greatly soured against Mr. Lee. For months, he had scarcely treated him with common civility. After he was confined to his room, he never visited him, and it was but rarely that he made inquiries as to the state of his health. The beginning of this dislike was his strong opposition to the marriage of his daughter, and the plainness of his speech prior to that event. Many things then said had never been forgotten; and, in treasuring them, memory had given added force to their meanings. The declining health of Mr. Lee was to Mr. Bullfinch, therefore, less a source of pain than pleasure. If he thought of his death at all, it was with a sense of relief. His presence was a burden and an annoyance; and he cared not how soon he were rid of both. Such could not be the state of her husband's mind, without the fact being perceived by Helen. How exquisite the pain it occasioned! It was to secure comfort, and freedom from care and a sense of dependence, for her father, that she had consented to become the wife of Mr. Bullfinch. All, and more than all the dreaded suffering, she had endured twice told, while the hoped-for good was denied! How the fine, manly qualities of her father's mind had smarted under a sense of dependence, which he had been made to feel! And was Helen ignorant of this? Alas! No. Her own perceptions were too quick not to comprehend all this. As for the mother, her want of womanly tact and delicacy increased the evil. Towards her, Mr. Bullfinch entertained a most profound dislike, which he was at no pains to conceal. Not unfrequently, warm words passed between them; and more than once he had intimated, pretty broadly, that if she did not interfere less with his views and comforts, he would feel called upon to speak in a way that might not be altogether agreeable. What this meant, Mrs. Lee readily comprehended, and the hint was not lost.

As Mr. Lee grew weaker and weaker, he could not bear to have his daughter away from him a moment; and she had little desire to leave him. They were much alone; for Mrs. Lee took from Helen the care of the household. As life waned slowly, and drew nearer and nearer its mortal close, the thoughts of Mr. Lee reached themselves more and more heavenward; and yet, how constantly were these upward soaring thoughts drawn back to rest upon the earth—how often he sighed, as their wings were folded in his bosom!

Not many words passed between him and Helen, beyond kind enquiries and grateful replies. From the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Their hearts were full—full to oppression, and struggling for utterance—but they dared not give voice to their thoughts. How often the daughter's light hand was laid tenderly on the forehead of her father, now resting there with a gentle pressure, and now smoothing away the thin hair that scarcely hid his temples. How often were her silent lips pressed to his pale forehead—or her cheek, in sudden excess of tender feeling, laid close against his own. And then, how earnestly and lovingly they would gaze at times into each other's eyes; gaze until their light was dimmed by gathering moisture. Beautiful, yet sad—exquisitely sad—was this daily intercourse between the father and daughter. And all the while their hearts were oppressed for utterance; yet, silence was felt to be a sacred duty.

One day, as Helen sat thus by her father, who had been silent, as usual, for some time, he said—

"There is always consolation in the night, Helen."

The remark roused Mrs. Bullfinch from a kind of mental lethargy into which she had fallen.

She bent over her father, and looked at him inquiringly.

"There is always consolation in the night," repeated Mr. Lee, and he smiled as he spoke.

"From what source?" asked Helen, in partial abstraction of thought.

"The morning is sure to break," was answered, with something of an exultant tone, as if a new truth, or the strong realization of an old one, had come to his mind.

"To give," returned Helen, unguardedly and bitterly—"a clearer view of the ruin which has been wrought in the darkness."

"Dear child! Say not so!" quickly returned Mr. Lee, in an altered voice. "The morning of which I speak reveals not wreck nor ruin."

"Forgive me, dear father!" said Helen, forcing a smile. "I spoke unguardedly. Oh, yes; there is, I trust, such a morning."

Yet, as she uttered the words, "I trust," there was doubt, and lingering sadness in her tones.

"There is such a morning for all who will look, in hopeful trust, to its breaking," said Mr. Lee. "It is not an earthly morning. For me, it will soon break, love; and I trust I am ready to welcome it when it dawns."

Helen tried to answer, but her lips quivered, and she remained a few moments voiceless. Then she hid her face on her father's bosom and wept.

"It will break for you, dear father," said she, on recovering herself. She spoke with composure, yet deep feeling. "And it will break, I know, ere long. But oh! When you leave me, what shall I have to lean upon? When the morning breaks for you, colder and darker will the night close around your unhappy child. My father—"

Her slender form quivered for a few moments; then she was able to grasp the rein that had left her hand suddenly.

"Oh, my father," she said, speaking from an impulse that would no longer be governed by any considerations, "ere you go, pray that I may have strength to bear my burdens. They are not light, believe me; and, under their pressure, I feel myself growing weaker. Oh! How often have I longed to open my heart to you, dear father! To tell you all I have suffered, to show you with what patience I have striven to bear all and to endure all. Yet how weakly and hopelessly have I struggled! You could have understood me—you could have sympathised with me; and, in my weakness and ignorance, have helped and instructed me. Ah! my steps have well nigh slipped. But, thank God! I have been able to tread the rugged path of duty, though with bleeding feet. How it will be when your daily presence no longer speaks to me of the right, I cannot tell."

Mr. Lee had grasped a hand of his daughter, so soon as she began thus to unbosom herself, and was now holding it tightly in both of his. A flood of emotions was sweeping through his mind; but he was able to control himself, and to speak with composure.

"I will still be very near to you, my sweet one!" said he, and he even smiled as he looked intently at her.

"My guardian angel!" exclaimed Helen, unable to restrain herself, as a new thought flashed into her mind. "May God in His mercy grant it!" And she again hid her weeping face on the breast of her father.

"He will grant it," whispered Mr. Lee, faintly. "Love conjoins the spirit. We shall only know a bodily separation. Our souls will be intimately present, as now. When the morning breaks for me, love, it will break in some measure for you also. In my light, you shall have light. In my renewed strength, strength shall flow down to you. No, no, Helen: your night shall neither be colder nor darker, because mine has passed away. God bless you, my child!"

Feebler and feebler had grown the voice of Mr. Lee, through this sentence; and his earnest "God bless you!" was but just audible. When Helen lifted her head, as his lips ceased their utterance, she was alarmed at the deathly hue that overspread the countenance of her father. The sudden cry of anguish that burst from her heart, reached her mother's ears, in a distant apartment, which brought her quickly to the chamber. As the two bent, with pale faces, over the husband and father, whose sands of life were running low, nature rallied feebly, and he whispered—

"Not yet—not yet. But the night will soon come—and the morning!"—he added, while a faint smile lit up his wan features.

An hour later, and Helen was again alone with her father. Mr. Lee had slept for a portion of the time. The curtains were closed that the light might not disturb him. Helen sat near the bedside, her head resting on the back of an easy-chair, and her eyes closed. A few rays, that struggled through a small opening in the window drapery, were resting on her forehead, and throwing a mellowed light over her pale countenance. From his brief slumber, Mr. Lee had awakened, and while Helen sat thus, his eyes rested upon her young, but thin and pain-marked features, that were beautiful, though faded. How early in life for the fading! What were the father's thoughts and feelings, as he lay there, with his eyes on that suffering countenance, can only be imagined. He gave them no utterance in words. Inexpressibly sad was his face, so sad that its hue was instantly caught by that of Helen, as she suddenly unclosed her eyes, and saw that her father had awakened.

"Dear father!" said she, tenderly, starting forward, and placing, as she was wont to do, her hand on his forehead. What pleasure that soft touch ever gave him!

A smile chased, instantly, the sadness away.

"The morning will soon be here, love," he faintly murmured.

"Oh, my father! I cannot bear this," said Helen, with an anguish she strove not to conceal. "I try to think of the morning; but I see only night—dark, starless night!"

"I would not pain you, dear child!" replied Mr. Lee, tenderly, drawing her cheek down, and touching it with his lips, "by turning your thoughts to the approaching change; but in the little while I have to remain with you, I wish, if possible, to impart strength to your mind, even though I must sow in tears. May you reap in joy! Amen!"

For a little while, the eyes of the dying man were closed. If to his outward ear came no response, in spirit he heard the fervent "Amen" that answered to his own.

"Helen," said he, as he looked again into her face, "I know your trials, your patient endurance, your long suffering. But out of all these will come, I trust, purification. As gold tried in the fire may you be, when our Heavenly Father comes to make up his jewels."

"Only what is developed here can be perfected there. Is this not so, father?" Helen lifted a finger as she spoke, and pointed upwards.

"It is so, I believe," answered Mr. Lee. "But why make this enquiry, my child?"

Helen laid her hand on her bosom, and sighed heavily, but did not reply to the question. Her father partly comprehended her meaning, but it involved a subject that neither felt willing to approach nearer; yet, on which, of all others, Helen most longed to unburden herself to some one who could comprehend her, and who could throw some light on the dark path of duty, along which she was moving with wearied limbs and bleeding feet.

A long silence followed, yet thought was busy in the minds of both. At last, Helen, with the manner of one who had forced herself into a doubtful utterance, said—

"Father, I do not love Mr. Bullfinch, nor did I ever love him. I married him from motives which I see to be wrong. Even the good I expected from the sacrifice has not been attained in anything like the anticipated measure. Daily, since our unnatural union, has he grown more and more repugnant to me. I have striven against this, but the strife is hopeless. Nature will speak out. Now, father, what is my duty?"

Mr. Lee, while he knew to what his daughter made allusion, in the beginning, was hardly prepared for this broad declaration. He did not reply, immediately, for he saw not clearly how to answer.

"What is my duty, father?" she repeated. "Forgive me for thus disturbing the hours that should be sacred to thoughts of eternal life. But, oh! my father, when you leave me, to whom shall I go for counsel? If words of wisdom reach not my ears now, they may never come. You have sought my confidence in this sad and solemn time. Shall I give it freely?"

"Freely, my child, freely!" replied Mr. Lee. "Keep nothing back. I am fully prepared to hear. God is giving me strength for the hour."

"What, then, is my duty?" There was now a stern calmness about the daughter. "I do not love Mr. Bullfinch. I have failed to make him happy. The union is altogether external and of constraint. Had I not better leave him?"

"Helen! My child!" exclaimed the father, his wan face flushing. "Who has thrown such a thought into your mind? What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder," he added, solemnly.

"This union was not of God," replied Helen. "It had its origin in selfishness and false principles."

"Did you not refer it to God, and invoke His sanction, in your submission to a solemn ordinance of the church? Were you not joined together by His minister and representative? Surely you were! The conjunction was not of external constraint in a sense that took from you a consentation of the will. Formally and solemnly you presented yourselves, and formally and solemnly wedded each other; and now you cannot abandon the assumed relation without sin."

Helen bowed her head, while her father was speaking. He paused, but she still bent her head, and listened.

"Did you not prothuse Mr. Bullfinch to be to him all that a wife should be, even until the end of life?"

"A wife should love her husband," said Helen. She spoke without raising her head.

"True."

"I promised love—promised it when I knew I could not give it."

"Love goes not out at the bidding; but outward obedience to a known duty is possible. You promised to keep your husband in sickness and in health. If you fail in part, fail not in all, my child. If, as a wife, love is an utter impossibility; yet, in an unselfish seeking of your husband's good; in a daily, earnest endeavor to make him happy, something of interest may and will be awakened. You cannot do this, without softening and humanizing his character, and making him better fitted for a higher and purer life than he has yet lived. In brooding over the ruins that fill the chambers of your heart, you only neglect the offices which are required of one in your position. The trial is great, I know; but having assumed such momentous responsibilities, do not abandon them, as you value your soul's safety. God has joined you together, not in the orderly union He would have provided, but in the disorderly one provided by your own mistaken judgments. The bond is just as sacred, and must be kept whole until the end. This is the divine law; not made arbitrarily, but for the good of those who are to live in obedience to what it requires. Better, far better will it be for your own spiritual good—and this is, in fact, the only real good—to bear the cross that you have taken up, and bear it even to the end. It will be sowing in tears, I know, my child; but there will come a harvest of joy."

The father ceased speaking, but Helen neither raised her head, nor replied. Deeply had his words penetrated her heart, and with a strong sense of conviction; yet, so intently had her mind brooded over the thought of a separation from her husband, that she had already come to think of it with a kindling sense of pleasure. All this was now extinguished. The dim light—the false light which had burned in the dark chambers of her mind, flickered and went out. How cold and gloomy was all before and around her! And yet, her father's dying words, while they swept away a false hope, gave new strength for greater endurance.

"Though rough and thorny be the way,
My strength proportion to my day."

In these words, familiar from childhood, she lifted, almost involuntarily, her suffering heart upwards, and, as she did so, a better light dawned upon her, a light felt to be the true precursor of a coming day.

"You have spoken truly, my father," said Helen, breaking, at length, the long silence. "I cannot, innocently, abandon the position so unwisely assumed."

"Not while your husband remains faithful to his vows at the marriage altar. Mere alienation of mind is no warrant for breaking so holy a bond."

"There is something that I can do, father." Helen's voice was warmer in its tones, as she said this; while a flush lighted, dimly, her face.

"What is it, love?"

"I can forget myself more than I have done, and be more thoughtful of my husband. In many things I can promote his comfort. Ah! I have been too indifferent. How strong the conviction strikes me now! Dear father! How blind to duty a selfish brooding over my own disappointed feelings has made me. I have not denied myself for another's good. But, God helping me, I will live differently in the future."

"My spirit leaps with pleasure to hear you thus speak, my good, my true-hearted child," said Mr. Lee, tenderly. "God will help you. The very wish to bend action to duty, brings Him near with His sustaining power; and the silent prayer for strength is never uttered in vain. He will keep you. May His blessing rest upon you! Amen!"

Mr. Lee placed his hand on the bent head of his daughter, and lifted his eyes upward. Silently, for some moments, he prayed for her. Then his lids drooped slowly; the light of thought faded from his countenance, and he seemed unconscious of the present. The minutes glided by, and Helen, who knew that but few sands of life remained, began to feel a breathless suspense. A slight moving of the chest showed that respiration still continued. But a low, shuddering sense of fear was creeping along every nerve, and she was about laying her hand heavily upon him, and uttering his name in a quick voice, when his eyes slowly opened, and he looked up into her face with a quiet, heavenly smile.

"Peace—peace," he whispered, but so faintly that Helen bent low to hear him,—"All is peace. I go down into the waters, yet fearing no evil; for I can see across the dark river.—There are shining ones on the other side. They wait to receive me. Already my feet are on the brink—the waters have touched them. One parting kiss, dear child!"

They were his last words. As he uttered them, the door opened and the mother of Helen came in. With an effort, the dying man stretched his hands towards her, partly raised himself up, and fell forward on her bosom. When she laid him back on the pillow, his spirit was at rest forever.

As quickly as she could get away from the chamber of death, Helen fled to her own room, locked the door, and, sinking on her knees, lifted her bruised and suffering heart upwards, aspiring to Heaven on the wings of prayer. For a long time she remained thus, now weeping in abandonment of grief, now communing with her own heart, and now imploring strength for the future.

Word was sent to Mr. Bullfinch of the sudden death of Mr. Lee. On hurrying home from his store, he found his wife singularly composed. Her countenance, it is true, was inexpressibly sad, and her eyes red from weeping; but there was none of that wild abandonment of grief that he had expected to see—no irrational wailings; none of that utter prostration of body and mind which so often accompanies deep affliction. He could not but wonder at this, nor help feeling an involuntary respect. He doubted not the suffering—in the endurance, therefore, was something that struck him as sublime, and gave him a new impression of her character. Tenderly he spoke to her, and, with a kindness that she gratefully felt, offered brief, yet fitting words of condolence.

This bereavement, destined, now, to harmonize many antagonisms—to make somewhat smoother the path they were treading—would, but for the dying interview between father and daughter, have been the signal for a violent disruption of the bonds which held together this ill assorted couple. An evil seed had been cast into the mind of Mrs. Bullfinch; it had found life there, and was sending up its first tender leaves. Watered and nourished, it would soon have attained size and vigor. Amid its branches, night-birds would have found shelter, and beneath its gloomy shade the green things of her heart would have perished utterly. But, the father's dying hand had plucked the evil plant, and the tender roots lay sapless in the sunshine.

CHAPTER XXIV.

There are few to whom affliction does not come as an angel of mercy; few, who do not rise out of the fiery trial purified, in some degree, from the dross of worldly-mindedness or self-seeking. This was eminently so in the case of Mrs. Bullfinch. The starless night she had feared, did not come. The morning that broke upon her father, lent a few rays that struggled through the clouds darkly curtaining her horizon; and threw light on the rugged path she was destined to tread, thus helping her to step between the flinty rocks on which her feet would have been torn, had she groped in the darkness. To her mind, the dying words of her father were ever present; the tones in which they were uttered, still sounded in her ears with a solemn impressiveness. Though dead, he yet spoke to her in a living voice.

New states of mind never exist without producing a corresponding external. The state inspires the thought, and thought flows into action. Deeply conscious of having been, thus far, unfaithful to the pledges involved in her marriage; and earnestly purposing now to do her duty to her husband as far in her lay, it was not strange that Mr. Bullfinch soon perceived a change in his wife, that affected him agreeably. The moodiness, and sharp ill-nature, which she had from time to time exhibited, were no longer apparent. Upon his fretfulness, under slight disappointments, or fault-finding spirit when things did not please him, she no longer reacted as of old; but, to his surprise, meekly bore his captious words. Moreover, little discomforts, from which he so often suffered, were no longer apparent.

And what was quite as agreeable to him, his rather epicurean tastes were consulted to a degree not known since Fanny Milnor resigned the care of his household.

In the orderly progress of cause and effect, a change soon showed itself in Mr. Bullfinch. His former cheerfulness did not return—there were reasons outside of his domestic relations affecting this—but, the ill-nature from which his family had suffered, disappeared; and the deference that his wife manifestly extended to his wishes, excited in him an inclination to defer also. Thus, constrained good will, and consequent good offices, produced good offices in return. The death of her husband greatly subdued Mrs. Lee, and so removed her disturbing influence.

If, in this new order of things, Mrs. Bullfinch did not find the beginnings of genuine affection for her husband, she yet experienced the birth of a new interest, that induced a closer observation. Much of the time she saw that his brow was clouded, and his mind either deeply abstracted, or evidently disturbed. More earnestly she sought to know his wishes; more sedulously strove to meet them in every particular. That she was successful in her desire to make his home pleasant, she had many reasons to conclude; still, the troubled aspect of his countenance remained; and his silence and abstraction grew deeper. A few times she sought to penetrate the cause of this change, but he gently repelled or evaded her enquiries.

In the sunless sky bending over Mrs. Bullfinch, the moon had risen to give its mellow, guiding light; but that sky was not long to remain cloudless. Either her closer observation of her husband revealed causes of anxiety, if not alarm, or he was beginning to acquire a habit exceedingly dangerous at all ages, but more particularly so for one at his time of life. Both wine and brandy he had always used on his table. Of the propriety of this, Helen had never, up to the present time, seen anything to awaken a doubt. But, now, she began to remark the frequency with which he filled his glass, and the stupor that often came after dinner. Could it be possible, she asked herself, and with a feeling of alarm, that he was becoming inordinately fond of stimulating drinks? The very question gave a new excitement to her fears, and quickened her observation.

It was not long before all doubts gave place to painful certainty. Occasionally, Mr. Bullfinch went out in the evening to spend an hour with some old friend. From one of these visits he returned rather later than usual, and so much under the influence of drink, as to be exceedingly foolish. In less than a week the same thing occurred again. From these, as well as other indications, it was but too apparent whether his over-indulged appetites were carrying him. He had pampered them until they were too strong for the rein, which, in times past, he was able to hold with a vigorous hand.

Morning usually found Mr. Bullfinch silent and troubled, his mind brooding over something, of which he showed no inclination to speak; while, it too often happened, that evening found him so heavy with excess of wine, as to be utterly stupid. As time wore on, this increased.

At length his manner became unusually excited, while his countenance showed the existence of intense anxiety. His breakfast would be taken hurriedly, and often full half an hour elapsed beyond the dining period—usually so promptly observed—before he returned from his store. Let us make the cause of this change more apparent to the reader.

Mr. Bullfinch had taken his silent and hastily eaten breakfast, one morning, during the time of which we are speaking, and was on his way to his store, when a mercantile friend overtook him.

"Have you seen the morning paper, Mr. Bullfinch?" enquired this gentleman.

"No," was answered. "I never see the papers until I get to my store. Any news of interest?"

"Another bad failure in New York is reported."

"Who?"

"L— & J—."

"Impossible!"

"Too true, I fear. They have been, for some time, greatly extended."

"I declare! It begins to look frightful," said Mr. Bullfinch, his manner indicating great uneasiness of mind.

"It does, indeed," was the equally concerned reply.

"Do they owe you anything?" asked Mr. Bullfinch.

"No, thank fortune. The owing part is on the other side, this time."

"Ah! you're lucky."

"So I think. But, how is it with you?"

"I wish I could say the same. But, I sold them a bill just four months ago. The note fell due in New York yesterday. If they have actually failed, the protest will come to hand this morning."

"What amount?"

"Twenty-three hundred dollars."

"Bad. Was the note discounted?"

"Yes: and this makes it so much the worse. I shall have to provide for it, on a day that is already burdened quite heavily enough."

The other shook his head, and put on a very grave countenance.

"How will you stand, to-day?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, after a pause. "Should this note come back under protest, I shall want to raise a couple of thousand dollars. Are you likely to have anything over?"

"Not a cent," was the unequivocal reply.

"Not a cent. I've been on the borrowing list for a week, and see no prospect of getting off of it for a month to come."

The two men parted here, their ways diverging. With a quickened step Mr. Bullfinch hurried on to his place of business. The news of L— & J—'s failure proved to be too true. Letters from New York not only confirmed it, but the protest on their unpaid note made assurance doubly sure.

Without this additional weight, Mr. Bullfinch had quite as much to carry for that day, as he could well bear. Intently as he had pondered the ways and means within his power, he was not yet able to see how his other payments were to be made; nor, after much thought and effort continued for some two hours, did the prospect before him grow any brighter. At length, after one of the heavy sacrifices, which, of late, he had been obliged to frequently to make, he obtained sufficient money to lift his own notes, but the protested note of L— & J— was yet unprovided for. This bid fair to prove the last pound that "breaks the camel's back." Every dollar of paper he had received, up to this time, for sales of goods, had been either passed through bank, or was in the hands of private money-lenders. No resource was left but that of borrowing money from mercantile friends, to be returned in a day or a week, as the case might be; and he had, already, made application in all quarters likely to afford the needed relief, in the effort to meet his legitimate payments.

Time flew by on rapid wings, and banking hours were fast drawing to a close; still the needed supply of money came not into the hands of Mr. Bullfinch. The old man's heart began to faint. That terrible ultimate in a merchant's life, failure, loomed up before his mental vision in its most frightful aspects, causing a shudder to reach his very heart.

It was past two o'clock, yet the deficit in his money matters for the day was just twenty-three hundred dollars, the amount of the protested note. To a merchant, who had been in the habit of lending him freely, but who had that morning failed to accommodate him as usual, he made application a second time.

"You must raise me a couple of thousand," said Mr. Bullfinch. "That note of L— & J—'s is still in the notary's hands, and my regular payments for the day have exhausted all the day's resources."

"Impossible," was the firm answer; "utterly impossible. We had five thousand dollars in protested drafts to provide for, besides our usual payments, which were very heavy."

"Has any body got anything over to-day?" asked Mr. Bullfinch, in a half-despairing tone.

"Nobody that I have heard of, except Lane, Latta & Co. They are as easy as an old shoe. Some one told me, yesterday, that their bank account always showed a balance to their credit of over ten thousand dollars."

"Possible!" The old man seemed partially stupified by this declaration.

"Try them," said the merchant.

Mr. Bullfinch shook his head.

"You'll get what you need for to-day, I have not the smallest doubt. See Mr. Wellford. He has most to do with the financial concerns of the establishment, and will lend you all you want at a word."

"No—no—I can't go there." There was a quickness of tone, and an unusual mark of feeling in the old man's voice.

"Why not? You want the money, and can get it for the asking."

"I'll try some where else," said Mr. Bullfinch, turning from the merchant, and walking hurriedly away. As he reached the street, his eyes rested on the face of a clock. What a large segment of a circle the minute hand had described since he last marked the hour! The old man's heart beat quicker and stronger. Two evils were before him—mercantile dishonor, or an application to Wellford for a temporary loan. He had no time now to cast about for any other resource: and, even the one that seemed to offer, must be used quickly if used at all.

It would be hard to describe the feelings of Mr. Bullfinch, as he dragged himself along in the direction of Lane, Latta & Co.'s. No physical suffering could have been so dreaded, as was the meeting with Mr. Wellford, to whom he knew the application for money must be made.

"Is Mr. Wellford in?" he asked, in a voice far from being as composed as he could wish, on entering the store.

"You will find him back in the counting-room," was answered, and the old gentleman moved down the store. It so happened that Wellford was alone in the counting-room. He saw Mr. Bullfinch approaching, and, having heard that he was a loser by the failure in New York, inferred at once the purport of his visit.

"Mr. Bullfinch. How are you?" said he kindly, as he advanced to meet him. Seeing that the old man was much embarrassed, he anticipated his request by saying—

"Can we do anything for you, to-day?"

"If you have some twenty-three hundred dollars over, you can," was stammered out.

"We can check for as much," said Wellford, cheerfully. "How long will you want it?"

"For three or four days, if you can spare it so long," replied Mr. Bullfinch.

"Say for a week," replied Wellford, as he stepped back to a desk, and took down the check-book.

A few minutes after Mr. Bullfinch entered the store, he came out with a check in his hand for the sum needed. In one respect, his mind was relieved; but, in another, it was heavily burdened. There was not a man living from whom an obligation could have been received with more reluctance. Nothing but the fearful consequences just ready to be visited upon him, would ever have driven him to this resort.

It did not escape the observation of Mrs. Bullfinch, when her husband came in, much later than usual, to dinner, that he was suffering from more than ordinary disturbance of mind; nor did she fail to remark that, while he ate with none of his accustomed relish for food, he drank wine almost as freely as if it were water. The consequence she dreaded, came. When he arose, at length, from the table, he was so much affected by the unusual quantity of wine taken, that Helen had to assist him up stairs. Insensibility followed, from which he was not aroused until a late tea hour, when he took a single strong cup of coffee, and then went out for the evening. At eleven o'clock he came home, in little better condition than when he left the dinner table. In the morning, he was himself again, and prepared for another day's struggle with fortune. A too distinct remembrance of the previous day's trials, and especially the mode in which he had saved himself from ruin, in no way tended to the promotion of a cheerful spirit. Heavily contracted his brow, as he sat at the unenjoyed and silent breakfast.

"Can you let me have some money, to-day?" asked Mrs. Bullfinch, as he arose from the table.

The words of his wife seemed most unwelcome, for his already knit brows gained instantly a few more lines, and he said, rather impatiently—

"Money! For what? How much do you want?"

"None for myself," replied Mrs. Bullfinch, in a voice which showed that she was hurt by his manner. "The bread bill and milk bill have not yet been paid, and the waiter wants twenty dollars that are due her."

"Very well:—milk man, bread man, and waiter, can't be accommodated," said Mr. Bullfinch, gruffly.

"I told them all that they should have their money to-day," said Mrs. Bullfinch, in some perplexity of manner.

"Can't help it. They must wait. Money don't always come when you call for it. At least, not to me."

And without waiting a reply from his wife, whose flushing face warned him that he had spoken too unguardedly, Mr. Bullfinch turned off abruptly, and left the house.

CHAPTER XXV.

We need not linger to trace, successively, the downward steps taken by Adam Bullfinch, whether as a man or a merchant. Accumulating years, and sensual indulgence, had united to dim the clearness of his intellect. A merchant of the old school, if he had been wise enough to keep to the old school doctrines of caution, close calculation, and contentment with moderate, but sure returns, all would have been well with him in respect to worldly goods. But, having taken a young wife, Mr. Bullfinch felt himself quite a young man, and must needs act as he felt. "The mind," he vainly said to himself, "never grows old. The body may bend with accumulating years; but the immortal soul knows not the touch of time. I have now a brighter and stronger intellect, a clearer reason, than I possessed twenty years ago, and am more capable of doing business—and more far-seeing as a merchant."

And so, Mr. Bullfinch, pulling up the old landmarks—despising the old-fashioned lessons of wisdom, by an adherence to which he had slowly accumulated a fortune, threw himself forward in a contest with the sharp, shrewd, unscrupulous, nothing-venture-nothing-gain class of merchants, and in a wonderfully brief period, came out of the struggle an utterly ruined man.

Having broken the ice with Mr. Wellford, Mr. Bullfinch, as his efforts to save himself grew more and more desperate, forced himself to make repeated applications in that quarter, and in most cases with success.

"I'm afraid," said the resident senior partner of the house, speaking one day to Mr. Wellford, "that old Bullfinch is not in a safe condition."

"I begin to have some doubts myself," was answered.

"Some one told me, this morning, that he takes too much wine."

A shadow passed over the young man's face, as he said—

"O no. That must be a mistake."

"I hope so; but, his appearance rather confirms the assertion."

A mercantile acquaintance coming in at the time, the subject was continued, and the question asked as to his opinion of the old gentleman's habits.

"I'm told, on good authority," was unhesitatingly answered, "that he drinks like a fish,—never goes to bed a night in his life that he is not stupid as a beast."

Wellford sighed deeply. His thought was with Helen; and his sympathy for her painfully excited.

"What do you think of his business?" inquired Mr. Lane.

"He's sound, I suppose."

"He seems hard run for money just now," said Mr. Lane.

"I know; and, what is more, has been paying enormous rates for some months past."

"No man is safe in these times," was remarked.

"That's true enough. Men who seemed firm as the eternal hills, have toppled over, involving numbers below them in utter ruin. As for Bullfinch, I have, between you and me and the post, my own private opinion for my own private action."

"What is that?" inquired Wellford.

"As to the opinion, I need not speak; the action will be sufficiently demonstrative. In a word then, I declined selling him a bill of goods yesterday."

"You did!"

"It's true."

"Of what amount?"

"Five thousand dollars. Do you want to know why?"

"Of course."

"This, then, for your ears. Two or three days ago I saw certain packages, just arrived from New York, taken to his store; and, yesterday morning, I saw the same packages sold at auction, below the market price. Do you understand?"

"Clearly."

"An hour afterwards he wanted to make a good round bill with me, but I declined."

"And you were right," said Mr. Lane, firmly. "We are obliged to you for the hint. We have been lending him pretty freely of late; but shall have to be less liberal of our favors."

Scarcely had the neighbor left the store, when Mr. Bullfinch was seen to enter.

"You mustn't lend him any thing more," said Mr. Lane.

"Very well," replied the younger partner, averting his face.

Mr. Lane retired to his own private counting-room, and Wellford met the old man, who came up to him in a half cringing manner, yet, evidently, under a strong feeling of reluctance.

"How are you off for money to-day?" inquired Mr. Bullfinch, in a low voice.

"Nothing to spare," was the firmly spoken answer.

"Will you want the three thousand I was to return this morning?"

Wellford reflected for a few moments, and then replied:

"If it will be any accommodation to you, that may be deferred until to-morrow. But we will certainly want it then."

"Thank you—thank you. I will bring it around in the morning. Are you certain you can't spare a thousand to-day?"

"Quite certain."

"Good morning;" and the old gentleman, with a disappointment he could not conceal, retired from the store.

It was after two o'clock, and Wellford was about leaving to go home and dine, when Mr. Bullfinch confronted him again, and said, with a beseeching earnestness—

"You must help me, once more, my young friend."

"Impossible." And Wellford shook his head.

"Don't say that. If you haven't a thousand dollars in bank, lend me your check dated two or three days ahead; that will answer my purpose just as well."

Wellford repeated his negative.

"You must help me," said Mr. Bullfinch, much excited. "I am just one thousand dollars short, and have tried every possible means to raise the money. Frankly and confidentially"—he bent close to Wellford's ear—"I have come to you as my last resort. If you do not help me now, I shall be protested."

There was something in the old man's voice that Wellford could hardly withstand. It would have been withstood, however, had not a vision of Helen come to his mind. Silently he turned to his desk, and filling up a check for a thousand dollars, handed it, without a word, to Mr. Bullfinch, who, grasping it nervously, hurried away to prolong, for a brief season, the unequal struggle he was endeavoring to maintain.

On the next day, he did not call to return the three thousand dollars, as he had promised Wellford. The loan of an additional thousand, after what had passed between Mr. Lane and his junior partner, displeased the former a good deal, and caused him to speak so plainly that the latter was hurt and slightly offended. Some rather sharp words passed between them, which, but for the good sense of both parties, might have led to an open rupture, and a consequent withdrawal of Wellford from the house.

On the day but one following, the mercantile community was startled by the announcement of another failure—that of Adam Bullfinch; and a very bad failure it proved to be. When, under an assignment, his affairs were subjected to investigation, it was found that he was hopelessly insolvent. Nor were his creditors at all satisfied with the reckless manner in which he seemed to have been doing business for some time. Goods had been purchased on credit, in large quantities, and sent immediately to neighboring cities and sold at auction, for cash, at less than the purchase prices; enormous discounts had been submitted to on temporary loans; and other doubtful and reckless expedients resorted to, by which means thousands and thousands of dollars had been wasted. This was his new mode of doing business, in accordance with the more enterprising spirit of the times, into which the increasing vigor and clearness of his mental powers were enticing him!

Had Mr. Bullfinch stopped payment six months before, he would have come out with a clear surplus of over fifty thousand dollars. But, in struggling, and sacrificing, and hoping for some new turn of fortune, under the impulse of his modernized views of business, he wasted everything to such a degree, that even borrowed money debts were unprovided for, while his whole estate was so impoverished, that the most sanguine would have sold out their claims against it for forty cents on the dollar! His business indebtedness to Lane, Latta & Co. was five thousand dollars, and his obligations to the same house, for borrowed money, six thousand more.

So utterly insolvent was the estate of Mr Bullfinch, that his application for an extension of time, in order that he might go on and recover himself, was at once voted down in the meeting of creditors. His assignment was accepted, and the net value of the estate realized as quickly as possible.

The house in which Mr. Bullfinch resided was his own, and was worth about ten thousand dollars. It was, however, under mortgage for nearly its full value. Two or three smaller houses were also included in the deed of assignment. Through the personal influence of Mr. Wellford, one of these, with the household effects of the debtor, were presented, by the creditors, to Mrs. Bullfinch. But for the fact, that one or two of the creditors, who had heard something of Wellford's former relation to Mrs. Bullfinch, and who not only highly respected the young man, but were men enough to appreciate his motives and feelings in the present case; but for the fact that these, we say, seconded the generous proposal, the family of the broken merchant would have been left homeless as well as penniless.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Mr. Bullfinch was not the man to pass through so terrible an ordeal, and bear the pain with but few external marks of suffering. The degree of agitation exhibited, when no eye but that of his wife saw the anguish of his spirit, was, at times, fearful to look upon. And yet, almost to the last, he hid from her the cause, notwithstanding she appealed to him, again and again, in the tenderest manner, to make her the sharer of his trouble. At last, the truth could no longer be concealed. Up to the final moment, he struggled to sustain himself with a tenacity of mercantile life rarely shown. All was activity and profound agitation, until hope spread out her pinions and flew away! Then a deep calm fell upon his spirit.

"It is all over," said he, in a composed voice, to his confidential clerk. "I have done all in human power to accomplish. The crash is coming, at last. Whether I shall come out alive from beneath the ruins, or be crushed to death by the fall, is more than our weak foresight can determine. I think I am prepared for the worst; but we are only mortal, at best."

The state of mind in which her husband had, for weeks, returned from his business, caused Mrs. Bullfinch to look, daily, for his coming, with something of dread. On this particular occasion, the dinner hour had long passed, yet he was still away. This, as it was not an unusual thing, caused her no greater concern than she had been daily suffering. At last, she heard him enter, and listened with more interest, perhaps, than common to his deliberate step, as he moved along the passage, and ascended the stairs. It was the old, familiar tread, to which her ear had become accustomed; and yet, there was something in it that marked a change in her husband's state of mind—whether favorable, or otherwise, her instincts were not informed—and she waited, with partially suspended respiration, his entrance. One glance sufficed. She saw that—whatever had been the causes from which he had suffered so profoundly of late—the struggle was over. His brow, where deep lines had fixed themselves for months past, was smooth, as if anxious care had never laid thereon a finger; but, smooth as it was, it reflected not a single ray of light. His eye had lost its quick motion, and now looked heavy and fireless. His lips, long so tightly drawn together, or arched with earnest thought, were gently parted, and almost expressionless. His body, usually erect, was slightly bent forward. He was an impersonation of hopelessness, yet patient endurance.

"Mr. Bullfinch!" exclaimed Helen, starting forward, and laying her hand, with an earnest pressure, on his arm, "what has happened?"

"Sit down," said he, in a voice so strangely unfamiliar to the ears of his wife, that the tones chilled her, "and I will tell you all. Concealment were no longer a virtue."

Helen suffered him to lead her to a chair. Taking one beside her, and still holding her hand, he continued—

"Helen—when I asked you to become my wife, I was rich. I offered you all the comforts and elegancies that wealth could buy. Even with these to lay at your feet, I have failed to make you happy. Heaven knows the pleasure it has ever given me to see a smile light up your countenance—alas! how few and feeble they have ever been."

He uttered the last words quickly, and with a slight unsteadiness in his voice. A moment he averted his face, and then resumed—

"Helen, as I have just said, when I asked you to become my wife, I was rich. But, this day, I am a beggar!"

He paused, and looked anxiously into the face of his wife. The change he had expected was not visible. She did not start, nor grow pale, nor weep.

"Did you understand me, Helen? I said that I was a beggar. When I married you, I promised all the good things that wealth could procure. This day, I am reduced to poverty."

"Wealth alone," replied Helen, in a composed voice, "never made a heart happy. True satisfaction of mind has its source in a higher spring."

The old man was greatly moved by so unexpected a reception of his communication. He had long since let go the delusion, that, for any other attraction than his wealth, his wife had consented to wed. She had plainly enough declared this in the beginning, but, in his blind self-delusion, he would not believe the assertion. Alas! In what rigid and unmistakable forms had the truth been since presented to his mind. Now that wealth was gone, he felt that the only uniting bond was severed, and, in the hopeless spirit of a martyr, he made this declaration of his changed fortunes.

No wonder such an unexpected reception of his announcement moved him deeply.

"Did you understand me, Helen?" he asked.

"I believe so," she answered.

"I am rich no longer. This day, I have failed to meet my payments, and, to-morrow, all I have in the world must be surrendered to my creditors. Do you comprehend the meaning of all this?"

"Clearly," said Helen.

"But can you bear the change that comes inevitably?"

"I have borne it once," she replied. "I can bear it again."

"Once!"

For an instant, Mr. Bullfinch did not comprehend his wife. But memory quickly made all clear. Her father had, from wealth, been reduced to extreme poverty. How well he remembered all the events connected with Mr. Lee's failure, and the not over-generous part that he had acted as a creditor for a small amount.

"Ah! now I remember," he said, his voice falling.

"I have borne reverse of fortune, once," repeated Helen, "and I can bear it again; with some fortitude, I trust, for I am stronger, now."

Mr. Bullfinch gazed upon his wife in silent wonder. There were no marks of pain or fear on her countenance, that wore an elevated, truly dignified aspect. With what a shrinking reluctance had he looked to this stern necessity—how he had dreaded the effect upon his wife of the announcement she had received so calmly! For a little while, he was sustained by her fortitude. This, however, was but temporary. The consequences to himself were too direct and all-embracing; and he had too long rested for happiness in the external things that wealth and social position gave, to meet such utter ruin with any philosophical resignation whatever.

It was soon apparent to Mrs. Bullfinch, that her husband had fallen never to rise again. That, in the destruction of his earthly fortune, self-control, under the pressure of appetite and habit, and self-respect also, were both to a great extent involved. If the announcement of his loss of property had in no way appalled her, the too certain signs of this personal abandonment, as they became more and more visible, day after day, began to startle and alarm her with glimpses of a profounder depth of suffering, if that were possible, than any she had yet been called on to endure.

A week or two elapsed before Mrs. Bullfinch began to comprehend the exact position of her husband's business. Finding that, under the pressure of a great calamity, he was fast losing all manly control of himself—in fact, drowning thought, daily, in excessive quantities of wine or brandy, she took direct means for ascertaining the state of his affairs. That is, she called upon a merchant who had frequently visited at their house, and in whose good feeling and truthfulness she had entire confidence. From him she learned, that the declaration of Mr. Bullfinch, to the effect that he was a beggar, was no figure of speech. It was then that she began to feel dizzy, as her eyes wandered down the dark chasm which had suddenly opened at her feet, and she could see no bottom. Had her husband retained his balance of intellect, personal activity, and entire control of his appetites, she would have met the change with few emotions strong enough to leave an external sign.

But, unhappily, this was not so. Each recurring day made but the more apparent the rapidity with which he was sinking all the manly qualities of his nature—drowning everything of good that remained in the cup of utter confusion. Morning found him sober and serious enough. A few hours were then devoted to the business of conferring and acting with the assignees of his property. Dinner-time brought him home usually the worse for repeated glasses of brandy; while the afternoon, and often the evening, were spent in sleeping off the effects of deeper potations.

One day he came home greatly agitated.

"All gone!" he exclaimed, on meeting his wife.

"Everything swallowed up. Ruin! utter ruin!"

"I know the worst," said Helen.

"They will leave us nothing! House,—household effects—everything is to be swept away! I never saw such rapacity—such want of humanity."

It is scarcely to be wondered that the face of Mrs. Bullfinch grew paler now; nor, that her lips were tremulous as she said—

"They will at least spare us these." And her eyes glanced around the room in which they were sitting.

"Nothing. All must go! It is dreadful! Let a man once become unfortunate, and his fellow men hunt him to the death as if he were a criminal."

Mrs. Bullfinch replied not. But her thoughts were busy with new images, that took more fearful and repulsive forms.

As it had been for weeks before, it happened on this afternoon, Mr. Bullfinch sought temporary oblivion in wine.

(CONCLUSION IN NEXT NUMBER.)

A respectable tradesman, with a large family, having sustained a serious loss of property by the failure of some relations, for whom he had become security, was asked by a friend (after he had pulled through his liabilities) what means he had adopted to surmount difficulties which would have crushed the spirit and damped the energies of ninety-nine out of a hundred. "By two very simple expedients," was the reply: "one was to sell my horse and gig, and the other to buy two new aprons."

The error of a moment is often the sorrow of a life.

FIRST AND SECOND LOVE.

(Beloved and most beautifull
I gaze upon thy face—
Upon thy slender form, replete
With every winning grace;
And, oh! I tremble when I think
How dear to me thou art;
Wert thou to die, how desolate
Would be my vacant heart!)

I pass each evening in my walk
The little churchyard lone,
And I see the moonlight shining
On one white gleaming stone;
The lilies growing round that grave
Look fair in the moon's ray;
But she who sleeps beneath that stone
Was fairer far than they.

She was a lovely, gentle girl,
With eyes of Heaven's blue,
And cheeks whose soft tint put to shame
The earliest rosebud's hue.
I loved her, wooed her; but she was
A treasure lent—not given;
And, ere we wed, her gentle soul
Fled to its native Heaven!

And sometimes, in the lonely hours,
When far away thou art,
I look into that sepulchre
Of buried joy—my heart.
And Memory brings back the face
Of her, my seraph bride—
And that sad morning in the spring,
That May morn when she died!

(But, oh! I loved her not as I
Love thee, beloved one!
She was my life's sweet morning star,
Thou art its glorious sun!
Though long I wept, when she fled back
To her fair home on high,
Wert thou to perish so, beloved!
I would not weep—but die!)

JUPITER'S CHOICE.

A MYTH.

BY MRS. SOPHRONIA CURRIER.

The king of the gods walked forth one day—
It is thus the ancient fables say—
Not yet had mortals learned to raise
A temple to the monarch's praise,
Nor through a form of earth or sea
Had dared approach his majesty;
And Jupiter pondered: of all he had made,
What most his mightiness displayed?

The oak threw out his branches wide,
And thus he spoke in his strength and pride:
"A simple acorn to earth was hung,
And thence has the boast of Tellus sprung,
Whose summit looks down on Olympia's height,
Whose roots have pierced to Erebus' night,
With Neptune who copes for the rule of the sea;
Meet emblem I, great Jove, of thee!"

An eagle stayed in his course to the sun,
And thus his royal accents run:

VOL. I.—No. 3.

3

"The king of the air, to the King of Heaven,
Only supremacy hath given.
No dust of the earth has stained his breast,
His eyrie is poised on the mountain crest,
Where he views thy dart with a dauntless eye,
And scoffs at the whirlwind hurrying by.
No emblem meet, great Jove, of thee,
But the mountain eagle, proud and free!"

The rose and the lily their arms entwined,
And thus their mutual wish combined:
"My cheek is as bright as the sunset's glow,"
"My heart is as pure as the mountain snow,"
"And sweet as radiant," "sweet as fair,"
"Naught with us can earth compare;
Then grant us, mighty Jove, to be
The types of purity, grace, and thee!"

"Oh, mighty Jove!" so gold began,
"Come share with me the homage of man;
I rule the lord, I rule the slave,
From the baptismal font to the unblest grave.
The king of the air, of the earth and the sea,
And pureness and beauty, must yield to me!"

"And thou?" The silent marble heard,
And answered in calm, unboastful word:
"Where life is not given, death is no sin;
What thou hast made me, I have been!"

A temple to Jove might mortals rear,
So the Oracle answered prayer.
Chaplets of oak to the fane were brought,
And the lily and rose in his vesture were wrought;
The eagle stood with outstretched wing,
Low at the feet of the mighty king;
And burnished gold was the royal throne—
But the god looked forth from the silent stone.

ANNIE.

(I've a sweet little pet!—she is up with the lark,
And at eve she's asleep when the valleys are dark,
And she chatters and dances the blessed day long,
Now laughing in gladness—now singing a song.
She never is silent!—the whole summer day
She is off on the green with the blossoms at play;
Now seeking a buttercup—plucking a rose,
Or laughing aloud as the thistle she blows.

She never is still!—now at some merry elf,
You'll smile as you watch her, in spite of yourself;
You may chide her in vain, for those eyes, full of fun,
Are smiling in mirth at the mischief she's done,
And whatever you do—that same thing, without doubt,
Must the mischievous Annie be busied about;
She's as brown as a nut, but a beauty to me,
And there's nothing her keen little eyes cannot see.

She dances and sings, and has many sweet airs,
And to infant accomplishments, adding her prayers.
I have told everything that the darling can do,
For 'twas only last summer her years number'd two.

She's the picture of health—and a southern-born thing,
Just as ready to weep as she's ready to sing,
And I fain would be foe to the lip that hath smiled
At this wee bit of song of the dear little child.

PIONEERS OF THE WEST.

[From Mrs. Ellet's new book, "The Pioneer Women of the West," published by Charles Scribner, we take the following interesting extracts:]

ELIZABETH TAPPEN.

Elizabeth Harper was the second daughter of Alexander and Elizabeth Harper, and was born February 24th, 1784, in Harpersfield, New York. She was in the fifteenth year of her age when she accompanied her parents to Ohio, in 1798, and was the oldest daughter who went with them, her eldest sister having been married some years and remaining in their old home.

The labors and perils of commencing a settlement in an almost unbroken wilderness, encountered by all who took part in this adventurous enterprise, were shared without a murmur by the young girl, to whom fell, of course, no small part of the work of the household and the care of the younger children. The novelty of their mode of living, and the wild forest scenery, with incessant occupation, caused the time to pass speedily and pleasantly through the first summer; but with the approach of a more rigorous season, their hardships commenced, and the death of her beloved father brought before the bereaved family the realities of their situation, far from early friends, and isolated from the comforts of civilization. Elizabeth suffered much at this time of gloom and distrust, with a longing for home, and fears for the future; but the fortitude and resolution with which Mrs. Harper sustained herself under the pressure of calamity, had a due influence on the minds of her children, and the feeling of discontent was soon subdued.

During the absence of James, who went to Canada, to procure provisions, another son, William, broke his leg. The other boys were seven and nine years old, and as they could do nothing of consequence, the work of providing firewood for use in the house devolved entirely, for some four weeks, upon Elizabeth, and her younger sister, Mary. It was no easy task to cut, split, and bring home all the fuel consumed, as the cabin was very open, and large fires were required.

The prospects for the approaching winter were very dark, owing to the scarcity of provisions and the want of comfortable quarters; and Mrs. Harper thought it best to send her younger daughter to stay with some friends at a settlement in Pennsylvania. She determined not to accept the invitation for herself, and Elizabeth decided to stay with her mother. The winter proved one of unusual severity, and the settlers suffered greatly from the want of provisions after the wreck of the only vessel on the southern shore of Lake Erie, their supplies having to be brought from Canada. Twice the little community was reduced almost to the point of starvation, having to relieve the cravings of hunger with strange substitutes for wholesome food. On the last occasion, when the men sent for supplies returned, they brought with them a small quantity of coarse Indian meal boiled, which was called samp. Mrs. Harper warmed a portion of this, and making some tea, called her family to partake of the simple meal, then a luxury privation had taught them to appreciate. Most of the children felt sick from absolute want, and disinclined to touch the food; but, after tasting it, they were so eager for more, that it required all the mother's firmness to restrain them from taking more than they could bear in so weakened a state.

It has been mentioned that a quantity of wheat raised in Pennsylvania, was brought on hand-sleds a distance of fifty miles on the ice to the settlement, and ground in a small mill belonging to one of the families. It was Elizabeth's work to grind that required for her family. She would take a peck of wheat and walk two miles and a half to grind it, then carry home the meal and make it into bread. The mill would grind no more than a bushel of grain in a day when constantly in use, and three families were to be supplied. The men being occupied in bringing the wheat and attending to other necessary duties, the grinding was chiefly done by the women.

Many of the cattle belonging to the settlers died this winter, and some of the oxen disappeared, supposed to have been killed and carried off by the Indians. The disaster that caused so much inconvenience the following season—the breaking of the little mill which had been so useful—set them upon the invention of a substitute. A hole was burned and scraped in the top of an oak stump, large enough to hold a quantity of corn, which was then pounded as fine as possible with a pounder attached to a spring pole resembling a well-sweep, the heavy end being fastened to the ground. This contrivance was called a mortar. Their ovens were equally primitive. As neither brick nor stone was to be had, a stump was hewn perfectly flat on the top, and a slab hewn out and laid upon it. On this the women spread a layer of clay, and placed upon it wood heaped up in the form of an oven, covering the whole except a small opening at one end, with a thick layer of clay. It stood a short time to dry, and then the wood was set on fire and burned out. The oven thus manufactured proved an excellent one for use, and served as a model for all the ovens in the country for some years afterwards.

In the autumn of the second year of the settlement, Mrs. Wheeler, Mrs. Harper's eldest daughter, came with her husband and family, and they took up their residence in a cabin they built half a mile from that of the widow. They were joined by several other families soon afterwards.

Some anecdotes of their encounters with the wild beasts of the forest are remembered in family tradition. One summer evening in the third year, when William Harper was returning about dusk from Judge Wheeler's, his attention was arrested by the sight of a bear just in the path before him, engaged in devouring a hog he had just killed. William fired at the animal without apparent effect, and was hastily reloading his gun, when the bear desisted from his meal, and started in pursuit of the new enemy. Fortunately, a large tree was near at hand, which the young man ran round, the bear closely following and tearing off pieces of the bark in his fury. William contrived, while dodging him, to load his gun, and fired eleven times before the enraged animal fell to the ground: then, completely exhausted by the efforts he had made to keep the foe at bay, he hastened homeward, and met his brother, who alarmed by hearing reports in such rapid succession, had come to look for him. On going to the spot the next evening, they found the bear quite dead, with ten of the eleven balls in his body, the tree being entirely stripped of bark as high as he could reach.

It was not long after this that Elizabeth, while staying with her sister in the absence of her husband, was alarmed by an attack from one of these ferocious animals. A crazy woman belonging to the settlement had come to stay the night in the house. Late in the evening they heard a noise among some fowls roosting upon the projecting logs of the cabin, and going to the door, they distinctly saw a large bear standing on his hind legs, trying to reach the fowls, that crowded together in their terror above the range of his paws. It required all of Elizabeth's presence of mind and energy to prevent the lunatic from rushing out; but by alarming her fears, she persuaded her to be quiet, and fastened the doors. A more severe encounter took place some years afterwards, in the house of her brother. A hungry bear broke into the yard, and attempted to catch a goose wandering on the premises. Mrs. Harper, the sister-in-law, hastily called to her children to come in, and barred the door; but the fierce creature had heard the sound of her voice, and bent on securing his prey, sprang through the open window, and attacked her. Her clothes were much torn, and her arm badly scratched; but her husband and a man who chanced to be with him coming to the rescue, they beat off the bear with clubs, and killed him. The fright of Mrs. Harper had such an effect upon her that she suffered in health for many years.

When the school was established in 1802, the earliest on the Reserve, Elizabeth Harper was employed to teach it. The following winter Abraham Tappen was appointed to take charge of it, and some of the scholars came from distant settlements. The school was taught alternately by Tappen and Miss Harper during the winter and summer, for some years. Religious meetings were established about the same time.

In 1806, Elizabeth was married to Abraham Tappen, then engaged as a surveyor, and employed in equalizing the claims of land-holders. His duties compelled him to be absent from home during a great part of the time, and after they were settled, the labor of superintending the clearing of a new farm devolved upon the wife. The work was done, however, with an energy and cheerful spirit worthy the daughter of such a mother; and a substantial foundation was thus laid for future comfort and prosperity. For a few years the youthful couple lived in a small log hut containing but one room, in which it was necessary very frequently to entertain company, as Tappen's acquaintance and business associations with land owners and land agents brought strangers continually to his house, and the duties of hospitality were esteemed sacred in the most primitive settlements. Mrs. Tappen was often obliged to spread the floor with beds for the accommodation of her guests; and the abundance of her table, and the excellent quality of her cooking, could be attested by many who from time to time were the chance inmates of her cheerful home. At that early period an unaffected kindness of feeling, poorly replaced in a more advanced state of society by the conventionalities of good breeding, prevailed among the settlers, and some families were sincerely attached to each other. Good offices were interchanged between neighbors every day, and a friendly intercourse maintained by frequent visits. These were often paid from one to another, even when a journey of fifteen miles on horseback, occupying a whole day, had to be performed. The alarms and accidents to which a new settlement is liable, tended also to bind the emigrants together for mutual assistance and protection. One of a number of similar incidents, which occurred in 1811, caused much trouble to the Harper family. A son of Mrs. Wheeler, nine years of age, had gone out alone to gather chestnuts. The afternoon was sultry, and he was thinly clad, but it was not long before a terrible storm of wind and rain came on, prostrating acres of the forest, and swelling the streams in a little while to torrents. Just before dark, Mrs. Tappen received a hasty summons to go to her sister, whom she found half frantic with fears for the missing boy. The alarm quickly spread, the neighbors assembled, and people came from a distance of fifteen or twenty miles to aid in the search, which was continued through the next day and the following one, without success, till near the close of the third day, when the child was found in so exhausted a state that in attempting to rise he fell upon his face. His limbs were torn and filled with porcupine's quills.

Not very long afterwards, another boy belonging to the settlement was lost in the woods, and the members of his family, in the search for him, called his name aloud repeatedly. It may not be generally known that the panther, which at this time came frequently near the dwellings of man, emits a cry resembling a human voice in distress. The calling of the boy's name was several times answered, as his friends supposed, and after following the sound and hallooing some time, they discovered that the voice was not human. In a state of torturing anxiety and apprehension, they were obliged to wait for daylight, when the boy made his appearance. He had wandered in an opposite direction from the panther's locality, and had found shelter at a house, where he remained all night.

The experience of Mrs. Tappen during her residence in the backwoods was full of such incidents. But the forest around them gradually receded before the axe of the enterprising emigrant, the country became cleared and cultivated, and with the progress of improvement the condition of the early settlers became more safe and comfortable. Judge Tappen and Mrs. Tappen still reside on the same farm which they first reduced to cultivation, about half a mile from the spot where her father fixed his dwelling on his first removal to the country. The little village of Unionville, in Lake County, Ohio, has been built partly on Judge Tappen's farm, and partly on the land formerly owned by his wife, the county line running through it.

LIFE IN THE WOODS.

The following sketch of life in the woods is extracted from an article written by John S. Williams, the editor of the American Pioneer:

"Emigrants poured in from different parts, cabins were put up in every direction, and women, children and goods tumbled into them. Everything was bustle and confusion, and all at work that could work. Our cabin had been raised, covered, part of the cracks chinked, and part of the floor laid, when we moved in on Christmas day! We had intended an inside chimney, for we thought the chimney ought to be in the house. We had a log put across the whole width of the cabin for a mantel, but when the floor was in, we found it so low as not to answer, and removed it. We got the rest of the floor laid in a very few days; the chinking of the cracks went on slowly, but the daubing could not proceed till weather more suitable, which happened in a few days; doorways were sawed out, and steps made of the logs, and the back of the chimney was raised up to the mantel, but the funnel of sticks and clay was delayed until spring.

"In building our cabin, it was set to front the north and south, my brother using my father's pocket compass on the occasion. We had no idea of living in a house that did not stand square with the earth itself. This argued our ignorance of the comforts and conveniences of a pioneer life. The position of the house, end to the hill, necessarily elevated the lower end, and the determination to have both a north and south door, added much to the airiness of the domicile, particularly after the green ash puncheons had shrunk so as to leave cracks in the floor and doors from one to two inches wide. At both the doors we had high, unsteady, and sometimes icy steps, made by piling up the logs cut out of the wall. We had a window, if it could be called a window, when perhaps it was the largest spot in the top, bottom or sides of the cabin at which the wind could not enter. It was made by sawing out a log, placing sticks across; and by pasting an old newspaper over the hole, and applying some hog's lard, we had a kind of glazing which shed a most beautiful and mellow light across the cabin when the sun shone upon it. All other light entered at the doors, cracks, and chimney.

"Our cabin was twenty-four by eighteen. The west end was occupied by two beds, the centre of each side by a door, and here our symmetry had to stop, for opposite the window, made of clapboards supported on pins driven into the logs, were our shelves. Upon these shelves my sister displayed in order, a host of pewter plates, basins, dishes, and spoons, scoured and bright. A ladder of five rounds occupied the corner near the window! By this, when we got a floor above, we could ascend. Our chimney occupied most of the east end; pots and kettles were opposite the window under the shelves, a gun on hooks over the north door, four split-bottom chairs, three three-legged stools, and a small eight by ten looking-glass sloped from the wall over a large towel and combcase. These, with a clumsy shovel and a pair of tongs, with one shank straight, completed our furniture, except a spinning-wheel and such things as were necessary to work with. It was absolutely necessary to have three-legged stools, as four legs of anything could not all touch the floor at the same time.

"The completion of our cabin went on slowly. The season was inclement, and laborers were not to be had. We got our chimney up breast high as soon as we could, and our cabin daubed as high as the joists outside. It never was daubed on the inside, for my sister, who was very nice, could not consent to 'live right next to the mud.' My impression now is, that the window was not constructed till spring, for until the sticks and clay were put on the chimney we could possibly have no need of a window; the flood of light which always poured into the cabin from the fireplace would have extinguished our paper window, and rendered it as useless as the moon at noon-day. We got a floor laid overhead as soon as possible, perhaps in a month; but when it was laid, the reader will readily conceive of its imperviousness to wind or weather, when we mention that it was laid of loose clapboards split from a red oak, so twisting that each board lay on two diagonally opposite corners, and a cat might have shaken every board on our ceiling.

"The evenings of the first winter did not pass off as pleasantly as evenings afterwards. We had no corn to shell, no turnips to scrape, no tow to spin into rope-yarn, nor straw to plait for hats, and we had come so late we could get but few walnuts to crack. We had, however, the Bible, George Fox's Journal, Barkley's Apology, and to our stock was soon after added a borrowed copy of the Pilgrim's Progress, which we read twice through without stopping. The first winter our living was truly scanty and hard; but even this winter had its felicities. We had part of a barrel of flour which we had brought from Fredericktown. Besides this we had a part of a jar of hog's lard brought from old Carolina; not the tasteless stuff which now goes by that name, but pure leaf lard taken from hogs raised on pine roots and fattened on sweet potatoes, and into which, while trying, were immersed the boughs of the fragrant bay tree, that imparted to the lard a rich flavour. Of that flour, shortened with this lard, my sister every Sunday morning made short biscuit for breakfast.

"The winter was open, but windy. While the wind was of great use in driving the smoke and ashes out of our cabin, it shook terribly the timber standing almost over us. We were sometimes much and needlessly alarmed. We were surrounded by the tall giants of the forest, waving their boughs and knitting their brows over us, as if in defiance of our disturbing their repose, and usurping their long uncontested pre-emption rights. The beech on the left often shook his bushy head over us as if in absolute disapprobation of our settling there, threatening to crush us if we did not pack up and start. The walnut over the spring branch stood high and straight; no one could tell which way it inclined, but all concluded that if it had a preference it was in favor of quartering on our cabin. We got assistance to cut it down.

"The monotony of the time for several of the first years was enlivened by the howl of wild beasts. The wolves howling around us seemed to moan their inability to drive us from long and undisputed domain. The bears, panthers and deer but seldom troubled us. When spring was fully come and our little patch of corn, three acres, put in among the beech roots, which at every step contended with the shovel-plough for the right of soil, and held it too, we enlarged our stock of conveniences. As soon as bark would peel off we could make ropes and bark boxes. These we stood in great need of, as such things as bureaus, stands, wardrobes, or even barrels, were not to be had. Sometimes boxes made of slippery elm bark, shaved smooth, and the inside out, were ornamented with drawings of birds, trees, etc.

"We settled on beech land, which took much labor to clear. We could do no better than clear out the smaller stuff and burn the brush, &c., around the beeches which, in spite of the girdling and burning we could do to them, would leaf out the first year, and often a little the second. The land, however, was very rich, and would bring better corn than might be expected. We had to tend it principally with the hoe, that is, to crop down the nettles, the water-weed, and the touch-me-not. Grass, lamb's quarter, and Spanish-needles, were reserved to pester the better prepared farmer. We cleared a small turnip patch, which we got in about the 10th of August. We sowed timothy seed, which took well, and next year we had a little hay besides. The tops and blades of the corn were also carefully saved for our horse, cow, and the two sheep. The turnips were sweet and good, and in the fall we took care to gather walnuts and hickory nuts, which were very abundant. These, with the turnips which we scraped, supplied the place of fruit. I have always been partial to scraped turnips, and could now beat any three dandies at scraping them. Johnny-cake, also, when we had meal to make it of, helped to make up our evening's repast. The Sunday morning biscuit had all evaporated, but the loss was partially supplied by the nuts and turnips. Our regular supper was mush and milk, and by the time we had shelled our corn, stemmed tobacco, and plaited straw to make hats, etc., our appetites were sharp again. To relieve this difficulty, my brother and I would take a thin johnny-cake, part of which we would eat, and leave the rest till morning. At daylight we would eat the rest as we walked from the house to work.

"The methods of eating mush and milk were various. Some would sit around the pot, every one taking therefrom for himself. Some would sit at table and have each his tin cup of milk, with a pewter spoon, taking just as much mush from the dish or the pot as he thought would fill his mouth, then lowering it into the milk and taking some to wash it down. This method kept the milk cool, and by frequent repetitions the pioneer would contract a faculty of correctly estimating the proper amount of each. Others would mix mush and milk together.

"To get grinding done was often a great difficulty, by reason of the scarcity of mills, the freezing in winter and the droughts in summer. We had often to manufacture meal in any way we could get the corn to pieces. We soaked and pounded it, we shaved it, we planed it, and at the proper season, grated it. When one of our neighbors got a hand-mill, it was thought quite an acquisition to the neighborhood. In after years, when we could get grinding by waiting for our turn no more than one day and a night at a horse mill, we thought ourselves happy. To save meal we often made pumpkin bread, in which, when meal was scarce, the pumpkin would so predominate as to render it next to impossible to tell our bread from that article, either by taste, looks, or the amount of nutriment it contained. Salt was five dollars per bushel, and we used none in our corn bread, which we soon liked as well without it. What meat we had at first was fresh, and but little of that, for had we been hunters we had no time for the chase.

"We had no candles, and cared but little about them except for summer use. My business was to ramble the woods every evening for seasoned sticks, or the bark of the shelly hickory, for light. 'Tis true that our light was not as good as candles, but we get along without fretting, for we depended more upon the goodness of our eyes than we did upon the brilliancy of the light."

Howe relates an anecdote of one Henry Perry, who in the fall of 1803, after getting up his cabin near Delhi, left his two sons and returned to Philadelphia for the remainder of his family, but finding his wife ill, and afterwards being ill himself, could not get back till the next June. These two little boys, Levi and Reuben, only eleven and nine years old, remained there alone, eight months, fifteen miles from any white family, and surrounded by Indians, with no food but the rabbits they could catch in hollow logs, the remainder of one deer that the wolves killed near them, and a little corn meal that they occasionally obtained of Thomas Cellar, by following down the 'Indian trace.' The winter was a severe one, and their cabin was open, having neither daubing, fire-place, nor chimney: they had no gun, and were wholly unaccustomed to forest life, being fresh from Wales, and yet these little fellows not only struggled through, but actually made a considerable clearing! Jacob Forst, at an early day, when his wife was sick and could obtain nothing to eat that she relished, procured a bushel of wheat, and throwing it upon his shoulders, carried it to Zanesville to get it ground, a distance of more than seventy-five miles by the tortuous path he had to traverse, and then shouldering his flour retraced his steps home, fording the streams and camping out nights."

Dr. Hildreth says that for many years after the first settlement of Ohio, salt had to be brought across the mountains on pack-horses. "Those immense fountains of brine that now are known to exist deep in the rocky beds below, were not then dreamed of; it was supposed that the West would always be dependent on the Atlantic coast for salt, and deeply deplored as a serious drawback on the prosperity of this beautiful region. Although springs of salt water were known in various places, they were of so poor and weak a quality as to require from four to six hundred gallons of the water to make a bushel of salt; and when made, it contained so much foreign matter as to render it a very inferior article. Yet as it could be used in place of the imported salt, and saved the borderer's money, at that day not very plenty, it was occasionally resorted to by the settlers, who, assembling in gangs of six or eight persons, with their domestic kettles, pack-horses and provisions, camped out for a week at a time in the vicinity of the Saline. These springs were generally discovered by hunters, and were at remote points from the settlements."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

There is in the heart of woman such a deep well of love that no age can freeze it.

What home in after-life is beloved like the walls that girt round the innocent days of our childhood?

When our desires are fulfilled to the very letter, we always find some mistake which renders them anything but what we expected.

Every year of my life I grow more and more convinced that it is wisest and best to fix our attention on the beautiful and the good, and dwell as little as possible on the evil and the false.

Nothing sets no wide a mark between a vulgar and a noble soul, as the respect and reverential love of woman kind. A man who is always sneering at woman is generally a coarse profligate or a coarser bigot.

Of all learning the most difficult department is to unlearn; drawing a mistake or prejudice out of the head is as painful as drawing a tooth, and the patient never thanks the operator.

As every reflux of the tide leaves behind it a few shells to mark its course, so it is fitting that every violent excitement of the speculative spirit should bequeath to posterity some memorial of the errors it has caused and the mischief it has done.

When an opinion is violently attacked, it raises an attention in the persecuted party, and gives an alarm to their vanity, by making them think that worth defending and keeping at the hazard of their lives, which perhaps otherwise they would only have admired awhile for the sake of its novelty, and afterwards resigned of their own accord.

It is far from being true, in the progress of knowledge, that after every failure we must recommence from the beginning. Every failure is a step to success; every detection of what is false directs us towards what is true: every trial exhausts some tempting form of error. Not only so; but scarcely any attempt is entirely a failure: scarcely any theory, the result of steady thought, is altogether false: no tempting form of error is without some latent charm derived from truth.

The person who has not been a grandmother, knows nothing of the anxieties of this life. It is bad enough to have a drunken husband, but when you come to compare that affliction with two generations of croup, hooping-cough, and measles, you elevate a sprained ankle to the dignity of a broken leg, and class toothaches with apple-plexus.

PLEASANT VARIETIES.

When is a wall like a fish? When it is scaled.

Why is a chemist like a wit? Because he is furnished with good retorts.

Why is a man ascending Vesuvius like an Irishman trying to kiss a pretty girl? Because he wants to get at the crater's mouth.

Punch, speaking of the influence of good dinners, says there is no diplomatic dispute in this world so large that "it cannot be covered with a table-cloth."

The wife of a sexton in a country village, was haranguing her neighbors on the hardness of the times, when a man came up and offered some ducks for sale. "Ducks!" said the wife, "how can you suppose I can purchase ducks, when my husband has not buried a living soul these last three months?"

An English lady, on arriving at Calais, on her way to make a grand tour, was surprised, and somewhat indignant, at being termed, for the first time in her life, "a foreigner." "You mistake, madam," said she to the libeller, with some pique, "it is you who are foreigners—we are English."

During a recent fire, an old woman was very anxious to go through a street, which was considered at the time "dangerous," but all her efforts were unavailing. At length, she pushed one of the policemen aside, when that worthy preserver of the public peace said, "Now, marm, you can't pass; if you do, you'll be killed, and then you'll blame us afterwards."

Once on a time, a Frenchman and a Dutchman were travelling in Pennsylvania, when their horse lost a shoe. They drove up to a blacksmith's shop, and no one being in, they proceeded to the house to inquire. The Frenchman rapped, and called out, "Is de smitty wittin?" "Shtand back," says Hans; "let me shpeak. Ish der blacksmith's shop en der house?"

A maiden lady, suspecting her female servant was regaling her beau upon the cold mutton of the larder, called Betty, and inquired whether she did not hear some one speaking with her, down stairs? "Oh, no, ma'am," replied the girl, "it was only me singing a psalm!" "You may amuse yourself, Betty," replied the maiden, "with psalms, but let's have no hims, Betty. I have a great objection to hims." Betty curtsied, withdrew, and took the hint.

B——, who has since made quite a noise in the world, while at college, was called upon to undergo an examination in astronomy. On emerging from the ordeal, one of his companions asked him how he got off. "First-rate," said B——; "they only asked me two questions, and I answered them both promptly and correctly." "What were the questions?" "The first was, 'What is a parallax?' and I told them I didn't know! and the second was, 'Can you calculate an eclipse?' to which I said no! I'd like to see anybody answer two questions more correctly than that."

DOGIANA.

Whenever I feel a fit of low spirits approaching, my invariable resource is to call my dog, and invite him to a social ramble. There are few companions more agreeable than a dog. Friends may go out with you when they would rather stay at home; their minds are perhaps occupied with their own affairs, and often the merest trifle will withdraw their attention from you at a moment when you most require their sympathy. This is not the case with the dog: his whole attention is given to his master; he tracks his steps, watches his looks, and obeys his commands with docility and cheerfulness. Ingratitude cannot estrange him; even neglect fails to chill his constant love.

Whenever I meet any of my literary compatriots with a bilious-looking face, carrying into the field the same thoughts which had filled his mind in the study, I cannot help saying to myself: "What a pity he does not get a dog!" There is more in this than people at first sight may imagine; but when it is considered that the object of the student's walk is generally to rub away the cobwebs which intense study has engendered in the brain, to change the current of the thoughts, to unbend the overstretched mind, and to rest the wearied faculties, for all these purposes there is no companion like the dog; and, for a similar reason to that given by the witty Frenchman for frequenting the society of a lady who had not two ideas in her head—namely, "he went there to rest his mind." In like manner, I would recommend all who are suffering from petty cares and worrying trifles, to try the effect of a good brisk walk with their dog; it will do more to dispel the clouds of ill-humor and vexation that could be effected by the eloquence of a Cicero. The incessant scampering to and fro of the happy creature—happy that it has got its master for a companion and observer of its pranks—its heedless chase after sparrows, pigeons, or any other feathered and winged animal which has alighted on the ground—its wild baying and barking when full drive after the objects of pursuit—and anon its returning with panting tongue, sparkling eyes, and merry wagging tail, to look up in your face and receive its reward in a word of kindness—all, all is exhilarating, and helps wonderfully to enliven the dullness of a solitary stroll.

When my friends smile, as they occasionally do, at my partiality for this faithful friend of man, I defend myself by quoting the great men of antiquity who shared in the same sentiments. Alexander the Great was so grieved at the death of a favorite dog, that, as a relief to his sorrow, he raised a city in his honor. No one need be ashamed of writing in praise of dogs, when even Solon himself has not disdained to commemorate the following instance of affection in a dog called Hircanus, towards his master Lysimachus, king of Macedon. This prince being killed in a battle against Seleucus, king of Syria, his body was discovered in the field of battle by the plaintive cries of his dog, which was found lying beside it. On the obsequies of the king, Hircanus leaped on the funeral pile, and perished in the flames that consumed the body of his beloved master. When such authorities fail, I put my adversaries to silence by presenting them with a few passages from Washington Irving's delightful description of a visit to Abbotsford.

"After my return from Melrose Abbey," says he, "Scott proposed a ramble, to show me something of the surrounding country. As we sallied forth, every dog in the establishment turned out to attend us. There was the old and well-known staghound, Maida, a noble animal, and a great favorite of Scott's; and Hamlet, the black greyhound, a mild, thoughtless youngster, which had not yet arrived at the years of discretion; and Finella, a beautiful setter, with soft silken hair, long pendant ears, and a mild eye, the parlor favorite. When in front of the house, we were joined by a superannuated greyhound, which came from the kitchen, wagging his tail, and was cheered by Scott as an old friend and comrade. In our walks, Scott would frequently pause in conversation, to notice his dogs, and speak to them, as if rational companions; and indeed there appears to be a vast deal of rationality in these faithful attendants on man, derived from their close intimacy with him. Maida deported himself with a gravity becoming his age and size, and seemed to consider himself called upon to preserve a great degree of dignity and decorum in our society. As he jogged along a little distance ahead of us, the young dogs would gambol about him, leap on his neck, worry at his ears, and endeavor to tease him into a gambol. The old dog would keep on for a long time, with imperturbable solemnity, now and then seeming to rebuke the wantonness of his young companions. At length he would make a sudden turn, seize one of them, and tumble him into the dust; then, giving a glance at us, as much as to say: 'You see, gentlemen, I can't help giving way to this nonsense,' would resume his gravity, and jog on as before. Scott amused himself with these peculiarities. 'I make no doubt,' said he, 'when Maida is alone with these young dogs, he throws gravity aside, and plays the boy as much as any of them; but he is ashamed to do so in our company, and seems to say: 'Ha' done with your nonsense, youngsters; what will the laird and that other gentleman think of me if I give way to such foolery?'"

"While we were discussing the humors and peculiarities of our canine companions, some object provoked their spleen, and produced a sharp and petulant barking from the smaller fry; but it was some time before Maida was sufficiently roused to ramp forward two or three bounds, and join the chorus with a deep-mouthed bow-wow. It was but a transient outbreak, and he returned instantly, wagging his tail, and looking up dubiously in his master's face, uncertain whether he would receive censure or applause. 'Ay, ay, old boy,' cried Scott, you have done wonders; you have shaken the Eildon Hills with your roaring; you may now lay by your artillery for the rest of the day. Maida,' continued he, 'is like the great gun at Constantinople; it takes so long to get it ready, that the smaller guns can fire off a dozen times first; but when it does go off, it does great mischief.'

"These simple anecdotes may serve to show the delightful play of Scott's humors and feelings in private life. His domestic animals were his friends. Everything about him seemed to rejoice in the light of his countenance; the face of the humblest dependent brightened at his approach, as if he anticipated a cordial and cheering word. There was no guest at dinner but myself. Around the table were two or three dogs in attendance. Maida, the old staghound, took his seat at Scott's elbow, looking up wistfully in his master's eye; while Finnella, the pet spaniel, placed herself near Mrs. Scott, by whom, I soon perceived, she was completely spoiled. The conversation happening to turn on the merits of his dogs, Scott spoke with great feeling and affection of his favorite terrier, Camp, which is depicted by his side in the earlier engravings of him. He talked of him as of a real friend whom he had lost; and Sophia Scott, looking up archly in his face, observed, that 'papa shed a few tears when Camp died.' I may here mention another testimonial of Scott's fondness for his dogs, and his humorous mode of showing it, which I subsequently met with. Rambling with him one morning about the grounds adjacent to the house, I observed a small antique monument, on which was inscribed: 'Here lies the brave Percy.' I paused, supposing it to be the tomb of some stark warrior of the olden time, but Scott drew near. 'Pooh!' cried he, 'it is nothing but one of the monuments of my nonsense, of which you will find enough hereabout.' I learned afterwards that it was the grave of a favorite greyhound."

The following incident, for the authenticity of which I can fully vouch, is one proof amongst many that our best feelings, if not put under the control of sense and reason, may lead us into a thousand absurdities:—A gentleman called one day on a lady, accompanied by his dog, a fine bluff old fellow, with nothing of the courtier about him. After a little conversation, the lady asked her visitor if he would allow his dog to dine with her dogs, which were about to go to dinner. The gentleman, of course, made no objection, and accordingly a footman was summoned to carry the newly-invited guest to be introduced to the lady's dogs. For a time all seemed to be peace and harmony, when suddenly a tremendous uproar was heard in the dogs' dining-hall, and, in the midst of a chorus of bow-wows, the voice of the gentleman's dog rose above the whole. In great alarm, the lady hastily rang the bell. "John, what is the matter there?" "Oh, nothing, my lady; only the stranger dog don't like to have his mouth wiped after dinner!"

Dogs are not epicures by nature, but many have this vice ingrafted on them by injudicious kindness. I knew a spaniel so completely spoiled in this respect, that he would not eat his strawberries unless they were dipped in cream and sugar, and he would turn up his nose at a plate of cold meat with the air of a disappointed epicure. It has often gone to my heart to see the choicest parts of a fine leg of mutton cut off for a dog, while famishing fellow-creatures were perishing with hunger in the streets. The mistress of this dog once received a rebuke, which I hoped would be attended with good effect. On remarking one day to the footman that the baker's bill was very large, and that she thought it impossible that the family could use all the fancy biscuit that was charged, the man answered: "Why, ma'am, perhaps you forget that Carlos eats about a shilling's worth of biscuit every day!"

If anything can excuse an excessive fondness for dogs, it is their devoted attachment to their masters. In the course of my reading, I lately fell in with the following anecdotes, which illustrate in a remarkable manner the point in question:—

An officer, named St. Leger, who was imprisoned, at Vincennes, during the wars of St. Bartholomew, wished to keep with him a greyhound that he had brought up, and which was much attached to him; but they harshly refused him this innocent pleasure, and sent away the greyhound to his house, in the Rue des Lions St. Paul. The next day, the greyhound returned alone to Vincennes, and began to bark, under the windows of the tower, towards the place where the officer was confined. St. Leger approached, looked through the bars, and was delighted again to see his faithful hound, which began to jump and play a thousand gambols to show her joy. Her master threw a piece of bread to the animal, which ate it with great good-will. St. Leger did the same in his prison, and, in spite of the immense wall which separated them, they breakfasted together like two friends. This friendly visit was not the last. Abandoned by his relations, who believed him dead, the unfortunate prisoner received the visits of his greyhound, only, during four years' confinement. Whatever weather it might be, in spite of rain or snow, the faithful animal did not fail a single day to pay her accustomed visit. Six months after his release from prison, St. Leger died. The faithful greyhound would no longer remain in the house, but, on the day after the funeral, returned to the Castle of Vincennes, and it is supposed she was actuated by a motive of gratitude. A jailer of the outer court had always shown great kindness to this dog, which was as handsome as affectionate. Contrary to the custom of people of that class, this man had been touched by her attachment and beauty, so that he facilitated her approach to see her master, and also insured her a safe retreat. Penetrated with gratitude for this service, the greyhound remained the rest of her life near the benevolent jailer. It was remarked that even while testifying her zeal and gratitude for her second master, one could easily see that her heart was with the first. Like those who, having lost a parent, a brother, or a friend, come from afar to seek consolation by viewing the place which they inhabited, this affectionate animal repaired frequently to the tower where St. Leger had been imprisoned, and would contemplate, for hours together, the gloomy window from which her dear master had so often smiled to her, and where they had so frequently breakfasted together.

In January, 1799, the cold was so intense, that the Seine was frozen to the depth of fifteen or sixteen inches. Following the example of a number of thoughtless youths, who were determined to continue the amusement of skating, in spite of a thaw having commenced, a young student, called Beaumanoir, wished also to partake of this dangerous pleasure, near the quay of the Hotel des Monnaies of Paris; but he had scarcely gone twenty steps, when the ice broke under his weight, and he disappeared. The young skater had carried a small spaniel with him, which, seeing his master sink under the ice, immediately gave the alarm, by barking with all his might, near the spot where the accident had happened. It will easily be believed that it was impossible to give any assistance to the unfortunate youth, but the howlings of the animal warned others from approaching the fatal place. The poor spaniel sent forth the most frightful howls: he ran along the river as if he were mad; and, at last, not seeing his master return, he went to establish himself at the hole where he had seen him disappear, and there he passed the rest of the day, and all the following night. The day after, people saw with surprise the poor animal, sorrowfully, at the same post. Struck with admiration of such constancy, some of them made him a little bed of straw, and brought him some food; but, absorbed in the most profound grief, he would not even drink the milk which these kind-hearted people placed near him. Sometimes he would run about the ice or the borders of the river to seek his master, but he always returned to sleep in the same place. He bit a soldier, who was attempting to make him leave his inhospitable retreat, who, fearing that he was mad, fired at, and wounded him. This affecting example of grief and constancy was witnessed for many days, and people came in crowds to contemplate this beautiful trait of attachment, which was not without its reward. The dog, being only slightly wounded, was taken charge of by a woman, who, compassionating his suffering, and touched by the affection he showed for his late master, carried him to her house, where his wound was dressed, and every effort that kindness could devise was practised, to console him for the loss of the young skater.

A young student, of Montpellier, called Renaudin, being run over by a horse, which a little vagabond rode full gallop to the watering-place, his skull was fractured, and he died on the spot. A wolf-dog which he had reared, and which he had retained near him from infancy, threw himself on the body of his master, and began to howl in a dreadful manner. But who can describe the despair of the affectionate animal when he saw the body of the unfortunate youth enclosed in the coffin? Nothing, however, could separate them, and he followed him even to the tomb. Stretching himself on the grave, he refused all nourishment for five days; at last, at the end of that time, some of the comrades of the youth succeeded in making him eat a little bread dipped in milk; but he never would abandon his post; and there, in sunshine or storm, heat or cold, he remained. Loving him for his affection for their companion, the young students made a small house for him near his master's grave, and contributed morsels for his support. The affectionate animal remained there for no less than five years, and during all this period he never moved twenty steps from the spot. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that, from the moment the faithful animal confined himself to the cemetery, he would never allow any one of his own species to come near him: he would neither run about nor play with those which came from time to time to visit him in his solitude; and when they barked on purpose to provoke him, he hid himself in his house, and remained there plunged in grief. When this animal died, he was buried near the friend he had lamented with so much constancy. He is still quoted, in the province, as a model of friendship; his attachment has even passed into a proverb; and when the natives speak of those who are only friends of the purse, they say: "Oh, as for him, he is not worth the dog of Renaudin."

A little spaniel survived a whole family who were fondly attached to him. The father, the mother, two grandchildren, and three sons, were successively attacked by the plague, which raged at Marseilles, and they all died in the space of seven or eight days. As, one by one, these unfortunates were carried to the grave, the disconsolate animal followed their coffins, and returned to the house, sending forth the most lamentable howls. When the last of this family was entombed, the inconsolable spaniel would not remain in the house, which was now inhabited by strangers, who, charmed with his good disposition, lavished every kindness on him: he only came every two or three days to take a little food, immediately after which he returned to the cemetery, and, on this account, the affectionate animal received the name of the Dog of the Tombs. It is the custom in that country for every one to have a separate grave. During the seven years that this grateful animal lived, he remained constantly stretched on the tomb of his masters; and, as he had been caressed by all, he divided amongst them by turns his profound and sincere regrets. It was remarked, however, that he had a particular predilection for the grave of the youngest son, who was cut off at the age of seven years, and who had lavished on him a thousand infantile caresses. This faithful animal mourned over the grave, and tried to tear up the earth with his feet, as if seeking to rejoin his young friend. Touched with this instance of gratitude and affection, the neighboring villagers often conducted their children to the place of sepulture of this virtuous family, to show them a beautiful example of constancy and gratitude, as exhibited by the Dog of the Tombs.—Chambers' Pocket Miscellany.

A few evenings since, says the Boston Journal, a young sailor, passing up Washington in a somewhat inattentive manner, came very near running down a lady who was sailing along just below the Old South Church. Hastily stepping to one side in order to pass, he encountered the lady, who made a precisely similar movement at the same time. Another mutual dodge brought them again to a stand still, face to face; at which Jack posted himself firmly on the curb-stone, saying, "Look here, madam, I'm anchored. Now, see if you can pass; for shiver my timbers if I weigh anchor again until I have a clear sea."

GENIUS.

BY MRS. EMILY JUDSON.

There is a melancholy pleasure in turning over the records of genius, and familiarizing ourselves with the secret workings of those minds that have, from time to time, made memorable the ages in which they lived, and ennobled the several nations which gave them birth. But it is not the indulgence of this feeling which makes such a study peculiarly profitable to us: from these records we may learn much of the philosophy of the human mind in its most luxurious developments. Genius seems to be confined to no soil, no government, no age or nation, and no rank in society. When men lived in wandering tribes and could boast no literature, the bright flame burned among them, although wild and often deadly its ray; and the foot of oppression, which crushes all else, has failed to extinguish it. Hence it has rashly been inferred that this peculiar gift, possessed by the favored few, may be perfected without any exertion on their part, and is subject to none of the rules which in all other cases govern intellect: but that, uncontrolled and uncontrollable, it must burst forth when and where it will, and be burned up in the blaze of its own glory, leaving but the halo of its former brightness upon the historic page. This inference, however, is alike erroneous and dangerous. Though genius be an unsought gift, a peculiar emanation from the Divine Mind, it was not originally intended as a glorious curse to crush the spirit which it elevates. Perchance the pent-up stream within the soul must find an avenue; but he who bears the gift may choose that avenue: may direct, control and divert; he may scatter the living waters on a thousand objects, or pour their whole force upon one; he may calm and purify them, by this means rendering them none the less deep, or he may allow them to dash and foam until, however they sparkle, the dark sediments of vice and misery thus made to mingle, may be found in every gem.

Let us turn to the oft-quoted names of Byron and Burns—names that can scarcely be mentioned by the admirers of genius without a thrill of pain. To the poor ploughman on the banks of the Doon was sent the glorious talisman, and with it he unlocked the portals of nature, and read truths even in the flower overturned by his ploughshare unseen by common eyes. But mark his veering course, think of his (comparatively) wasted energies. He could love the wild flowers in the braes and the sunlight on the banks of his "bonny Doon;" he could, at least, at one time, smile at his lowly lot; and he ever contended against fortune with a strong and fearless hand. But while the polished society of Edinburgh owned his power, and he swayed the hearts of lads and lasses of his own degree at will, he could not control himself; and many of those light songs, which are now on gladsome lips, might, could we enter into the secrets of the poor bard, be but the sad way-marks of the aching heart as it grew each day heavier till it sank into the grave. Burns, the light-hearted lover of his "Highland Mary," and Burns, the care-worn ex-ciseman, were very different persons; but neither outward circumstances nor the genius that characterized both alike was the cause. The world has been blamed in his case, but the world, after it first noticed, could have done nothing to save. The poet, had he known his moral strength, and cared to exert it, could have saved himself, as his superiority to many of the foibles and prejudices of human nature, and his manly independence on many occasions, evinced.

Byron, like his own archangel ruined guiding a fallen son of clay in his search after mysteries, has delved among hidden treasures, and spread before us the richest gems of Helicon; but scarce one of these but is dark in its glory, and, although burning with all the fire of heaven-born poesy, sends forth a mingled and dangerous ray. But had a mother whispered her pious counsels in his ear in boyhood, had a friendly finger pointed out a nobler revenge when that first cutting satire was penned, and had a better, a holier sentiment than the mean passion of revenge urged him on to action and governed his after aspirations, think you that the archangel of earth would have stood less glorious? No. Byron's spirit had a self-rectifying power, and he could have used it, but he did not; and, although he has well won the laurel, a poison more bitter than death is dropping from every leaf.

It was not an ungrateful public that spread the death-couch of Savage in a debtor's prison, or dug the suicidal grave of "Bristol's wondrous boy." They were themselves ungrateful; they guarded not well the gift they bore, and fell victims to their own misdirected powers.

The common mind, never tempted, may wonder at the waywardness of genius, and despise the weakness of its possessor; and the generous one that sees the struggle and mourns the wreck, may pity and apologize; and both are in some degree right. While we admire and pity, we must wonder at the weakness of the strength that, subduing all else, failed beneath its own weight. We know that the gifted ones of earth often have stronger passions, more irresistible wills, and quicker and more dangerous impulses than other men; and for this very reason should they cultivate more assiduously the noble powers by which these passions and impulses are governed. Each individual possesses them; but they must be cultivated.

It is our conception of the mysteries of this gift which leads us to look back with such peculiar interest upon the infancy of a man of genius, expecting there to discover, at least, some flashes of the divine ray which lighted up his after life. The dusty memoirs of nurses and village oracles are ransacked for anecdotes, which often-times neither the additions suggested by pride and partial affection, nor the transforming medium of the past through which they are viewed, can swell into anything like superiority to the sayings and doings of other children. He who will watch an intelligent child, through one day, will be astonished at the bright flashes of untaught intellect which, could they be abstracted from the childish notions in which they are almost entirely buried, would be thought by any but him who found them in such amusing vicinity, the sure precursors of greatness.

True, real genius often shows itself in childhood; but that it always does, or that such a development is desirable, may be seriously questioned. The child who writes verses at six, or gives other indications of a genius surpassing his years, may be wondered at and admired as a prodigy, but the parent ought to tremble to observe the premature fruit bursting through the petals of the not yet unfolded bud. There is an evidence of disease in this which, in one way or another, almost always proves fatal. This unnatural power wears out itself or the frame of its possessor; either the mind or the body must fail under such a rapid development.

The village pedagogue in his old age may look about him wonderingly, for it is not unlikely that the least promising of all his flock takes the highest stand, while his bright, ever-ready favorite, that he was sure would become a great man, does not rise above mediocrity. There is nothing strange or capricious in this. It is the sure result of natural causes, and has its counterpart in all the works of nature—even in the human frame. Rapid growth produces weakness in the bones and sinews; and, in some cases, this growth has been so rapid as to become an actual disease, and carry its victim to the grave. Many are the instances of intellectual growth so rapid as to weaken the mind and sink it even below mediocrity, or, on the other hand, to produce premature death. For examples of this last result, we must not go to the tombs of the early dead in the old world, nor is it necessary to visit the banks of Saranac, where drooped the fairest buds that ever shed the fragrance of heaven upon earth. We can find them in our own midst. Many are the gifted little beings who, after basking in the sunshine and rejoicing among the flowers for a few short summers, pass away, all unknown to the world—leaving only the frail memories of their early genius to soothe, yet sadden even in the moment of soothing, the hearts that cherished them.

It would be going too far to censure those who have the guidance of such minds; but it would save worlds of disappointment, did they know that such promises are deceitful and deserving of but little confidence. And, sometimes, doubtless, the poor victim might be saved years of pain and disease, and, perchance, be spared to the world through a long life, were not the powers of the mind forced by unnatural means to expand too soon—before either the mind or body had acquired the strength and hardiness necessary to its own healthy existence. Many have seen this evil, and endeavored to remedy it by checking such unnatural growth; but this is, perhaps, the most fatal error that could be committed. The mind, when it first becomes conscious of its own capabilities, puts no limits to them, and will only be urged onward by each barrier thrown in its way; but a judicious hand may direct its course, calm its turbulence, soothe its sensitiveness, and teach it to be its own supporter, without endangering in the least degree its freshness and originality. The power of controlling its own impulses does not render a nature tame; but as it is necessary to every person, how much more so to him who has a strong, high spirit that cannot be subdued by others; that, spurning the control of him who should be its master, overmasters him, and is left unprotected.

KIND WORDS.

We have more than once, in our rapidly written reflections, urged the policy and propriety of kindness, courtesy and good will between man and man. It is so easy for an individual to manifest amenity of spirit, to avoid harshness, and thus to cheer and gladden the paths of all over whom he may have influence or control, that it is really surprising to find any one pursuing the very opposite course. Strange as it may appear, there are among the children of men, hundreds who seem to take delight in making others unhappy. They rejoice at an opportunity of being the messengers of evil tidings. They are jealous or malignant; and in either case they exult in inflicting a wound. The ancients, in most nations, had a peculiar dislike to croakers, prophets of evil, and the bearers of evil tidings. It is recorded that the messenger from the banks of the Tigris, who first announced the defeat of the Roman army by the Persians, and the death of the Emperor Julian, in a Roman city of Asia Minor, was instantly buried under a heap of stones thrown upon him by an indignant populace. And yet this messenger was innocent, and reluctantly discharged a painful duty. But how different the spirit and the motive of volunteers in such cases—those who exult in an opportunity of communicating bad news, and in some degree revel over the very agony which it produces. The sensitive, the generous, the honorable, would ever be spared from such painful missions. A case of more recent occurrence may be referred to as in point. We allude to the murder of Mr. Roberts, a farmer of New Jersey, who was robbed and shot in his own wagon, near Camden. It became necessary that the sad intelligence should be broken to his wife and family with as much delicacy as possible. A neighbor was selected for the task, and at first consented. But on consideration, his heart failed him. He could not, he said, communicate the details of a tragedy so appalling, and he begged to be excused. Another, formed, it was thought, of sterner stuff, was then fixed upon; but he too, rough and bluff as he was in his ordinary manners, possessed the heart of a generous and sympathetic human being, and also respectfully declined. A third made a like objection, and at last a female friend of the family was with much difficulty persuaded, in company with another, to undertake the mournful task. And yet, we repeat, there are in society, individuals who delight in contributing to the misery of others,—who are eager to circulate a slander, to chronicle a ruin, to revive a forgotten error, to wound, sting and annoy, whenever they may do so with impunity. How much better the gentle, the generous, the magnanimous policy! Why not do every thing that may be done for the happiness of our fellow creatures, without seeking out their weak points, irritating their half-healed wounds, jarring their sensibilities, or embittering their thoughts! The magic of kind words and a kind manner can scarcely be over-estimated. Our fellow creatures are more sensitive than is generally imagined. We have known cases in which a gentle courtesy has been remembered with pleasure for years. Who indeed cannot look back into "bygone time," and discover some smile, some look or other demonstration of regard or esteem, calculated to bless and brighten every hour of after existence! "Kind words," says an eminent writer, "do not cost much. It does not take long to utter them. They never blister the tongue or lips on their passage into the world, or occasion any other kind of bodily suffering; and we have never heard of any mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much. 1. They help one's own good nature and good will. One cannot be in a habit of this kind, without thereby pecking away something of the granite roughness of his own nature. Soft words will soften his own soul. Philosophers tell us that the angry words a man uses in his passion are fuel to the flame of his wrath, and make it blaze the more fiercely. Why, then, should not words of the opposite character produce opposite results, and that most blessed of all passions of the soul, kindness, be augmented by kind words? People that are for ever speaking kindly, are for ever disinclining themselves to ill-temper. 2. Kind words make other people good-natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and sarcastic words irritate them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful. And kind words also produce their own image on men's souls; and a beautiful image it is. They soothe, and quiet, and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings; and he has to become kind himself. There is such a rush of all other kinds of words in our days, that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, idle words, hasty words, spiteful words, silly words, and empty words. Now kind words are better than the whole of them; and it is a pity that, among the improvements of the present age, birds of this feather might not have more of a chance than they have had to spread their wings."

It is indeed! Kind words should be brought into more general use. Those in authority should employ them more frequently, when addressing the less fortunate among mankind. Employers should use them in their intercourse with their workmen. Parents should utter them on every occasion to their children. The rich should never forget an opportunity of speaking kindly to the poor. Neighbors and friends should emulate each other in the employment of mild, gentle, frank, and kindly language. But this cannot be done unless each endeavors to control himself. Our passions and our prejudices must be kept in check. If we find that we have a neighbor on the other side of the way, who has been more fortunate in a worldly sense than we have been, and if we discover a little jealousy or envy creeping into our opinions and feelings, concerning said neighbor—let us be careful, endeavor to put a rein upon our tongues, and to avoid the indulgence of malevolence or ill-will. If we, on the other hand, have been fortunate, have enough and to spare, and there happens to be in our circle some who are dependent upon us, some who look up to us with love and respect—let us be generous, courteous, and kind—and thus we shall not only discharge a duty, but prove a source of happiness to others.—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

THE TEXAS TARANTULA.

BY AUGUSTIN.

This Texas of ours is an astonishingly prolific country. Every field stands luxuriant, crowded, so that it can scarce wave under the breeze, with corn or sugar, or wheat or cotton. Every cabin is full and overflowing, through all its doors and windows, with white-haired children. Every prairie abounds in deer, prairie-hens and cattle. Every river and creek is alive with fish. The whole land is electric with lizards perpetually darting about among the grass like flashes of green lightning. We have too much prairie and too little forest for a great multitude or variety of birds. But in horned-frogs, scorpions, tarantulas and centipedes, we beat the universe. Everybody has seen horned-frogs. You see them in jars in the windows of apothecaries. You are entreated to purchase them by loafing boys on the levee, at New Orleans. They have been neatly soldered up in soda boxes, and mailed by young gentlemen in Texas, to fair ones in the old States. The fair ones receive the neat package from the post-office, are delighted at the prospect of a daguerreotype—perhaps jewelry—open the package eagerly and faint, as the frog within hops out, in excellent health, upon them. A horned-frog is, simply, a very harmless frog, with very portentous horns. It has horns because everything in its region—trees, shrubs, grass even, has thorns—and nature makes it in keeping with all around it. A menagerie of them would not be expensive. They are content to live upon air—and can, if desired, live, I am told, for several months without even that.

The scorpions are precisely like those of Arabia—in the shape of a lobster, exactly, only not more than some three inches long. You are very apt to put one upon your face in the towel which you apply thereto after washing. If you do, you will find the sting about equal to that of a wasp—nothing worse. They are far less poisonous than the scorpion of the East—in fact, none except new comers dread them at all.

But the tarantula! You remember the astonishing elasticity with which you sprang in the air that time you were just on the point of putting your raised foot down upon a snake coiled in your path. You were frightened—through every fibre of your body. Very probably the snake was as harmless as it was beautiful. Spring as high, be as utterly frightened as possible, when you just avoid stepping upon a tarantula, however. Filthy, loathsome, abominable and poisonous—crush it to atoms before you leave it! If you have never seen it—know henceforth that it is an enormous spider—concentrating in itself all the venom and spite and ugliness of all other spiders living. Its body is some two inches long, black and bloated. It enjoys the possession of eight long, strong legs, a red mouth, and an abundance of stiff brown hair all over itself. When standing, it covers an area of a saucer. Attack it with a stick, and it rears on its hind legs, gnashes at the stick, and fights like a fiend. It even jumps forward a foot or two in its rage—and, if it bite into a vein, the bite is death! I have been told of the battle fought by one on board a steamboat. Discovered at the lower end of the saloon, it came hopping up the saloon; driving the whole body of passengers before it, it almost drove the whole company, crew and all, overboard.

The first I saw was at the house of a friend. I spied it crawling slowly over the wall, meditating murder upon the children playing in the room. Excessively prudent in regard to my fingers, I at last, however, had it safely imprisoned in a glass jar, unhurt. There was a flaw in the glass as well as a hole through the cork by which it could breathe; but in ten minutes it was dead from rage! Soon after I killed three upon my place, crawling about ground trodden every day by the bare feet of my little boy. A month after, I killed a whole nest of them. They had formed their family circle under a door-step, upon which the aforesaid little fellow played daily. Had he seen one of them, he would, of course, have picked it up as a remarkably promising toy; and I would have been childless.

I was sitting one day upon a log in the woods, when I saw one slowly crawl out to enjoy the evening air and the sunset scenery. He was the largest, most bloated one I ever saw. As I was about to kill him, I was struck with the conduct of a chance wasp. It, too, had seen the tarantula, and was flying slowly around it. The tarantula recognized it as a foe; and, throwing itself upon its hind legs, breathed defiance. For some time the wasp flew around it, and then, like a flash, flew right against it, and stung it under its bloated belly. The tarantula gnashed its red and venomous jaws, and threw its long hairy legs about in impotent rage, while the wasp flew round and round it, watching for another opportunity. Again and again did it dash its sting into the reptile, and escape. After the sixth stab, the tarantula actually fell over on its back, dead; and the wasp, after making itself sure of the fact, and inflicting a last sting to make matters sure, flew off happy, in having done a duty assigned it in creation. In an hour more, a colony of ants had carried it down piecemeal, and deposited it in their catacombs.

But, deadliest and most abhorrent of all our reptiles in Texas, is the centipede. This is a kind of worm, from three to six inches long, exactly like an enormous caterpillar. It is green, or brown, or yellow—some being found of each of these colors. As its name denotes, it has along each side a row of feet, horny claws rather. Imagine that you walk some night across your chamber floor with naked feet; you put your foot down upon a soft something, and instantly it coils around your foot in a ring, sticking every claw up to the body in your foot. The poison flows through each claw, and in two minutes you will have fainted with agony; in a few more, and you will be dead. The deadly thing cannot be torn away. It has to be cut off, and claw by claw plucked out. Even if it crawls over the naked body of a sleeping person, without sticking in its claws, the place will pain the person for years after—at least, so I have been told.

I have seen these things—in which nature corks up her deadly poisons—often; yet I have heard of few cases in which they have bitten or killed any one. The kind Being who makes the butterflies to be abundant, in the same loving kindness which makes them so beautiful and so abundant, makes all deadly creatures to be scarce.

HAROLD'S DREAM.

BY LILA M. LAIRD.

So I slept, and gentle dreamings
Led me in a fair green meadow,
Where the sunlight's yellow gleamings
Widely fell without a shadow.
There I heard from leafy eyries,
Little birds sing pleasant glees;
There I saw the white-robed fairies
Sitting 'neath the ancient trees.
There I saw an azure river,
And it swept that meadow fair,
With a murmur which seemed ever
Like a strain of music rare.
Seeking 'mongst the elf king's daughters,
Seeking vainly, love, for thee,
Long I wandered by those waters,
Till they led me to the sea:
Oh, that sea was wide and fearful—
Strong its billows, strong and dark,
And they bore thee, Lillian, tearful,
Onward in thy tiny bark;
Onward to the caverns doleful,
Where the gnomes were hoarsely chaunting
Weird-like measures, stern and woful,
Full of wrath and bitter taunting.
When the wind was rudely sweeping
From thy brow thy sunny hair,
And thy blue eyes, dim with weeping,
Gazed on me with wild despair,
Bound by fa'ry spell, entrhralling,
I stood fixed upon the shore,
Heard thy sweet voice on me calling,
But to save thee had no power.
Long I sought to stem the torrent,
Oft-times plunging in the sea,
But an elfish wight, abhorrent,
Held me ever back from thee;
And great waves, like angry demons,
Rose and swept thy bark away,
Leaving nothing but the gleamings
Of the storm sea's crested spray.
Then, when with a grief unspoken,
I sat down and wept for thee,
Lo! the feverish spell was broken,
And the dark dream fled from me.
Lo! dear love, 'twas but a vision—
A woful fancy of the night—
That morning fair, with touch elysian,
Hath put to sudden flight.

Why is a beggar like a baker? They both knead (need) bread.

DREAMS.

BY D. P. THOMPSON, AUTHOR OF "LOCKE AMSDEN," &amp;c.

[The following suggestive article, which has been published before, though not widely circulated, is furnished for our use by the author:]

The subject of dreams, whether we look upon them as natural or supernatural—whether we view them as the mere workings of the mind divested of part of its faculties, or as the medium of intimations received from spiritual beings, presents some of the most curious and interesting inquiries which come within the scope of intellectual philosophy. In regard to ordinary dreams, which few at the present day, except the people of the most untutored nations, would think of attributing to any supernatural agencies, various theories have been started by the different writers on the philosophy of the mind—some treating them as but the reflex of memory, or a recurrence of such thoughts and images as have, at some time or other, before occupied the mind, while others consider them as only the play of unrestrained imagination—the last of which theories may be found very happily embodied in a couplet of Dryden—

"Dreams are but interludes which Fancy makes;
When Reason sleeps her mimic monster wakes."

But neither of these theories, we imagine, when separately considered, are very well sustained by the experience of dreamers. We have had scores of dreams, in which neither the scenes nor the particular thoughts and images presented, we were confident, ever before passed through our mind; and others whom we have consulted on the subject, have assured us of a similar experience. Nor is it any more correct, probably, to attribute dreams only to the action of unrestricted fancy. This faculty never appeared to us to be very active in dreams; but, on the contrary, seemed to be nearly as much clogged and weakened as any other faculty of the mind. Indeed, both these theories put together would not account for all, nor perhaps half the mental operations which transpire in our slumbers: for experience will soon teach any one, who will be at the pains of taking note of the matter, that there are several other sources to which dreams may often be directly traced. One of these is the presence of some strong emotion, or harrowing anxiety, which continuing to press, or at least to linger upon the feelings, after we fall asleep, give a like character to all the figurings of the dreaming mind. Another prolific source of dreams may be found in the disturbing proximity of external objects, or of noises, which coming in contact with the sleeper, or striking upon his half-closed senses, but not forcibly enough to awaken him, give rise to a new dream, or become curiously incorporated with one already in progress. Sometimes when two persons are sleeping together in the same bed, the dreams of one of them, if attended by restlessness or mutterings, will set the other a dreaming,—often, perhaps, on the same subject, but oftener, probably, on one which places them in antagonistic positions; and thus they will go on until the strange rivalry results in some ludicrous catastrophe. We once witnessed an amusing instance of this kind, which we will relate by way of illustration:—

In the days of our young ambition, there came along a sort of professor, or teacher of great pretensions, who, advertising for a class of such as wished to become good instructors, whom he promised to accomplish in six weeks, soon collected around him about a dozen of us embryo lords of the birch and ferrule. Three of us, including a great, green moose of a fellow, who went among us by the appellation of Big Moses, were, by special favor, invited to board, and occupy the same sleeping apartment with the Professor. Two of us being middling-sized chaps, while the Professor was remarkably thin, and Big Moses as remarkably thick, it was arranged that the two former should occupy one of the couple of beds prepared for us, and the latter the other, the beds being situated at opposite ends of a long hall. Sometime during the first night of this quadruple occupancy of our new sleeping quarters, we—that is, the writer of this article—were awakened by a loud thumping, which was repeated quite regularly at intervals of, perhaps, a minute each, and which our ears, well practiced in rustic sounds, soon told us proceeded from a loosened trough, that the restless grunter of the adjoining piggery was lifting up and letting fall from the end of his snout. The same sound which had awakened us was, in the meanwhile, it appeared, taking effect upon the harder sleepers of the other bed, but without awakening them, though the noise was almost directly under them. It set the Professor dreaming afresh, and of a thunder storm, which, from the frequency of the electric explosions, he thought, was approaching at an alarming rate directly towards him. But Big Moses, who was already dreaming, it seemed, quite a different apocalyptic scene, these sounds by weaving them very thickly into the dream he had in progress, while, nevertheless, the dream was that of his first attempt at sleeping. He thought he was getting on tolerably well with his school considering the number of his pupils, and the rather ominous size of several of them, of whom he felt a little distrustful. But all at once he was aroused by a loud thump on one of the back benches, and turning, he beheld a row of uprisen mutineers, preparing to leap out and seize him, as was sufficiently manifest from their menacing looks and brandished fists, which from time to time, they seemed to bring down with heavy, significant blows on the desk before them. Presently the words, coming, strike, kill, &c., which were muttered by the Professor, reaching his ears, and being taken as the threats of what the mutineers were on the point of executing, he at once resolved to anticipate them by assailing the foremost. And accordingly, both in dream and reality, he brought round his clenched fist with a furious sweep directly into the face of the sleeping Professor, giving him a blow in the eye, which answered, as it appeared, for both the thunder and lightning of the storm his fancy had been manufacturing out of the thumpings of the hog's trough: for, in an instant, he leaped from his bed with a wild cry of pain and affright, and with one hand pressed tightly to the injured part, bounded, like a parched pea, through the hall towards the door, exclaiming in the honesty of his heart, and at the top of his voice, "Spring, Moses! spring for your life! The lightning has struck the house, and it's tumbling about our ears! one of the rafters has hit me on the head and nearly knocked my eye out!"

Dreams of the class we have been enumerating though often singular enough, present, nevertheless, nothing very mysterious or difficult of solution: being sometimes produced by ill health, sometimes by a prevailing care, sometimes by accidental circumstances, as in the case above related, and sometimes by a combination of part or all the causes just enumerated. We will therefore pass to another class of these mental operations, which being more vivid and connected, and being also followed by the events which they appear to have foreshadowed, deserve more serious consideration. We allude to what are termed prophetic dreams. Of these a great proportion doubtless may be explained on natural principles; since they often become the direct cause of the event they seem to predict. For instance, a person dreams of his or her own death. The dream is taken as truly foreshowing such an event—the consequence is a deep despondency, which soon deranges all the functions of life, and ends in disease and death. Again the young man dreams of being married to a young lady whom he never before thought of addressing. The dream lingers, and produces, as all kindly dreams do, we imagine, a softening effect on the feelings; and these feelings soon lead him into a course which very naturally results in the event thus seemingly foretold. And such also may be the case with dreams that foretell the obtaining of wealth, or other desired objects. They may produce a faith of success which prompts to those exertions that were only necessary to secure the end thus prognosticated. And we have no doubt that many a death—many a marriage, and many another kind of event, may be traced back directly to what have been taken as prophetic dreams: yet, at the same time, be but the legitimate effect of such dreams, brought about by the operation of natural means.

But there is a class of dreams, which have ever confounded the wisest of those, who have attempted thus to account for them, since the world began. Such, to say nothing of those sacred prophecies which were avowedly made through the medium of dreams—such were the dreams of the wise men of the East, which warned them to avoid the murderous Herod, after their discovery of the new-born Messiah—such the dream of Pilate's wife, which caused him to refuse all sanction of the crucifixion—such the dream of the imperial consort of Cæsar, which, without previous suspicions, so distinctly foretold her husband's approaching assassination. Such, in more modern times, was the dream, which, in the case of the Rev. William Tenant, of New Jersey, (who from his resemblance to a certain felon was about to be convicted of horse theft) brought a man fifty miles to prove an alibi; and such, to cite no more of the numerous cases which might be adduced, was the dream of a lady in Massachusetts, who, being engaged for a boat ride, and dreaming she was to be drowned, persuaded her husband to take her to a ride into the country; when, by the fright of their horse, she was thrown from a bridge, and met the fate she was seeking to avoid.

But what shall we say to cases like these? To deny the occasional occurrence and fulfilment of such dreams, is, as it appears to us, to set all human testimony at defiance;—to attribute that fulfilment to chance, is too much like attributing the machinery of the universe to the same source; and to account for them on natural principles, is a task which comes not, we confess, within the scope of our ingenuity. How, then, shall we account for them? To those who, like ourselves, think it probable that men are still occasionally permitted to receive from ministering spirits intimations of coming destinies, or aught else which the designs of Providence require to be communicated, the matter stands explained: to those who reject such belief, we can say no more; and must therefore leave to them the task of explaining in any other way, if they can, what to both learned and unlearned, has so long been a theme of awe and of mystery.

REGULATION OF THE TEMPER.

There is considerable ground for thinking that the opinion very generally prevails that the temper is something beyond the power of regulation, control or government. A good temper, too, if we may judge from the usual excuses for the want of it, is hardly regarded in the light of an attainable quality. To be slow in taking offence, and moderate in the expression of resentment, in which things good temper consists, seems to be generally reckoned rather among the gifts of nature, the privileges of a happy constitution, than among the possible results of careful self-discipline. When we have been fretted by some petty grievance, or hurried by some reasonable cause of offence into a degree of anger far beyond what the occasion required, our subsequent regret is seldom of a kind for which we are likely to be much better. We bewail ourselves for a misfortune, rather than condemn ourselves for a fault. We speak of our unhappy temper as if it were something that entirely removed the blame from us, and threw it all upon the peculiar and unavoidable sensitiveness of our frame. A peevish and irritable temper is, indeed, an unhappy one; a source of misery to ourselves and to others; but it is not, in all cases, so valid an excuse for being easily provoked, as it is usually supposed to be.

A good temper is too important a source of happiness, and an ill temper too important a source of misery, to be treated with indifference or hopelessness. The false excuses or modes of regarding this matter, to which we have referred, should be exposed; for until their invalidity and incorrectness are exposed, no efforts, or but feeble ones, will be put forth to regulate an ill temper, or to cultivate a good one.

We allow that there are great differences of natural constitution. One who is endowed with a poetical temperament, or a keen sense of beauty, or a great love of order, or very large ideality, will be pained by the want or the opposites of these qualities, where one less amply endowed would suffer no provocation whatever. What would grate most harshly on the ear of an eminent musician, might not be noticed at all by one whose musical faculties were unusually small. The same holds true in regard to some other, besides musical deficiencies or discords. A delicate and sickly frame will feel annoyed by what would not at all disturb the same frame in a state of vigorous health. Particular circumstances, also, may expose some to greater trials and vexations than others. But, after all this is granted, the only reasonable conclusion seems to be, that the attempt to govern the temper is more difficult in some cases than in others; not that it is, in any case, impossible. It is, at least, certain that an opinion of its impossibility is an effectual bar against entering upon it. On the other hand, "believe that you will succeed, and you will succeed," is a maxim which has nowhere been more frequently verified than in the moral world. It should be among the first maxims admitted, and the last abandoned, by every earnest seeker of his own moral improvement.

Then, too, facts demonstrate that much has been done and can be done in regulating the worst of tempers. The most irritable or peevish temper has been restrained by company; has been subdued by interest; has been awed by fear; has been softened by grief; has been soothed by kindness. A bad temper has shown itself, in the same individuals, capable of increase, liable to change, accessible to motives. Such facts are enough to encourage, in every case, an attempt to govern the temper. All the miseries of a bad temper, and all the blessings of a good one, may be attained by an habitual tolerance, concern and kindness for others—by an habitual restraint of considerations and feelings entirely selfish.

To those of our readers who feel moved or resolved by the considerations we have named to attempt to regulate their temper, or to cultivate one of a higher order of excellence, we would submit a few suggestions which may assist them in their somewhat difficult undertaking.

See, first of all, that you set as high a value on the comfort of those with whom you have to do as you do on your own. If you regard your own comfort exclusively, you will not make the allowances which a proper regard to the happiness of others would lead you to do.

Avoid, particularly in your intercourse with those to whom it is of most consequence that your temper should be gentle and forbearing—avoid raising into undue importance the little failings which you may perceive in them, or the trifling disappointments which they may occasion you. If we make it a subject of vexation, that the beings among whom we are destined to live, are not perfect, we must give up all hope of attaining a temper not easily provoked. A habit of trying everything by the standard of perfection vitiates the temper more than it improves the understanding, and disposes the mind to discern faults with an unhappy penetration. I would not have you shut your eyes to the errors or follies, or thoughtlessnesses of your friends, but only not to magnify them or view them microscopically. Regard them in others as you would have them regard the same things in you, in an exchange of circumstances.

Do not forget to make due allowance for the original constitution and the manner of education or bringing up, which has been the lot of those with whom you have to do. Make such excuses for others as the circumstances of their constitution, rearing, and youthful associations, do fairly demand.

Always put the best construction on the motives of others, when their conduct admits of more than one way of understanding it. In many cases, where neglect or ill intention seems evident at first sight, it may prove true that "second thoughts are best." Indeed, this common saying is never more likely to prove true than in cases in which the first thoughts were the dictates of anger. And even when the first thoughts are confirmed by further evidence, yet the habit of always waiting for more evidence before we condemn, must have a softening and moderating effect upon the temper. We will take nothing from the author of our sins.

It will, further, help up to our efforts, as well as our government of the temper, if we constantly and seriously consider the natural consequences of hasty resentments, angry replies, rebukes impatiently given or impatiently received, muttered discontents, sullen looks and harsh words. It may safely be asserted that the consequences of these and other ways in which ill-temper may show itself, are entirely of a bad nature, and that they are in themselves as well as painful. They less our self-respect, and tend often rather to prevent than to promote the enjoyment of those with whom we have to do. They even excite in others a conscious contempt, and a pettish tone, we excite in ourselves a repugnance naturally felt to our own consequences is, that the advice of the peevish adviser pitied, despised, and the

When we cannot succeed in our restraint on our feelings of anger or dissatisfaction, we can at least check the expression of those feelings. If our thoughts are not always in our power, our words and actions and looks may be brought under our command; and a command over these expressions of our thoughts and feelings will be found no mean help towards obtaining an increase of power over our thoughts and feelings themselves. At least, one great good will be effected: time will be gained; time for reflection, time for charitable allowances and excuses.

Lastly, seek the help of religion. Consider how you may most certainly secure the approbation of God. For a good temper, or a well-regulated temper, may be the constant homage of a truly religious man to that God, whose love and long-suffering forbearance surpass all human love and forbearance.

John's wife and John were tele-a-te;

She witty was, industrious he;

Says John "I've earned the bread we've ate,"

"And I," says she, "have urn'd the tea."

When does a man devour a musical instrument? When he has a piano-forte (piano for tea.)

BROKEN PITCHER.

story of one known in early life, and who gave evidence of much excellence, was accidentally recalled to my mind this evening, and, perhaps, the recital of some circumstances connected with this history may not be uninteresting or unprofitable, as they serve to show what apparent trifles sometimes give a bias to character for good or evil, and often color the current of a whole existence.

Mrs. Lorin was early left a widow with an infant daughter and a son of nine years, dependent on her for support. She had a little cottage of her own, and with the rent of a small spot of ground adjoining, added to the produce of her garden, she managed, by the practice of the strictest economy, to live quite comfortably. Edgar, her son, showed early a great love of books, and though uncultivated herself, and incompetent to direct his choice, she encouraged him in this, because their minister praised his studiousness and lent him books, and would often come and converse with him about the subjects upon which they treated, and it pleased her to hear how well he could talk. Her pride was also gratified by the complimentary remarks of visitors upon his sober, studious habits, and at their predictions that he would be something some day; and she had an indefinite idea that his books were, somehow, going to make a great man of him. And well might the widow be proud of her son, for in addition to the promise he gave of a mind far above mediocrity, he possessed uncommon beauty and symmetry of person, and much amiable disposition. Besides caring for her son, and attending to her garden, she found time to render occasional assistance to a neighbor, and in managing to keep her son at the little school kept by the minister, he rendering her assistance in his power, apart from his home-reading and study. Things went on thus till Edgar had reached his fourteenth year, when the burden of his mother was increased by the death of a widowed sister, who left to her care an infant daughter, having no other relative to whom she could entrust it. As the infant came without any addition in the way of means, except the household furniture of her sister, the widow was more straitened than before; besides, with her additional cares, her health grew more feeble, and it was sometimes with difficulty she could perform her accustomed labor. Now the consequence of all this was, that she became fretful and irritable—annoyed by trifles which before had no power to disturb her, and by the law of re-action, this rendered other difficulties greater. Though a good housewife and an affectionate mother, this good woman had one fault, which was excessive particularity about trifles; and this, as is often the case, required frequent sacrifices of the comfort of those around, and led to many more serious faults—among them irritability of temper.

The cottage of the widow consisted of only two rooms below stairs, the kitchen and a little room in front, which served for parlor. This she had fitted up with some of her sister's furniture, and it was her especial pride. A neat homemade check carpet of bright colors covered the floor; there were white curtains at the windows, and at one side a little table, covered with a cloth so white and ironed so smoothly, it looked like polished marble. On this, in summer, there was always a flower-pot, kept full of fresh flowers from the garden, and over it hung a small looking-glass garlanded with asparagus and flowering vines. Another flower-pot graced the mantel opposite, and the fire-place was filled with green bushes. Then, there were some shelves of books, and a lounge and easy-chair covered with green calico. I have described this room thus particularly, for it seems before me now—such a temple of neatness did it seem to me, when I used to stop there on my way to school, and was sometimes permitted to take a flower from the gathered ones that decked it.

Edgar used to love to retire with his book into this little room, and sitting in the easy-chair, or reclining on the lounge, realize in part the paradise of the poet Gray. His mother did not actually prohibit this, for he protested he could study so well no where else; the noise of the children and the opening and shutting of the doors in the common room interrupted him—the chambers were bare and unfinished—and he did not enjoy it so well. She had made up her mind that he must study somehow; so, though she manifested some uneasiness and apprehension, when he was in possession of her sanctum, and made sure his shoes were perfectly clean—for he did not seem to have inherited his mother's extreme carefulness—he was allowed occasionally to occupy it.

He was several times in serious danger, of being deposed from his possession, from leaving the books scattered about, or from disarranging the lounge-cushions—for his mother was not sufficiently versed in the peculiarities of genius to console herself with the idea that disregard of the common laws of order and rule, is claimed as one of its distinguishing characteristics. One day, in trying to lower the looking-glass, that he might see himself, and regulate his gestures, as he recited a heroic poem that he was going to speak at school, he threw down the flower-pot—a pitcher much prized by her, because it had been the property of her sister—and broke it; the discolored water running over the table-cover, and from thence to the carpet. Besides, in falling upon it, he cut his hand in such a manner as to be unable to use it for weeks.

This was an outrage too great to be easily overlooked. He expressed much contrition, and promised greater carefulness for the future. But his mother was resolute, and he was banished his favorite haunt. She justified herself by the thought that it was only a whim of his: he could study very well somewhere else, and it was no use indulging him. So she told him he might study in his chamber or in the room with the rest of them; she could not run the risk of having everything spoiled. Edgar made at first some effort to study in his altered circumstances, but did not succeed very well; the thought of what he regarded as unkindness on the part of his mother, tending, also, to depress his spirits and to magnify the difficulties in his way. The injustice, too, with which he fancied he had been treated, roused the stubbornness inherent in his nature, and rendered his endeavors less earnest. His mother saw nothing of this; neither did she realize the danger that would ensue from having his habits of study, which had been to him, in his hours of leisure, a safeguard against idleness or hurtful companionship, broken up.

One evening, not long after his mishap, Edgar was sitting moody and discontented by the kitchen fire; it was not yet quite dark, and there was no candle lighted; two or three sticks of wet wood lay on the andirons, and his mother was trying in vain to make them burn. She was not in a very pleasant humor, for household matters had gone wrong,—the baby had caught cold and was crying fretfully in the arms of the little girl,—her brow was overshadowed, and she looked gloomy and cheerless as the aspect of every thing around. Edgar sat looking into the fire-place, dogged and silent; he felt discontented and unhappy, and logged for his quiet nook in the parlor again; and he almost resolved that if his mother persisted in her determination to deprive him of that privilege, he would not study at all. His mother had some vague idea that he thought by showing a little obstinacy, and persisting awhile in idleness, she would be brought to retract her prohibition, though she did not give the subject much thought. She felt sure he might do better than he did, but thought it would all come round right after awhile—the philosophy with which many inefficient people console themselves. Brooding over his disagreeable feelings, the cheerlessness around oppressed the spirits of Edgar; he felt dissatisfied with himself and displeased with his mother, who he felt was the cause of his present unhappiness; he did not realize how much her cares and feebleness excused her, if their home was not at all times so peaceful and pleasant as he could desire. After sitting thus moodily for some time, he rose, and, going towards the door, opened it to go out. As he was shutting it behind him, his mother asked, rather sharply, “Where are you going, Edgar?”

“Out here,” he answered, sullenly.

“I wish,” said she, in the same fretful tone she had used for the last hour, “you would split up some wood, and see if you can’t make this fire burn, instead of running off. I thought I would wait and see if you would not do it without being told, but I might have known better.”

Edgar went out without answering, and advancing to the little gate in front of the house, he leaned across it, and drawing his cap down over his eyes, gave himself up to unpleasant thoughts, and was more unhappy than he had ever been in his life before. This was his first fit of real despondency. A dark cloud seemed impending over him—he knew not why; and, as is more frequently the case in early youth than is imagined, the gloom that clouded his spirits was unilluminated by a single cheering ray.

Now, had he possessed a judicious friend, skilled in the mysteries of the human heart, his thoughts might easily have been diverted into a new channel—and the mischief that ensued from this state of feeling have been averted. He had not stood thus long, when he heard the sound of voices coming down the street towards him; as they drew nearer, he perceived a couple of his school-fellows walking very fast, and talking earnestly and gesticulating.

As soon as they saw Edgar, one of them hailed him, and invited him to accompany them to a circus, at the town a couple of miles distant, whither they were bound.

“Oh, no,” said the other, deridingly, “don’t ask him to go—he would not be mother’s good boy if he should go with us and have a little fun.” And he went on a little, saying that he at least must be there in time for commencement, while his companion delayed to persuade Edgar to go with them for this once; repeating by way of inducement, the many wonderful things to be performed which were set forth in the bills. The price of admission too was only two shillings.

Putting his hand in his pocket, Edgar took between his fingers a couple of dimes he had received a few days before, for going on an errand for a gentleman in the neighborhood, and with which he had intended to purchase some writing materials; but his hesitation was only for a moment—without saying anything farther, he opened the gate, and passing out, started down the street in the direction of the village.

“Good!” his companions shouted, at their success; and running on together, they soon heard the music in the distance, and in a few moments afterwards, they had paid their shillings, and were seated with the crowd of spectators.

The arena was brilliantly lighted, and just as they took their seats, twelve beautiful cream-colored horses, elegantly caparisoned, came gaily forward, with their splendidly dressed riders, and entering the ring, proceeded to perform various graceful evolutions. This display was followed by numerous exhibitions of skill and power, all possessing the charm of novelty for our hero, the actors in which seemed to him to be doing all those wonderful and graceful things merely for their own amusement.

His companions, to whom such things were not new, explained to him what he did not understand, and were well pleased to witness his delight and astonishment; as this was the first time they had succeeded in drawing him with them to a place of amusement.

“Is it not fine?” they would say to him occasionally. “Are you sorry you came?” “Is it not well worth a shilling?” or “Is not this better than to be moping at home with your musty books?”—and he felt for the time that it was.

When Edgar got home that night, his mother was in bed; but she had left the kitchen door unfastened for him. He opened it carefully, proceeding to his chamber as noiselessly as possible, but he did not escape the watchful ear of his mother, whom the unusual circumstance of his remaining out past bed-time, had kept waking.

“Edgar,” said she, “pray where have you been so late? I was much alarmed about you, and should not have gone to bed—but Mr. Sandford said he saw you with James Morton. So I supposed you were there.”

“I have not been very far,” he answered, and hastened up stairs to bed. Long he lay awake that night, and all that he had witnessed passed again before him in imagination. A new world seemed opened to him. He could scarcely realize that those were ordinary mortals upon whom he had gazed. So beautiful—so ethereal they looked to him—so almost superhuman—in their grace and power. But the boys had told him that all this wonderful skill was the result of a course of training, and that any well-formed person could attain like excellence, by going through a similar process. One boy of ten years old, they told him, received thirty dollars a week! "What a sum!" he thought! And then he remembered how often people had said he was well formed; and was he not quick and powerful beyond other boys of his age? And, then, how delightful must it be to travel about so much, and see so many different cities! and to be so splendidly dressed! His mind had received a new bias. The heroes of olden time, of whom he had read in history, and whose deeds excited in his breast a noble emulation, sunk into insignificance in his mind before these knights of the ring. He had had vague longings for the possession of some excellence that should distinguish him in the eyes of the world. They were the inarticulate murmurings of young ambition; and now his fancies took a shape more real, and he seemed to see a short road to that which he had thought to attain only through much toil. The efforts of the greatest and best of men had perhaps attained for them only censure, during their lives; these, for what must be in itself a pleasure, received constantly the applause of admiring multitudes—and then how richly were they rewarded!

How much better than to endure a life of toil and privation, to be spoken of only when beyond the reach of human applause! And then his innate love of the beautiful was gratified by the grace and splendor he had seen. How delightful to dwell daily with those beautiful beings—to be one of them—like them to receive the homage of admiring crowds! These thoughts pursued him the next day at his work, sometimes lightening it, sometimes rendering it distasteful to him; and when he tried to read, his mind wandered from the page before him—the images it presented were tame and sombre in comparison with those that peopled his fancy. He confessed to his mother, at breakfast, where he had been on the previous night, and how it had happened. She reproved him for going without her leave, and when he knew she would disapprove of such things; but she little thought any consequences seriously affecting his future welfare would ensue from the act. She observed that he "acted odd," as she expressed it, afterwards. He did not appear to hear her when she talked to him, and would sometimes sit for a long time looking into the fire, as though in deep thought. He had never behaved in this manner before—but she was not in the habit of reasoning much from cause to effect; and so long as he performed his accustomed duties, and held occasionally a book before his eyes, as he sat in the kitchen corner of an evening, she gave the matter no very serious thought.

In the course of a few weeks, he was told by the boys, who had before persuaded him to accompany them, that there was to be another circus at the same town, on the next evening, which would far exceed, in splendor and the skill of the performers, the one they had before seen. They were to set off at an early hour on the following day, and wished him to join them.

There was nothing he desired more than to go with them, and he debated with himself whether it would be best to ask his mother's leave and risk her refusal, which he had reason to fear; or, as he had done before, go without it, and brave her displeasure afterwards. He finally concluded he would tell her of his desire to go, and he hoped the many plausible things he had to say in favor of his wish would win her consent. But should she refuse, he had partly resolved he would for once go without it. Other boys often did so, as they had told him, and though they were reprov'd severely, at first, and sometimes punished a little, it soon "blew over," as they said. He asked his mother's permission as he had purposed, and she expressed her astonishment that he should come to her with such a request, thinking that she would comply with it, knowing, as he did, her disapprobation of such things. "It was only a waste of time and money, running after such things. It was no place for boys—they could learn no good there. An idle, swindling set, going around the country to pick up money. They ought all to be put in jail."

All this was nothing new to Edgar; he had heard it many times before; and now he had formed an opinion of his own, which did not at all accord with it, so it was all lost on him.

Too much hurried and perplexed to reflect on the matter, could she otherwise have done so, his mother thought that, as heretofore, the expression of her disapprobation would be sufficient to deter him from doing whatever she disapproved. Had she reasoned with him affectionately and kindly, and pointed out to him the real danger, to his habits and morals, of frequenting such places, he might have been deterred from going. With desires and passions strengthening with his strength, much wisdom and a firm and gentle but judicious hand were needed to direct them aright. His mother's manner irritated and vexed him. He saw nothing that would make amends to him for the loss of the pleasure he had promised himself, and he resolved, though he did not say so to her, to go at all hazards. As soon as he could do so unobserved, he ran up to his chamber, and dressing himself in his Sunday suit, he put his little purse in his pocket, and hastened to join his companions at the place appointed for their meeting. "Hurra!" they shouted, on seeing him, "does your mother know you're come—or did you give her the slip, again?"

"Never mind that," Edgar answered; "I'm here, and I promise myself a good time."

"That we shall have for certain," said they, and off they all ran together. They reached the town before the circus had arrived from the place where it had stopped the day before, and went a little way on the road to meet it. They had not proceeded far when they came in sight of it, "fixing up to enter the town." As soon as everything was arranged in the right order, the music struck up, and they set forward.

By this time, a troop of boys and men had collected, who followed the pageant through the town to the ground selected for the exhibition. Edgar was with the train, and when they reached the ground, he remained, watching curiously the operations that were going forward, as the men proceeded to erect the tent, and make other preparations. In the course of these, it chanced that some article was wanted from the village to assist in their work; and one of the men, looking round, said—

"Here is a smart, active-looking lad. Perhaps he will run for us."

Edgar, who was the one designated, pleased with the compliment, signified his willingness, and, receiving his commission, set off with the speed of a deer to execute it. When he returned, which was very quickly, the proprietor was standing near, and remarked him as he came up.

The man thanked him, and told him he should have a free ticket to the performance. Edgar gave him some farther assistance, and, while he was doing so, asked a great many questions, and made many enquiries about their mode of life, that evinced the interest with which it had inspired him. After answering his queries, the man said, looking at him, and laughing, as he spoke—

"You would do for one of us, I think," for he thought he perceived his drift. "Don't you think so?" he said, appealing to the proprietor, who stood near.

"He seems a fine, likely lad," he answered, "whose activity might be made of some use. How old are you, my boy?" he said, addressing him.

"Fourteen, last month, sir."

"Do you live in the town?"

"No, sir; my mother lives two miles in the country."

"Then you have no father?"

"No, sir; my father died five years ago."

"Have you ever attended a circus?"

"Yes, sir; once."

"Well, what did you think of it? Did you think you would like to be able to perform such wonders as you saw?"

"I think I should, sir."

"Well, my lad," said he, "you would not require long drilling. You could soon do so with ease."

Seeing the boy's eyes sparkle, as he looked up towards him, enquiringly, the man explained to him farther their process of training, and the parts for which he thought him particularly fitted. Edgar looked thoughtful, and when the proprietor was soon after summoned away, he pursued the conversation with the man with whom he had been first conversing, who, perceiving what was passing in his mind, took good care to set everything in as favorable a light as possible.

The proprietor, observing how much Edgar was interested, did not lose sight of him. During the evening, he remarked the wonder and delight expressed in his countenance, and his enthusiastic applause. Just before the close, as he sat convenient, he stepped up to him, and said, in a low tone—

"My lad, I would like to speak with you a few moments. Can you call at the hotel?"

"Yes, sir," Edgar replied, scarcely knowing what he said, in the tumult of his feelings. Did the man wish to engage him? he thought. It chanced he did not get a seat near his companions, during the evening; so they were not aware of this request; and, when they joined him, after leaving the tent, he thought best not to apprise them of it, as he did not know what might happen: so he told them he had concluded not to go home that night, but to remain in town with Harry Wilkins, an acquaintance of his, which he really intended to do, if his conjectures were not right with regard to the business of the circus man with him. So they went on, and left him, and he proceeded to his interview, the result of which was an engagement to join the troupe, and he left the town with them, the next morning, at an early hour.

When his mother found, on the day that he had yielded to temptation, and accompanied the boys to the village, that he was absent, she suspected where he had gone, and her suspicions were confirmed by one of the neighbors, who had seen him on his way. She felt sorry and displeased, and resolved to take some means to prevent such flagrant acts of disobedience in future. She went to bed as usual, thinking it probable he would remain for the evening performances, and consequently would not be home till a late hour, but she left the door unfastened for him, that he might enter when he came. When she found, in the morning, that he had not come, she supposed he had stopped with one of the boys who had accompanied him, and when, at the usual breakfast hour, he was still absent, she felt little surprise, concluding they had been up late the night before, and had not risen so early as usual.

The forenoon passed, and still she looked for him in vain. Putting on her bonnet, she stepped over to the residence of one of the boys, where she thought he would be most likely to stop, to enquire for him. Here she learned that he had remained in town, all night, but with the intention, as the boys supposed, of returning in the morning. She went home, and felt no serious alarm till it began to grow dark. Then, she feared some accident had befallen him, and got one of the neighboring boys to go and see if he could learn the cause of his delay. The messenger returned before bed-time, with the intelligence that he had not been at the place spoken of, nor could he hear anything of him. Mrs. Lorin now became seriously alarmed. A consultation of the neighbors was held, and a couple of men volunteered to go to the town, but they returned as unsuccessful as the first.

All subsequent search and enquiry proving equally fruitless, it was thought best, by the neighbors, to impart to Mrs. Lorin, their suspicions relative to the course he had taken, for many circumstances, and some remarks which Edgar himself had made to the boys, led them to think he had gone off with the circus company. And it was not long before these conjectures were confirmed by a merchant of the town where Edgar had first visited the circus, who, during a short sojourn in a neighboring city, had seen Edgar, and witnessed some of his feats. He had stopped at the same hotel, and though Edgar tried to avoid him, had found an opportunity of speaking a few words with him. He enquired after his mother, and sent her a few dollars in money, but expressed no contrition for the grief he had caused her, nor any desire to return. The gentleman said he would hardly have recognized him, had he not heard his name, so much was he changed—though he had scarcely been absent a year. Instead of the modest, thoughtful appearance which had formerly characterized him, he had a swaggering, defiant air, wore his hat on one side of his head, smoked cigars, joined them at cards, took a dram, and was loud and boisterous as the rest.

The widow continued to toil on, broken in spirit, the burden of her cares increasing, her strength declining, and her means growing more narrow. She had heard no tidings of Edgar for two or three years, and mourned him as one dead.

One evening, about six years after his departure, having finished her labor for the day, Mrs. Lorin was resting herself in the little room which was once Edgar's favorite retreat. She sat on the lounge where he used to sit, and taking up a book that lay on the table, she opened it, and his name in his own handwriting, and some verses he had inscribed on the margin, met her eye. Long she sat, sad and thoughtful, dwelling on the memory of her son, now, she feared, lost to her forever. She thought of the time when she had cheerfully borne toil for his sake, strengthened by the hope that she should one day see him distinguished, though in what way she had no definite idea. She called to mind the satisfaction he seemed to derive from pursuing his studies in this favorite nook, then she thought to herself—"I wish I had permitted him to continue them here even after his act of carelessness; possibly he might not then have been led away in the manner he was,"—though she did not look upon herself in any way culpable.

"Persons little know what is to befall them," she used to say, when speaking of the matter with her neighbors, "or for what end they are bringing up children;" and she thought, for such was her philosophy, that if he had not yielded to temptation at that time, he would have done so at some other, "if it was in him, and was so to be," "for whatever is to be will be," she said, "and we cannot avoid it."

While Mrs. Lorin sat there, musing sadly alone, she heard the sound of horses' feet approaching rapidly. Drawing aside the curtain that shaded the window to look out, for travellers did not often pass her secluded dwelling, she saw a man alighting from an open carriage at the gate; throwing the bridle of his horse over a post, he advanced hurriedly to the door. A sudden trembling seized the widow, she knew not why, as she proceeded to open it. A middle-aged, respectable looking man stood on the steps, who, bowing, inquired if that was the residence of the widow Lorin? Answering in the affirmative, she asked if he would not walk in? He was in much haste, he said, but would step in a moment, and make known to her his errand. After he was seated, he inquired of the widow if she had a son named Edgar?

"I once had," she answered, "but whether he be still alive, I know not: it is long since I heard anything from him; if he is living, he has forgotten his poor old mother." And at thought of what might be his fate, she began to weep.

"He is alive," said the man, "and I have come to you with tidings from him."

"Heaven be praised!" ejaculated the widow, "for if so, he may yet repent of the wickedness of which, I fear, he has been guilty."

"I grieve to tell you, madam, though your son lives, he lies on a bed of illness, to which I have come to summon you."

After struggling with her emotions for a moment, rising from her seat, she exclaimed—

"Where is he? take me to him immediately."

"He is at the house of a gentleman by the name of Allen, about twenty miles distant, who told me he was a relative of yours."

"Oh, yes, I know him well—a cousin of my mother. How came he there? Is he very ill?" enquired the widow in a breath.

"I have not seen him," the man answered, "but Mr. Allen told me he did not consider him dangerously so. He employed me to come for you, and begged me to lose no time, as your son was very impatient to see you; so if you will prepare yourself, we will set off as soon as possible."

Mrs. Lorin hastened in to a neighbor's, and acquainting them with the tidings, she hardly knew whether of joy or sorrow, requested that a young woman, a member of the family, might be permitted to go and stay, during her absence, with her daughter—a feeble, sickly girl—who increased, rather than lightened the burden of her cares. In a few minutes the last charge "to be careful," including a variety of details, was given to Betsey—for nothing could divert the course of the widow's ruling passion,—and seated beside the messenger, she was proceeding rapidly towards the town where her cousin resided. After going a little way in silence, the man informed her of some further particulars concerning her son, with which he had become acquainted; the substance of which was—that he had arrived at the house of her relative, two days previous, in a very weak state, and on the next morning was unable to leave his room. They had supposed it was merely exhaustion, as he had been travelling on foot for several days, but as he continued to grow worse, a physician had been summoned, who said he would not be able to move for some time, and the young man had begged his mother might be sent for. Though the time seemed long to the widow, they soon stopped before the gate of her cousin's dwelling, and he came out to welcome her, and conduct her into the house. She was much agitated on seeing him—and scarcely able to answer his kind enquiries concerning her health. After seating her in the parlor, he went to bring his wife, who was busy about some household affairs, as the invalid was sleeping, and she had left him in charge of her daughter. The good woman came, and endeavored, as well as she was able, to comfort the widow, assuring her that she trusted her son, who seemed more like one worn and exhausted by fatigue and privation than really diseased, would soon recover by careful nursing and the joy of being again with mother, and she went to ascertain if he had waked, that his mother might go to his apartment. She returned in a few moments, saying that he still slept. His mother expressed a desire to go and look on him as he slept—so Mrs. Garner led the way to his room.

It was a small, neat chamber, only partially shaded; the bed of the invalid occupied a curtained recess at one end. Silently the widow approached to look upon her son. One thin, emaciated hand lay on the cover, but the face was partly turned from her. She knelt by the side of the bed, and took that thin hand in hers. Her sobs awoke him, and when she raised her face from the bed clothes, where she had buried it, his was turned towards her, and his hollow, lustreless eye met hers. She could scarcely suppress a shriek—for in the wan spectre-like countenance before her, she recognized hardly a trace of her bright, beautiful boy, as she had seen him last.

"My mother!" he exclaimed, stretching out his arms towards her.

When she released him from her embrace, and laid him gently back on the pillow, she perceived, as the light from the window shone more fully upon his face, that it was disfigured by the small-pox.

"Oh, Edgar!" she exclaimed, sitting down by the side of the bed. "How much you must have suffered, to have changed so much. Oh! why did you leave me thus! No one has cared for you as I would have done."

"Yes, mother," he said, "I have indeed suffered much, and sinned more; but I have learned this, that suffering is ever the consequence of sin."

"Heaven be praised!" ejaculated his mother. "I hope my son, you have not learned this too late."

In a few days, when it was thought he was sufficiently recruited, he was taken home, and he bore the journey very well. The joy of the thought that he was once more to behold scenes he had loved in early years, gave him strength.

One could hardly have recognized, in the emaciated being, with lustreless eye and haggard brow, who, supported by pillows, occupied the lounge in the little room where he had requested them to be placed for him, the bright and buoyant boy, who a few years before, full of health and hope, reclined there, weaving bright visions of happiness for the future. The room—everything about him, was the same. The fire-place was filled with green bushes, the looking-glass was garlanded as in days gone by; even the pitcher he had broken, nicely cemented, stood in its accustomed place on the little table, filled with flowers. All wore the same appearance as in former years—he alone was changed. His luxuriant curls, which had added so much to his beauty, were closely shorn; his once beautiful countenance was fearfully marked too by small-pox. The eyes, so full of eagerness and hope, were sunken and expressionless; his attenuated form had lost its grace, and his tones, once so full and musical, were harsh and hoarse.

One evening, when his mother was sitting by him, alone, and he seemed better and more cheerful than usual, he related, at her request, the adventures that had befallen him during the years of his absence. He spoke of his feelings when he left home. He was prompted by ambition and allured by the attractions the life he led seemed to present, but all this would have been insufficient to allure him from his home, which had hitherto seemed the brightest spot of earth to him, had not its light been dimmed. For the first few months he had enjoyed his new mode of life exceedingly, and scarcely thought of his home; then, for a time, he longed for the familiar faces of his friends, and felt sad and lonely. But his companions rallied him so much on this, and urged him so strongly to join them in their various modes of amusing themselves, and killing time, as they termed it, when they staid, as they sometimes did, for a considerable length of time, in a large town—which amusements consisted principally of drinking, gaming and kindred sports—that he grew ashamed of the quiet ways for which they ridiculed him, and was led to comply, believing, such is the influence of example and association, that not to do so, was mean and spiritless, and he could not be manly otherwise. After continuing in this way for several years, during which time he had contracted many pernicious habits, and become familiarized with many vices, his employer, partially intoxicated, quarrelled with him for some imagined offence, and made use of such abusive language towards him, and ill-used him so much, that he determined to leave him, and try his fortunes elsewhere—which he did the same evening without apprising his employer—as the bills were then posted up in which his name figured largely.

After roving about for awhile, engaging, for a short period at a time, in various employments, of each of which he soon tired, he obtained a situation as barkeeper in a city hotel. This suited him very well for awhile, though, when reflection came, he often wondered at himself that it did so. When he looked back on his past life, and thought how peaceful and bright it had been, he longed to taste again its quiet peacefulness—but the "creeping rind" of sin seemed every day hardening and strengthening, and encroaching more and more on his better nature: though he longed to shake it off, and sometimes made efforts to do so. At last weariness and despondency began to take possession of him. He saw himself shunned and contemned by all good people; no one aided with counsel and encouragement his endeavors to return to the right path, but rather "backward pulled his slow resolves;" so feeling himself an alien and an outcast on the earth, he plunged more deeply into vice. Falling in with a young man of pleasing manners, but of rowdy habits, he was persuaded to accompany him to the city of C—, where they took lodgings, and began to look about them for some means by which they could obtain money.

A few evenings after their arrival, his companion was out, as he said, to make some purchases. During his absence a sheriff called in search of him. A quantity of jewelry had been missed at their last stopping-place; and as it was known that his companion had before been guilty of similar offences, he was at once suspected, and they were traced to their present lodgings. Upon search, the articles were found in his trunk, and Edgar was arrested as an accomplice; but his comrade, who had probably got notice of the affair, was not to be found. Edgar was committed to prison to await his trial, and there, in the solitude of his cell, black despair seized him. No one, he said, could describe the agony of mind he endured during that period of confinement. He reviewed his past life, and resolved, if he could once more be set free, to forsake his evil ways, and he prayed for opportunity and strength to fulfil his resolves. When his trial came on, he was acquitted, but was soon after seized with small-pox, then prevalent, from which he suffered severely, barely escaping with his life. As soon as he was able to leave the house, weak in body and penniless, he set out to reach the home, for which he now yearned, and after suffering a great many privations, had arrived at the house of his cousin, just as his last remaining strength was failing him.

He never left that room again, till he was carried to his last resting-place, a few months after. His mother still lives in her little cottage, supporting herself and her feeble daughter by the labor of her hands—her sister's son residing with a clergyman near. Her form is bowed with the weight of grief, more than years, and her hair is blanched to perfect whiteness. She follows mechanically the round of her accustomed duties; but no hope in the future cheers her on. Every day she visits the grave of her son, and this melancholy pleasure seems the only one of her existence.

BINDWEED.

They met—'twas not in Spring—oh no!
The air was thick and chill;
The ground was whit'ning o'er with snow,
And winter-sealed each rill.

They met—another on his arm
Confidingly did lean;
Yet Nellie felt—nor thought of harm—
Her martyr-fate between.

She would not, for earth's gems most rare,
Have filled that proud one's place—
And yet she knew her impress there,
No time could e'er efface.

Her impress—it was not of sense,
On outward vision made—
Else were it all a base pretence,
To cast the light in shade.

As if the modest mignonette
We twine gay dahlias round,
Should boast itself a coronet,
While trailing o'er the ground.

They parted—not with lips apart,
But voiceless, as the rills
Which flow, ice-locked, yet free at heart,
From God's eternal hills.

They parted—but each dreary cloud
Now grew a vestment bright;
Became an angel's dewy shroud,
To wrap their fancies bright.

They parted—full of holy trust
That minstrelsy thus given,
While they forget not "God is just,"
Must find its meed—a Heaven!

MENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

All philosophical investigations relate either to matter or mind; to investigate the former is the province of physics, the latter belongs to metaphysics or mental philosophy.

There is nothing about which we know so little, as about ourselves. We understand incomparably more about the nature of matter and the surrounding creation, than about our own minds to which matter was made to minister. The nature of the human mind, its connection with the material world, the purposes for which its several faculties are bestowed, these are things little understood.

We lately read an instructive and highly interesting article on "Memory and its Caprices," taken from Hogg's Instructor, from which we make the following extract:—

"There is no faculty so inexplicable as memory. It is not merely that its powers vary so much in different individuals, but that every one has found their own liable to the most unaccountable changes and chances. Why vivid impressions should appear to become utterly obliterated, and then suddenly spring to light, as if by the wand of a magician, without the slightest effort of our own, is a mystery which no metaphysician has ever been able to explain. We all have experience of this, when we have striven in vain to recollect a name, a quotation, or a tune, and find it present itself unbidden, it may be, at a considerable interval of time, when the thoughts are engaged on another subject. We all know the uneasy feeling with which we search for the missing article, and the relief when it suddenly flashes across the mind, and when, as if traced by invisible ink, it comes out unexpectedly, bright and clear."

We differ from the writer of this paragraph, and think either that he has never read the metaphysical writings of Locke, Hume, Brown, or Stewart, or else that his memory is capricious and not to be trusted, as well as the memories of those gentlemen cited by him as examples of its caprices. We think that the writings of these able men have very satisfactorily explained the cause of these mental phenomena, and for the information of our readers we shall give the substance of what they have written, in connection with some philosophical speculations of our own.

Sensation is the germ of intellect and the avenue of all human knowledge. This is a cardinal principle in the writings of these philosophers. Nothing at first appears more unbounded than the mind of man. Whilst his body is confined to one place, the thoughts of the exile can wander beyond oceans and mountains to the scenes of his native land; the historian can survey the past, the present, and the future; and the imagination of the mathematician, deeply engaged in astronomical speculations, can travel beyond the limits of the solar system to the most distant regions of the universe. We can soar into strains of the most exalted sentiment, and conjure up a succession of bright and glowing imagery; or if another humor take us, we can picture to ourselves a thousand strange, incongruous and whimsical objects, forming combinations which have no existence in nature. Indeed, there is no difficulty in imagining unnatural things; it is as easy to imagine a golden as a granite mountain. Men are too apt to take their fancies for realities.

But, though the mind of man apparently possesses this unbounded liberty, it is in reality confined within narrow limits. We are organized with obvious reference to the external world by which we are to be operated upon; the eye is adapted to receive the light; the ear is formed for the reception of sound; the body is in fact, an apparatus exquisitely contrived to render us sensible to the nature of external things, and the impressions made by external things on our senses in childhood, furnish us with the elements of all our knowledge and those ideas which afterwards form the material of our sublimest speculations. Nature is the great teacher. Look at that child. Instruction from without is now pouring in at every avenue of sense. There is a perpetual discovery of something new; a rapid succession of novelties in everything that is visible to his senses. What volatility of spirits! what feverish excitement do we observe in him when he sees anything new! We are perplexed by the multiplicity of questions which he asks on the vast variety of things which he is perpetually discovering. It may be truly said, that childhood is a state of sensation without reflection, and that the first stage of childhood is spent in a state of constant and curious excitement. Every child is a natural philosopher as soon as he begins to feel and perceive. Every father must have observed it, and is familiar with those ever recurring questions which children propose. "What is it?" "What is that?" It is thus that we pass through the happy period of unreflecting childhood, each hour bringing with it stores of facts and natural appearances, the rich materials of our future knowledge. A few years, thus spent in observation, are sufficient to familiarize every child with the common classes of phenomena, and they cease to excite him. His attention is now drawn from the discovery of what is new to the examination of what is familiar: the feverish excitement of childhood gives place to the calm of manly contemplation; from the materials of the past he draws the lessons of his future wisdom; the great work of comparison begins, and the first attempts at generalization are now made which mark the dawn of science in the mind. The conduct of the man is now influenced by the education of nature and by the thoughts and ideas that were acquired during a state of childhood.

Now what is it that produces this gradual development of reason and reflection in the child? We apprehend it is a more enlarged and enlightened experience which is the result of memory and the association of the ideas obtained. If we had the power of external sense only, and were without memory and association, as we have reason to believe is in reality the case with many of the inferior animals, then our knowledge of the existence of all external things would be limited to the moment of sensation, and would be extinguished forever with the fading of those sensations by which we were made acquainted with their existence. Life would thus be passed in a state of perpetual childhood. The acquisition of such fugitive knowledge would avail us nothing, and we should never rise to the dignity of intelligent and rational beings.

But the all-provident Creator has so constituted the mind, that former impressions made on our organs of sense are secured to us. All such impressions are associated together as cause and effect, so that any single impression immediately calls up a corresponding train of very similar impressions, which were formerly made on our senses.

By this admirable and beautiful construction of our mental constitution, the knowledge that we acquire without, is made to live within us, and ideas or impressions, formerly produced on our organization, again recur to us without any renewed perception of the object which originally excited them. All present ideas, thoughts and feelings are thus associated together with those that are past, and we are perpetually living over again our past sensations. Now, memory is simply the mind relapsing into a former state, in consequence of the recurrence of former ideas through association; and by endowing the mind of man with this power of association or memory, nature has raised him to the dignity of rationality. The ideas thus revived succeed each other according to certain laws contrived with the most admirable adaptation to our wants, so as to bring again to our minds the knowledge previously acquired at the very time when it is of the greatest service to us.

The subject is important, and we may again bring it before the reader. From the few metaphysical hints which we have thrown out, it will be seen that the caprices of memory are not so inexplicable as the author of "Memory and its Caprices" would represent them to be; and that the "sudden" revival of "vivid impressions," "as if by the wand of a magician," is capable of a clear and satisfactory explanation by a reference to the phenomena and laws of association.

THE DUKE AND HIS COOK.—The Duke of Wellington once requested the connoisseur whom the author of Tancred terms "the finest judge in Europe," to provide him a chef. Felix, whom the late Lord Seaford was reluctantly about to part with on economical grounds, was recommended and received. Some months afterwards his patron was dining with Lord Seaford, and before the first course was half over, he observed, "So I find you have got the duke's cook to dress your dinner?" "I have got Felix," replied Lord S., "but he is no longer the duke's cook. The poor fellow came to me with tears in his eyes, and begged me to take him back again, at reduced wages, or no wages at all, for he was determined not to remain at Apsley House. 'Has the duke been finding fault?' said I. 'Oh no, my lord; I would say if he had, he is the kindest and most liberal of masters: but I serve him a dinner that would make Ude or Francatelli burst with envy, and he says nothing; I serve him a dinner dressed, and badly dressed by the cook-maid, and he says nothing. I cannot live with such a master, if he was a hundred times a hero.'"

ANIMALS IN JAPAN.

[From MacFarlane's "Japan," recently published by George P. Putnam & Co., we take an interesting chapter on the natural history of the country.]

Though abundantly stocked with pictures and carvings, with chimerae and all other sorts of monsters, borrowed from the Chinese, the Japanese empire is but sparingly provided with four-footed beasts, wild or tame. The country is too much cultivated and peopled to afford cover to the wild quadrupeds, and the tame are bred only for carriage and agriculture. The use of animal food is interdicted by the national religion, and they have not left pasture enough to support many sheep and oxen. The horses are generally small, but there is a breed said to be not inferior to that imported into India from the Persian Gulf. But the horses of this kind now appear to be rare. In the time of old Captain Saris they were common enough. "Their horses are not tall, but of the size of our middling nags, short, and well trussed, small headed, and full of mettle, in my opinion far excelling the Spanish jennet in pride and stomach." The Japanese relate most marvellous stories of the performance of some of their steeds. There is also a breed of ponies, which, though small, has been much admired. Oxen and cows are kept only for ploughing and for carriage. Of milk and butter the Japanese know nothing. They have a large humped buffalo, sometimes of a monster size, which they train to draw carts or to carry heavy goods on their backs. The elephant, the camel, and the ass, are unknown animals. Sheep and goats were kept formerly at the Dutch settlements, in the neighborhood, of which some few may yet be found. They may be bred in the country to great advantage, if the natives were permitted to eat the flesh, or knew how to manage or manufacture the wool. They have a few swine, which were brought over from China, and which some of the country people near the coast still keep, not, indeed, for their own use, but to sell to certain Chinese junks which are allowed to come over to trade, most of the Chinese mariners being addicted to pork.

Dogs or common curs they have, and in superfluous numbers. These dogs are as much the pest of the towns of Japan as they are of Constantinople and the other foul cities and towns of the Ottoman empire. This vast increase of the canine species, and the encouragement and immunity accorded to it, arose (according to the popular account,) out of a curious superstition and an extravagant imperial decree. An emperor who reigned at the close of the eighteenth century chanced to be born under the Sign of the Dog, the Dog being one of the twelve celestial signs of the Japanese. For this reason, the emperor had as great an esteem for dogs as the Roman emperor Augustus is reported to have entertained for rams. When he ascended the throne, he willed and ordained that dogs should be held as sacred animals: and, from that time, more puppies saw the light and were permitted to live in Japan than in any other country on the face of the earth, Turkey, perhaps, excepted.

These dogs have no masters, but lie and prowl about the streets, to the exceeding great annoyance of passengers, especially if they happen to be foreign travellers, or Christians in Christian dresses. If they come round you in packs, barking, snarling, and showing their teeth,—nay, even if they fall upon you and bite you, you must on no account take the law into your own hands, and beat them off or shoot them. To kill one of them is a capital crime, whatever mischief the brute may have done you. In every town there are Guardians of the Dogs, and to these officers notice must be given in case of any canine misdemeanor, these guardians alone being empowered to punish the dogs. Every street must keep a certain number of these animals, or at least provide them with victuals; huts, or dog-hospitals, stand in all parts of the town, and to these the animals, in case of sickness, must be carefully conveyed by the inhabitants. The dogs that die must be carried up to the tops of mountains and hills, the usual burying places of men and women, and there be very decently interred. Old Kämpfer says:—"The natives tell a pleasant tale on this head. A Japanese, as he was carrying the carcase of a dead dog to the top of a steep mountain, grew impatient, grumbled, and cursed the emperor's birth-day and whimsical command. His companion bid him hold his tongue and be quiet, and, instead of swearing, return thanks to the gods that the emperor was not born under the Sign of the Horse, for, in that case, the load would have been heavier."

We give the pleasant tale as we find it, but we do not believe that it points to the real origin of the superstitious regard for dogs, which many of the Mongol race share with the Japanese and Turks. That superstition had its origin in the wilds of Tartary, or in whatever other part of the world it was that served as the cradle and great starting point of the wide-spread Mongol race. The dog must have been in a manner deified, when they first put him among their celestial signs.

Among some of the Mongolian tribes, the dog is the indicator of fate, the harbinger of death; and among others, the dog is an object either of dread or devotion.

But our learned German is not always so facetious about this monstrous annoyance of street dogs. On reaching Nagasaki, he says, "The street dogs also deserve to be noticed among the inhabitants of this city, they being full as well, nay, better maintained and taken care of than many of the people, and although the imperial orders on this head are not regarded and complied with at Nagasaki, with that strictness as they must be in other parts of the empire, which are not so remote from court, yet the streets be full of these animals, leading a most easy and independent life, giving way neither to men nor horses. The town is never without a great deal of noise from these animals."

The Japanese have no dogs of superior breed, but they have cats of a peculiarly beautiful kind. These are of a whitish color, with large yellow and black spots, and a very short tail: the ladies carry them about as lap-dogs.

In the islands are found deer, wild boars, and hares, but apparently in no great numbers. There are also monkeys, wild dogs, foxes, some curious animals that look like a cross between the fox and the wolf, and a few small bears in the secluded parts of the northern provinces. The fox bears not the very best of characters among the Japanese: the peasantry believe him to be in league with all evil spirits or devils, and to be himself the very incarnation of craft, malice, and wickedness; "but," says old Kampfer, "the fox-hunters are expert in conjuring and stripping this animated devil, his hair and wool being much coveted for writing and painting pencils." The weasel and ferret are found. Rats and mice swarm throughout the country, for the beautiful cats, being pets, have no turn for mousing. The rats are tamed by the natives, and taught to perform several tricks, and form a common diversion for the poorer people. We find mention made of two small animals of a red color, that live under the roofs of the houses, and are very tame. They are called the itut and the tin.

The destructive white ant, that great annoyance of most parts of the East Indies, is very common. The Japanese call them do toos or piercers, a name they well merit; for they perforate whatever they meet, stones and metals only excepted, and when once they get into a merchant's warehouse, they in a very short compass of time can destroy or ruin an amazing quantity of his best goods. Nothing has been yet found that will keep them off, except salt laid under the goods and spread about them. The common European ants are their mortal enemies, and wherever these have been introduced, the do toos have rapidly disappeared, like the original English rat before the invasion of the Norwegian.

The islands, however, may be said to be remarkably free from insects and obnoxious reptiles. There are but few snakes, and hardly any of them appear to be venomous. One of these is of a beautiful green color, with a very flat head. Japanese soldiers cook it and eat its flesh, in the belief that it imparts courage and audacity. The natives also calcine the flesh in an earthen pot hermetically sealed, and derive from it a powder, which they believe to possess the most extraordinary medicinal virtues. There is a water snake of monstrous size; and another very large snake, of black color, but quite inoffensive, is found in the mountains. Both are very scarce, and when taken are shown about for money.

Birds are rather numerous. Of tame poultry they keep only fowls and ducks. They sell them sometimes to foreigners, but never eat them. Cocks are highly prized by the religious orders, because they mark the time, and foretell changes of the weather. Indeed, they are chiefly kept up as time-keepers.

The crane is the chief of the wild birds of the country; but like the heron, and the stork, which also abound, they can scarcely be called wild, for they are held as sacred birds, and nobody must injure or molest them. They thus become quite familiar, and mix with the people, and throng the market-places, just as the storks do in all towns, villages, and bazaars in Turkey, where they are equally objects of affection and veneration. No doubt this feeling also had its rise in the Tartarian regions. When the conquering Turks first came into Europe, they were accustomed to say that the stork had a singular affection for their race, and that whithersoever they might carry their victorious arms, the stork would follow them and live with them. In Japan the country people never call the crane by any other name than that of O Tsurisama, "My great lord crane." There are two sorts of them: one white as snow, and the other gray. They portend good fortune, and long life. For this reason the imperial apartments, the walls of temples, and other happy places, are commonly adorned with figures of them. Cranes are also painted on dishes and drinking cups, and reproduced on articles of domestic furniture. We have seen native paintings of these birds that are exquisitely beautiful, as true and correct in drawing as beautiful in finish and coloring. They are among the very best specimens of Japanese art.

The tortoise is another happy and sacred creature, and is represented on walls, and reproduced in the same manner.

Wild geese and wild ducks are very abundant, and very tame. There are several species of both. One kind of duck is of immense size and of wonderfully brilliant and beautiful plumage. Pheasants, wild pigeons, and woodcocks, are very common birds. Hawks also are common. Ravens are scarce. Our common European crows, as also parrots, and other Indian birds, are never to be met with.

Of singing birds, Kampfer mentions only larks and nightingales; but he says that both of these sing more sweetly than with us. The natives highly prize the nightingale, and large sums are paid for a caged one, with a good voice.

They have plenty of bees, and, consequently, honey and wax are produced.

The shrill cicada, or winged-grasshopper, peopled the pines, and fills the woods and mountains with its incessant song. Butterflies and beetles are numerous and diversified, some of both kinds being very beautiful. Among the night-moths there is one sort which the Japanese ladies keep in little cages, as pets and curiosities. This moth is about four inches long, slender, round-bodied, with four wings, two of which are transparent, and concealed under the other pair of wings, which shine like polished metal, and are most curiously and beautifully adorned with blue and gold lines and spots. The following graceful fable owes its origin to the matchless beauty of this moth: All other night-flies fall in love with it; and to get rid of their importunities it maliciously bids them, as a trial of their devotion and constancy, to go and fetch it fire. The blind lovers, obedient to command, fly to the nearest lamp or candle, and never fail to get burned to death.

The sea all about Japan is plentifully stocked with all sorts of fish, and the natives are very expert fishermen. In the time of Charlevoix and Kampfer, and earlier travellers, the whale fishery was carried on to a great extent, particularly in the sea which washes the southern coasts of the great island, Nippon. The common way of catching them was by harpooning, in the manner of our Greenland fishermen; but the Japanese boats seemed to be fitter for the purpose than ours, being small, narrow, tapering at each end into a sharp point, and rowing with incredible swiftness. "About 1680, a rich fisherman, in the province of Omura, found out a new way of catching whales with nets made of strong ropes, about two inches thick. This method was afterwards followed with good success by another man of the country. They say that, as soon as the whale finds its head entangled in a net, he cannot, without great difficulty, swim away or dive, and may be very easily killed with the harpoon in the common manner. The reason why this new method hath not been universally received is, because it requires a greater and much more expensive set of tackle than common fishermen can afford."

They enumerate six kinds of whales, differing in name, form, and size. Of all these several kinds, nothing was thrown away by the Japanese as useless. They boiled the fat or blubber into train oil; they pickled, boiled, roasted, or fried the flesh, and ate it: they even reduced the cartilaginous bones into food; they made cords, ropes, and strings for their musical instruments out of the nerves and tendons; they made a great use of the fins; and out of the jaw-bones, and other solid bones, they manufactured numerous articles, particularly their fine steelyards for weighing their gold and silver.

The Japanese fishermen attribute to the flesh of the whale, their favorite food, their strength and hardihood, and their extraordinary capability of enduring exposure to cold and foul weather.

It was in pursuing the whale to the coasts of Japan that the American ships met with those disasters, and that inhospitable treatment, which first made the government of the United States turn its attention in this direction.

Turtles of enormous size are said to abound on the southern or eastern coasts. Salmon, soles, turbot, a sort of cod, smelts, and other delicious sea fish, together with all sorts of lobsters, crabs, shrimps, oysters, muscles, &c., are taken in surprising abundance; and there are other fish of species unknown to us, and of which, some are said to be delicious. It is fortunate for the natives that their prejudices and superstitions allow them to eat fish. In the larger islands every part of the coast is thickly strewed with buildings, and at every second or third mile are populous villages, from which extensive fisheries are carried on. In fact, the Japanese are essentially ichthyophagi. Aided by a good growth of potatoes, or an adequate supply of rice, the sea alone would support a vast population.

When Sidney was told he might save his life by telling a falsehood—by denying his handwriting—he said—"When God hath brought me into a dilemma in which I must assert a lie or lose my life, He gives me a clear indication of my duty, which is to prefer death to falsehood."

Anger is the most impotent passion that influences the mind of man; it effects nothing it undertakes, and hurts the man who is possessed by it more than the object against which it is directed.

PERSEVERANCE.

"Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose
That you resolved to effect."—SHAKESPEARE.

A weak spirit will be crushed by the same misfortunes which would rouse a strong one to exertion. The same storm which fixes more firmly the giant oak, roots up the tender sapling.

Stroke after stroke fells that "Unwedgeable and gnarled oak!"— effort after effort overcomes a gnarled, ungracious fortune.

Bonaparte once said: "I have no idea of a merchant's acquiring a fortune as a general wins a battle—at a single blow."

This slap-dash way of acquiring a fortune has been ruinous to very many young merchants. They covet Aladdin's lamp; with one smart rub they would summon the genii, and obtain countless treasures.

Disappointed in their sanguine expectations, and perhaps utterly ruined and bankrupt, instead of beginning again in a moderate way, with experience for their guide, they have either entirely forsaken mercantile affairs, or struck another "blow" so violent that the rebound has crushed them to the earth.

To know how to wait is the great means of success, says a modern French writer; to know how to persevere is the surest means of success in any undertaking, and this involves patient waiting.

Perseverance is like a taste for olives where they are not indigenous; it is not a natural gift like genius, it is an acquirement. True, some persons more easily continue steadfast in a career than others; but, after all, anybody can persevere if they only will.

When the boy takes his gun, and goes out in the morning to shoot birds, he resolves not to go home with his game-bag empty. Miles and "mileses," as Hood says, he tramps over field and ford, mud and mire, through the bushes, over hedges and stone walls, tearing his trousers and his shins, bruising his hands and blistering his feet—and all for what purpose? Success.

"All things that are,
Are with more spirit chased than enjoy'd."

"Men prize the thing ungain'd more than it is."

Ah! but there are more dragons in the way to mercantile success, and fiercer ones, than guarded the golden apples of the Hesperides.

"Fight them, and the cravens flee, thy boldness is their panic; Fear them, and thy treacherous heart hath lent their ranks a legion."

Stephen Girard, at the age of forty, commanded his own sloop, engaged in the coasting-trade between New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans. He had taken many steps on the ladder of Fortune since he was a cabin-boy not worth a shilling—but think of his perseverance in mounting that ladder, step by step, till he was worth seven or eight millions of dollars!

The following anecdote of an oriental sovereign is given by Malcolm, in his History of Persia:—

"There was no feature more remarkable in the character of Timour, than his extraordinary perseverance. No difficulties ever led him to recede from what he had undertaken, and he often persisted in his efforts, under circumstances that led all around him to despair. He used, on such occasions, to relate to his friends an anecdote of his early life.

"'I once,' said he, 'was forced to take shelter from my enemies in a ruined building, where I sat alone many hours. Desiring to divert my mind from my hopeless condition, I fixed my observation on an ant that was carrying a grain of corn larger than itself up a high wall. I numbered the efforts it made to accomplish this object. The grain fell sixty-nine times to the ground, but the insect persevered, and the seventieth time it reached the top of the wall. This sight gave me courage at the moment, and I shall never forget the lesson it conveyed.'"

This reminds us of Bruce's spider, whose efforts were nearly as numerous before the object was accomplished.

It is a common notion among young people, that everything must be struck out at a heat; that this in the way genius works. Genius is suggestive, but common sense active.

"Alas!" said a poor widow, the mother of a bright but reckless son, "alas! he has not the gift of continuance."

This is an attribute of the best order of minds. Every school-boy knows "Perseverantia vincit omnia!" at least, he has fixed it indelibly upon the pages of his copy-book. Despise perseverance! As well might one despise the act of breathing, because it has to be repeated and continued every moment. But this is an unconscious act. True; and so may perseverance become, when the habit of accomplishing what is undertaken, is once established. Perseverance is a linked chain which grapples to the goal of Success with hooks of steel.

USEFUL AND INSTRUCTIVE.

A CAUTION TO ALL WHO HAVE "PET" BIRDS.—I have two canaries, Pickwick and David. Also, a goldfinch, Dombey. Of these, Pickwick is the favorite, and he has, through my carelessness, nearly lost his life. A few days since, I filled all their glasses with water. Some time afterwards, I observed that Pickwick was very fidgetty and restless. Every time I went near him, he would try to attract my notice, by coming to the corner of his cage and trying to get his head through the wires. But as I was often in the habit of giving him some tid-bits, I took no particular notice of this till the following Tuesday morning, when he tried so hard to attract my attention, that, thinking he was more troublesome than he ought to be, I put him outside the room. About ten o'clock, my sister, thinking he was quieter than usual, peeped in his cage, and there was poor Pickwick lying all of a heap! his feathers rustled, and he was evidently at his last gasp. When called by his name, he tried hard to look up. But a film had come over his eyes, so that he could hardly see. However, he made a hard struggle, and managed to get to the hole where his water was, telling us plainly as possible, what was the matter with him. And there, sure enough, was the cause of poor Pickwick's illness!

You are aware, no doubt, that the water glasses are put in a wire attached to the cage, and that the hole in the glass fits, or ought to fit, to a corresponding hole in the cage; but, being in a hurry, on Saturday, I did not look to see whether I had put the glass in properly, and the consequence was, the glass only dropped in part of the way, and the poor fellow could not get at his water. Only think, poor, dear Pickwick without water from Saturday till Tuesday! How he must have suffered all that time! Of course, we gave him some water directly, but it was some time before he could swallow any; and when he did, it was with great difficulty. Finding that he wanted to go to sleep directly (for I suppose the poor little fellow had not been able to get any rest for three nights), I put him in a dark room till the next day. He had then quite recovered, and, I am happy to say, "Pickwick's himself again." Let this operate as a warning to others.

[Were all the cases published, in which birds perish by a similar act of thoughtlessness, their number would be incredible. We have written against the use of these water-glasses till we are weary; nor should they be used for seed. They ought to be discarded altogether. The agony endured by the bird, as described above, must have been intense, indeed!—Kidd's Own Journal of Natural History.

CHINA.—The passage annexed, from Dr. Guzlaff, throws a new light upon Chinese affairs:—

"Foreigners, who know nothing about the internal state of the country, are apt to imagine that there reigns lasting peace. Nothing is, however, more erroneous; insurrections of villages, cities, and districts, are of frequent occurrence. The refractory spirit of the people, the oppression and embezzlement of the mandarins, and other causes—such as dearth and demagogues—frequently cause an unexpected revolt. In these cases the destruction of property and hostility against the rulers of the land (especially if these have been tyrants) is often carried to great excess. There are instances of the infuriated mob broiling their magistrates over a slow fire. On the other hand, the cruelty of government, when victorious, knows no bounds: the treatment of political prisoners is really so shocking as to be incredible, if one had not been an eye-witness of these inhuman deeds. * * *

One of the most common evils in China is starvation. The population is very dense. The means of subsistence are, in ordinary times, frequently not above the demand; and it is, therefore, nothing extraordinary to witness, on the least failure of the crop, utter wretchedness and misery. To provide for all the hungry mouths is impossible; and the cruel policy of the mandarins carries their indifference so far as to affirm that hunger is requisite to thin the dense masses of the people. Whenever such a judgment has come upon the land, and the people are in want of the necessities of life, dreadful disorders soon arise, and the most powerful government would not be able to put down the rising and robberies which are committed on the strength of the prevailing misery. There seems to be a total change in the peaceful nature of the inhabitants; and many a patient laborer turns fiercely upon his rich neighbor, like a wolf or a tiger, to devour his substance. No one can have an idea of the anarchy which, on such occasions, ensues, and the utter demoralization of the people. Yet as soon as relief is afforded, and a rich harvest promises fair, the spirit of order again prevails, and outrages are put a stop to. The people then combine, arm themselves, and proceed in thousands to catch marauders, like wild beasts. No mercy is shown on such occasions, and the mandarins, on account of their weakness, cannot interfere. Scenes of this description very often occurred, without giving rise to severe reflection on the character of Taoukwang's administration."

HINTS ON PAPER-HANGING.—Many a fever has been caused by the horrible nuisance of corrupt size used in paper-hanging in bed-rooms. The nausea which the sleeper is aware of on waking in the morning, in such a case, should be a warning needing no repetition. Down should come the whole paper, at any cost or inconvenience, for it is an evil which allows of no tampering. The careless decorator will say that time will set all right—that the smell will go off—that airing the room well in the day, and burning some pungent thing or other, at night, in the meantime, will do very well. It will not do very well; for health, and even life, may be lost in the interval. It is not worth while to have one's stomach impaired for life, or one's nerves shattered, for the sake of the cost and trouble of papering a room, or a whole house, if necessary. The smell is not the grievance, but the token of the grievance. The grievance is animal putridity, with which we are shut up when this smell is perceptible in our chambers. Down should come the paper; and the wall behind should be scraped clear of every particle of its last covering. It is astonishing that so lazy a practice as that of putting a new paper over an old one should exist to the extent it does. Now and then an incident occurs which shows the effect of such absurd carelessness. Not long ago, a handsome house in London became intolerable to a succession of residents, who could not endure a mysterious bad smell which pervaded it when shut up from the outer air. Consultations were held about drains, and all the particulars that could be thought of, and all in vain. At last, a clever young man, who examined the house from top to bottom, fixed his suspicions on a certain room, where he inserted a small slip of glass in the wall. It was presently covered, and that repeatedly, with a putrid dew. The paper was torn down, and behind it was found a mass of old papers, an inch thick, stuck together with their layers of size, and exhibiting a spectacle which we will not sicken our readers by describing.—Dickens' Household Words.

THE WAY THE NINEVEH REMAINS WERE PRESERVED.—Many of the smaller and most interesting pieces of these remains, all minutely characterized over with Ninevite literature, were so friable, that it seemed next to impossible to carry them away. They crumbled under the hand; and what was to be done? Professor Owen advised Mr. Layard to boil them in a solution of common glue; he did so; and they came out as hard as marble, capable of being kept "forever!" The fact is, that bone is just an earthy lime compound, held together by gelatine or fine glue; and, but for the gelatinous matter diffused through its substance, would be brittle and frail. Steep a bone in muriatic acid, the lime is dissolved, and there remains a piece of good glue of the shape of the bone. Heat a bone in a strong fire, the glue is all burnt away, and the lime compound remains of the same form as before, but friable. Pure stucco is but a soft and loose substance; but if the stucco powder be mixed up with water, holding gelatine or even gum in solution, it gets very hard, indeed. This preparation is much in use, as a substitute for polished stone in internal architecture, under the name of scagliola. Mr. Layard's stone pages of antique literature, lying in the British Museum, are now a sort of durable gelatinised cement. Geology presents petrified bones to the notice of the comparative anatomist; but here chemistry offers ossified stones to the study of the historian, that geologist of the social world, and the balance of obligations is restored.

MOULDINESS.—We have long been aware that many animal and vegetable substances form, when sound, wholesome food, but in certain stages of decomposition are highly deleterious; this is the case particularly with pork, corn, and wheat flour; and cases have frequently occurred abroad, and in this country, in which persons, after eating such provisions, have been seized with the symptoms of poison; and cases are on record of persons having died in consequence of eating ham-pie, Italian cheese, and other articles of food, in which the presence of fungi has indicated the decomposition; and it may be considered worthy of notice, that by experiment it has been proved that the poisonous effect has not arisen from the fungi, as generally supposed, but from the substance on which they grew, and which was in a state of decomposition. Therefore, we may consider them as faithful messengers, warning us of a concealed and treacherous enemy, by providentially revealing to us the presence of decomposition, and at the same time rapidly removing it.

THE ROSE.—Professor Agassiz, in a lecture upon the trees of America, stated a remarkable fact in regard to the family of the rose, which includes among its varieties not only many of the most beautiful flowers which are known, but also the richest fruits, such as the apple, pear, peach, plum, apricot, cherry, strawberry, raspberry, blackberry, &c., namely, that no fossils of plants belonging to this family have ever been discovered by geologists. This he regarded as conclusive evidence that the introduction of this family of plants upon the earth was coeval with, or subsequent to, the creation of man, to whose comfort and happiness they seem especially intended by Providence to contribute.

Inquisitive people are the funnels of conversation; they do not take in anything for their own use, but merely to pass it to another.

THE EVENING BEFORE MARRIAGE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF ZSCHOKKE.

"We shall certainly be very happy together!" said Louise to her aunt on the evening before her marriage, and her cheeks glowed with a deeper red, and her eyes shone with delight. When a bride says we, it may easily be guessed whom of all persons in the world she means thereby.

"I do not doubt it, dear Louise," replied her aunt, "see only that you continue happy together."

"Oh, who can doubt that we shall continue so! I know myself. I have faults, indeed, but my love for him will correct them. And so long as we love each other, we cannot be unhappy. Our love will never grow old."

"Alas!" sighed her aunt, "thou dost speak like a maiden of nineteen, on the day before her marriage, in the intoxication of wishes fulfilled, of fair hopes and happy omens. Dear child, remember this—even the heart in time grows cold. Days will come when the magic of the senses shall fade. And when this enchantment has fled, then it first becomes evident whether we are truly worthy of love. When custom has made familiar the charms that are most attractive, when youthful freshness has died away, and with the brightness of domestic life, more and more shadows have mingled, then, Louise, and not till then, can the wife say of the husband, 'He is worthy of love;' then, first, the husband say of the wife, 'She blooms in imperishable beauty.' But, truly, on the day before marriage, such assertions sound laughable to me."

"I understand you, dear aunt. You would say that our mutual virtues alone can in later years give us worth for each other. But is not he to whom I am to belong—for of myself I can boast nothing but the best intentions—is he not the worthiest, noblest of all the young men of the city? Blooms not, in his soul, every virtue that tends to make life happy?"

"My child," replied her aunt, "I grant it. Virtues bloom in thee as well as in him; I can say this to thee without flattery. But, dear heart, they bloom only, and are not yet ripened beneath the sun's heat and the shower. No blossoms deceive the expectations more than these. We can never tell in what soil they have taken root. Who knows the concealed depths of the heart?"

"Ah, dear aunt, you really frighten me."

"So much the better, Louise. Such fear is right, such fear is as it should be on the evening before marriage. I love thee tenderly, and will, therefore, declare all my thoughts on this subject without disguise. I am not as yet an old aunt. At seven and twenty years, one still looks forward into life with pleasure, the world still presents a bright side to us. I have an excellent husband. I am happy. Therefore, I have the right to speak thus to thee, and to call thy attention to a secret which perhaps thou dost not yet know, one which is not often spoken of to a young and pretty maiden, one, indeed, which does not greatly occupy the thoughts of a young man, and still is of the utmost importance in every household: a secret from which alone spring lasting love and unalterable happiness."

Louise seized the hand of her aunt in both of hers. "Dear aunt! you know I believe you in everything. You mean, that enduring happiness and lasting love are not insured to us by accidental qualities, by fleeting charms, but only by those virtues of the mind which we bring to each other. These are the best dowry which we can possess; these never become old."

"As it happens, Louise. The virtues also, like the beauties of the body, can grow old, and become repulsive and hateful with age."

"How, dearest aunt! what it is you say? Name to me a virtue which can become hateful with years."

"When they have become so, we no longer call them virtues, as a beautiful maiden can no longer be called beautiful, when time has changed her to an old and wrinkled woman."

"But, aunt, the virtues are nothing earthly."

"Perhaps."

"How can gentleness and mildness ever become hateful?"

"So soon as they degenerate into insipid indolence and listlessness."

"And manly courage?"

"Becomes imperious rudeness."

"And modest diffidence?"

"Turns to fawning humility."

"And noble pride?"

"To vulgar haughtiness."

"And readiness to oblige?"

"Becomes a habit of too ready friendship and servility."

"Dear aunt, you make me almost angry. My future husband can never degenerate thus. He has one virtue which will preserve him as he is forever. A deep sense, an indestructible feeling for everything that is great and good and noble, dwells in his bosom. And this delicate susceptibility to all that is noble dwells in me also, I hope, as well as in him. This is the innate pledge and security for our happiness."

"But if it should grow old with you; if it should change to hateful excitability; and excitability is the worst enemy of matrimony. You both possess sensibility. That I do not deny; but beware lest this grace should degenerate into an irritable and quarrelsome mortal."

"Ah, dearest, if I might never become old! I could then be sure that my husband would never cease to love me."

"Thou art greatly in error, dear child! Wert thou always as fresh and beautiful as to-day, still thy husband's eye would by custom of years become indifferent to these advantages. Custom is the greatest enchantress in the world, and in the house one of the most benevolent of fairies. She renders that which is the most beautiful, as well as the ugliest, familiar. A wife is young, and becomes old; it is custom which hinders the husband from perceiving the change. On the contrary, did she remain young, while he became old, it might bring consequences, and render the man in years jealous. It is better as kind Providence has ordered it. Imagine that thou hadst grown to be an old woman, and thy husband were a blooming youth; how wouldst thou then feel?"

Louise rubbed her chin, and said, "I cannot tell."

Her aunt continued: "But I will call thy attention to a secret which"—

"That is it," interrupted Louise, hastily, "that is it which I long so much to hear."

Her aunt said: "Listen to me attentively. What I now tell thee. I have proved. It consists of two parts. The first part, of the means to render a marriage happy, of itself prevents every possibility of dissension, and would even at last make the spider and the fly the best of friends with each other. The second part is the best and surest method of preserving feminine attractions."

"Ah!" exclaimed Louise.

"The former half of the means, then: In the first solitary hour after the ceremony, take thy bridegroom, and demand a solemn vow of him, and give him a solemn vow in return. Promise one another sacredly, never, not even in mere jest, to urangle with each other; never to bandy words or indulge in the least ill-humor. Never! I say; never. Wrangling, even in jest, and putting on an air of ill-humor merely to tease, becomes earnest by practice. Mark that! Next promise each other, sincerely and solemnly, never to have a secret from each other under whatever pretext, with whatever excuse it may be. You must, continually and every moment, see clearly into each other's bosom. Even when one of you has committed a fault, wait not an instant, but confess it freely—let it cost tears, but confess it. And as you keep nothing secret from each other, so, on the contrary, preserve the privacies of your house, marriage state and heart, from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, and all the world. You two, with God's help, build your own quiet world. Every third or fourth one whom you draw into it with you, will form a party, and stand between you two! That should never be. Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your souls will grow as it were together, and at last will become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had on their wedding day known this simple secret, and straightway practised it, how many marriages were happier than, alas, they are!"

Louise kissed her aunt's hand with ardor. "I feel that it must be so. Where this confidence is absent, the married, even after wedlock, are two strangers who do not know each other. It should be so; without this, there can be no happiness. And now, aunt, the best preservative of female beauty?"

Her aunt smiled, and said: "We may not conceal from ourselves that a handsome man pleases us a hundred times more than an ill-looking one, and the men are pleased with us when we are pretty. But what we call beautiful, what in the men pleases us, and in us pleases the men, is not skin and hair, and shape and color, as in a picture or a statue; but it is the character, it is the soul that is within these, which enchants us by looks and words, earnestness, and joy, and sorrow. The men admire us the more they suppose those virtues of the mind to exist in us which the outside promises; and we think a malicious man disagreeable, however graceful and handsome he may be. Let a young maiden, then, who would preserve her beauty, preserve but that purity of soul, those sweet qualities of the mind, those virtues, in short, by which she first drew her lover to her feet. And the best preservative of virtue, to render it unchanging and keep it ever young, is religion, that inward union with the Deity and eternity and faith—is piety, that walking with God, so pure, so peaceful, so beneficent to mortals.

"See, dear heart," continued the aunt, "there are virtues which arise out of mere experience. These grow old with time, and alter, because, by change of circumstances and inclination, prudence alters her means of action, and because her growth does not always keep pace with that of our years and passions. But religious virtues can never change; these remain eternally the same, because our God is always the same, and that eternity the same, which we and those who love us are hastening to enter. Preserve, then, a mind innocent and pure, looking for everything from God; thus will that beauty of soul remain, for which thy bridegroom to-day adores thee. I am no bigot, no fanatic: I am thy aunt of seven and twenty. I love all innocent and rational amusements. But for this very reason I say to thee—be a dear, good Christian, and thou wilt as a mother; yes, as a grandmother, be still beautiful."

Louise threw her arms about her neck, and wept in silence, and whispered, "I thank thee, angel!"

UNWHOLESOME LITERATURE.

"Why will they harrow up the feelings so?" exclaimed a friend, laying by a book, with a serious face.

It was a story told of passion, of unfaithfulness, of miserable crime, of gentle hearts all unconscious that those to whom they were wedded, loved them not back, but shrined instead, some being to whom, having once been faithful, they seemed doomed to be united in spirit.—United by a harrowing passion that should not be called by a hallowed name.

Truly enough, thought we, why should authors so harrow up the feelings?

In our opinion, if such works do point a moral, and the actors therein are punished with remorse, they are no more fit for the innocent young girl to read, than books that are admitted to be of an out and out questionable character.—No work that paints infidelity between the married relations can, or at least ought to be considered wholesome moral food.

Why should thoughts and impulses, imaginings, and to say the least, doubtful actions, painted to the lying open of the heart fibres, and depicting those frail minds that have not the courage to resist the evil, when they know the consequences that must follow, why should all that, wrought up to an intense and fearful climax, be considered now as the standard to which genius must aspire? We have too many morbid authors, literary dissectors, dealers with malefactors, painters of death-beds, extinguishers of the most darling hopes, blighters of the strongest affections, authors who love to trace a darling sin,—and that sin the most accursed,—through the channels of a professedly Christian mind. Who make ministers fallen angels in black livery; who cause them to yield to crime and go to destruction, while coldly praying,—“Lord deliver us.”

Beautiful writers they are, clothed in the most dazzling livery of intellect, if intellect wear one; each thought a gem, each sentence sparkling with the real splendor of genius, so that one would fain devour the story, though it tear the very heart in twain, and irreparably injure the finest feelings.

Should not sin be delineated? Truly should it be, but by a sunny, healthful author—and yet, we speak too fast; there are some crimes that should not be traced in “words that burn and thoughts that breathe;” sins that should be briefly told, and that with no labored elegance of diction. Among these is that crime of apostasy from the wedded heart. Marriage appears to us of so holy origin, of so sacred a character, that we tremble to see its sanctuary invaded by the chastest pen, and its vows defiled, even if only in fancy. We beseech our authors to turn a deaf ear to fame, if its attainment involves so great and terrible a responsibility as the planting of thorns in confiding hearts who may feel, “am not I then deceived? am not I walking in darkness?”

Fiction may be made the handmaiden of purity; no one will deny that; but if public taste has so far degenerated that it craves, greedily, such dangerously beautiful creations, whose is the fault?

We contend that genius, properly directed, has power to raise the masses from the deepest deep of iniquity to its own sublime standard of excellence; and it is baseness in any author to pander, for the sake of popularity, to over-fed and morbid desires.

A case in point occurs. Only yesterday we saw a young boy not nine years of age, evidently mentally precocious, engaged in perusing one of these works, and two others laid beside him, ready to be devoured in their turn.

On expostulating with him, his reply was,—“Why! they’re not true, they’re only fictions.”

“But,” said we, “you might be spending your time in reading better fictions.”

His reply was significant;—“Give me better fictions and I’ll read them.”

And so with the great public, with all its varied tastes—give it better fictions and it will read them; turn those brilliant thoughts into another channel—they will be more appreciated, and authors may take their profits, nor be troubled with rust upon the gold.

What we want now is strong-hearted, healthful, sunny genius, with no puerile wit, and above all, no disposition to unlock the fetid charnel houses of corrupt nature; who will not overdose us with poison to prove that poison will kill, nor wade us through a sewer in order that we may be sure there is filth there.

Who will allow the poor weak creatures, professing God’s name yet doing works of darkness, to sink into the insignificance they merit; for we leave it to every enlightened mind, if such characters, doubly distilled in wickedness, are worthy of being perpetuated, when there are so many that would lead the bad heart back to virtue by the simple portrayal of their angelic excellencies?

We earnestly hope that a writer of this description may be raised up among us, and we think the public will have the good sense to appreciate him, and give him solid and substantial testimonials, as well as the foremost niche in the temple of fame.—Olive Branch.

LITTLE CHARLEY.

[“Fanny Fern” can be pathetic as well as humorous, as the following from the New York Musical World will show:]

It is hard to lie upon a bed of sickness, even though that bed be of down. Nauseous, too, is the healing-draught, though sipped from a silver cup, held by a loving hand. Wearisome are the days and nights, even with the speaking eye of love over your pillow. But what if the hand of disease lie heavily on the poor?—what if the “barrel of meal and cruise of oil” fail? What if emaciated limbs shiver under a tattered blanket? What if lips parched with fever mutely beg for a permitted, but unattainable luxury? What if the tones of the voice be never modulated to the delicately-sensitive ear? What if at every inlet of the soul come sighs and sounds, harsh and dissonant? Ah! who shall measure the sufferings of the sick poor?

Dear little Charley! you were as much out of place, in that low, dark, wretched room, as an angel could well be on earth. Meekly, in the footsteps of Him who loveth little children, were those tiny feet treading. Patiently, uncomplainingly, were those racking pains endured. A tear, a contraction of the brow, a slight, involuntary clasping of the attenuated fingers, were the only visible signs of agony. What a joy to sit beside him!—to take that little feverish hand in mine,—to smooth that rumpled pillow,—to part the tangled locks on that transparent forehead, to learn of one, of whom the Saviour says, “Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.” But never did I bless God so fully, so gratefully, for the gift of song, as when,—with that little sensitive heart held close to mine,—I made him forget his pain by some simple strain. I had sung for my own amusement: I had sung when dazzling lights, and fairy forms, and festal hours were inspiration; but never with such a zest, and with such a thrill of happiness, as when, in that wretched room, I soothed the sufferings of “little Charley.” The garland-crowned prima donna, with half the world at her feet, might have envied me the tightened clasp of that little hand, the suffused, earnest gaze of that speaking eye, and that half-whispered, plaintive—“one more! Charley is so happy now!”

Aye! Charley is happy now! Music, such as only the blessed hear, fills his soul with rapture. Never a discordant note comes from the harp, swept by that cherub hand, while forever that majestic anthem rolls on, in which his infant voice is joining—“Worthy the Lamb.”

FANNY FERN.

A DAY IN A FRENCH CRIMINAL COURT.

BY MISS PARDOE.

As I chanced, in the autumn of last year, to be residing in a town in the north of France during the assizes, I became a regular reader of the Gazette des Tribunaux, in the hope of comprehending, thanks to this professional study, the daily and hourly reports which were made to me of the proceedings of the melancholy tribunal which had, by the influx of visitors that it occasioned, rendered the ordinarily quiet streets of our grey old city a scene of movement and bustle wholly foreign to their usual aspect. My purpose, however, singularly failed. With my thoroughly English notions of a court of justice, and the solemnity of a trial on whose result frequently hinged the whole future welfare, and even the life, of a fellow-creature, I was unable to recognize as feasible the piquant anecdotes and startling discrepancies which afforded subject of conversation at our tea-table; while the broad and bold columns of the official journal afforded me no efficient assistance; for, even these—although in point of fact I found the crime, the accusation, the defence, and the sentence, all duly recorded—to the more unprofessional reader formed by no means the most salient or engrossing portions of the report, wherein the compiler—like certain reviewers, who, in order to manufacture a “taking” article for their own pages, are accustomed to pass over unnoticed the more important and solid portions of a work, and to fasten upon its entertaining passages, in order to lighten at once their own labors and those of their subscribers—the compiler (as I was about to say, when I indulged in the above interminable parenthesis) had apparently occupied himself rather in weaving a species of legal romance, than in simply stating the broad facts composing the framework of the moral tragedy upon which he was engaged. To me it appeared strange, even with all the love of dramatic effect natural to our Gallican neighbors, that they should be enabled to deduce a social novel from every trial of any importance which came before their courts; and so greatly did this wonder increase upon me, that, after considerable hesitation, I resolved to judge for myself in how far these extraordinary reports were worthy of credence. To do this effectually, it was of course necessary to witness the passage of some great criminal through the awful ordeal of human justice—to brace my nerves, and to resolve to watch, with all the philosophy I could command, the fearful wrestling of foul guilt or outraged innocence with the stupendous power of legal talent and of legal ingenuity. No petty crime could enable me to do this; for in France, as I was well aware, trials for minor offences are conducted with a haste and brevity proportioned to their insignificance; and I accordingly awaited with considerable trepidation the announcement of one of those more fearful accusations which involve the penalty of death. Unhappily, this was not long in coming; and I was, ere the close of the session, informed that a young peasant woman, from an adjoining hamlet, was about to take her trial for the two-fold crime of murder and arson; and at the same time assured that no doubt whatever, from the evidence of the proc s-verbal, (or preliminary examination,) existed of her guilt; while, at the same time, it was a great relief to me to ascertain that her intended victim still survived.

The approaches of the Palais de Justice were almost choked by the anxious multitude who were struggling to effect an entrance, as, led by a professional friend, I made my way by a private staircase to the seat which had been reserved for me. The aspect of the court was solemn and imposing. Immediately before me was a dais, raised two steps above the floor of hall, in the centre of which, behind a long table covered with black serge, stood the chairs of the President (or judge) and his two assistants, over whose heads extended, from the lofty roof to the summit of their seats, a colossal painting of our Saviour upon the cross. On the left hand, an enclosed space was appropriated to the Procureur-General de la Republique (or attorney-general,) beyond which stretched, to the extremity of the platform, the jury-box. On the right hand, a second enclosure (or loge) formed the place allotted for the greffier (or registrar,) while a tier of seats, corresponding with those occupied by the jury were destined to accommodate the counsel for the defence; and, in cases of political delinquency, the accused themselves, and their friends. These seats bear the name of Benches of the Accused; but behind them rises a third, beside which opens a small door, and which is distinguished by the frightful appellation of the Bench of Infamy. In minor trials, this elevated seat is occupied only by two gendarmes, who, after having escorted their prisoners to the entrance of the court, and delivered them into the keeping of the proper officers, afterwards introduce themselves by the small door already alluded to; but, in all cases involving life or the galleys, they seat themselves on either side the culprit, over whose every movement they keep a scrupulous watch.

To complete the picture, it is only necessary to add, that in the centre of the platform, facing the President, and consequently with its back to the audience, was placed a large arm-chair, raised one step from the floor, and appropriated to the witnesses; while four ranges of enclosed benches formed the reserved seats, and shut in the dais, being themselves separated from the main body of the court by a stout wooden partition, breast-high, behind which all ingress is free, and is accomplished through a separate door.

At the appointed hour, a bell rang, and the officers of the court entered and took their seats. The President wore a black cloak, lined and edged with scarlet, and a high cap of black cloth, with a scarlet sash about his waist. The Procureur de la Republique was also robed in black, edged with white fur, with a blue sash, and two rows of broad silver lace upon his cap; while the counsel for the prisoner—a young and eloquent man, who had volunteered to undertake her defence—wore a gown of black silk, and differed little in his appearance from a student at one of our own universities.

After some examination of papers, and an exhibition of that by-play among the officials which appears to be the usual preliminary of all legal investigations, a second bell rang out. The twenty individuals composing the jury were called and sworn; and they had no sooner entered the box, than the President adjusted his spectacles, and fell back in his seat. The small door—that which has been the door of doom to so many trembling and justice-fearing criminals, and which is doubtlessly still fated to afford ingress to scores of others—opened as noiselessly as though it feared to drown the heart-throb of the wretched woman who stood upon its threshold, and, behind a stalwart gendarme, entered a female peasant with her head bowed upon her bosom, followed in her turn by a second armed guardian.

It is not my purpose to excite a false sympathy, by describing the prisoner as one of those fair beings whose personal beauty is adapted to disarm justice by captivating the pity of its ministers; but I may, nevertheless, be permitted to remark that her appearance was singularly prepossessing, and that it was easy to decide at the first glance, that, under other circumstances, she could not have failed to attract notice. She was young; and, although her features were now swollen from incessant weeping, and her complexion almost purple from emotion, the luxuriance of her pale brown hair, the long lashes by which her eyes were shaded, the extreme neatness of her dress, and the remarkable, although somewhat redundant, symmetry of her figure, could not be passed over without remark. As she dropped upon the bench, in obedience to the gesture of one of her guardians, her head fell heavily upon her bosom, and she covered her face with her handkerchief, which was already steeped with her tears.

There was a momentary hush throughout the crowded court, interrupted only by the rustling of papers, or the occasional heavy sob of the prisoner; and then the voice of the President broke coldly and harshly upon the silence.

"Accused, stand up."

He was obeyed; but still the burning cheeks were hidden by the friendly handkerchief.

"Remove your hand from your face—hold up your head—and answer me."

The hand was withdrawn—the head raised, but only for a moment—and then the interrogatory was resumed.

"What is your name?"

"Rosalie Marie——"

"Your age?"

"Twenty-four years."

"Your calling?"

"Wife of Baptiste ——, a farmer; I assisted him in his farm."

"An able assistant!" remarked the Procureur, sarcastically to the President, who replied by a quiet smile.

"Are you aware of the crime of which you are accused?"

The answer was a violent passion of tears.

"Sit down!"—said the cold voice. "Greffier, read the accusation."

This formidable document, based on the procès-verbal drawn up on the spot by the mayor of the village, amid the dying embers of the fire, set forth that Rosalie, having been hired as a general servant by the proprietors of a small farm, the joint property of an aged man and his sister, had engaged the affections of her master's son, who, finding that he could not induce her to return his passion upon easier terms, had ultimately married her, to the extreme annoyance of his family, and especially of his maiden aunt, whose pride was wounded by what she considered as a degrading union. At the period of the fire, Rosalie was the mother of a child of four years old, and was looking forward to the birth of a second; but discomfort and dissension had already supervened between the young couple. The father of Baptiste, indeed, had become reconciled to his daughter-in-law; but such was far from being the case with his sister, who lost no opportunity of exciting the anger of her nephew against his wife, whenever the latter failed to obey her behests; while, as it was proved by several witnesses, Rosalie became at length so much irritated by the ceaseless severity of which she was the object, and so indignant at the taunts uttered against her previous poverty, that she had been more than once heard to declare that she wished the farm burnt to the ground, and her husband reduced to the rank of a common laborer; and that she would gladly fire it herself, in order to be delivered from the life of wretchedness to which she was then condemned. More than one witness, stated the accusation, would swear to this fact, which at once pointed suspicion towards the prisoner; when, several months previous to the present trial, on a calm evening, between seven and eight o'clock, long after the farm-servants had quitted the premises, a fire broke out in a barn adjacent to the dwelling-house occupied by the family, which, after consuming the out-buildings and several stacks of unthreshed grain and beans, had been with difficulty extinguished by the energetic labor of the villagers.

Among other evidence tendered to the mayor during this examination was that of the maiden aunt, who, to her unqualified accusation of the prisoner as the sole author of the catastrophe, superadded the information that Rosalie had, only a week or two previously, attempted to murder her husband, by mixing a quantity of white powder in some soup, which had been kept warm for his supper upon the ashes of the hearth, and which had produced violent vomitings, after he had partaken of it about half an hour.

As the monotonous accents of the greffier fell upon her ear, the unhappy woman sat with her hands forcibly clasped together, and her flushed face and eager eyes turned steadily towards him; but he no sooner ceased reading, than she started convulsively from her seat, and, leaning forward eagerly towards the bench, exclaimed, "I am innocent, M. le President; I am innocent!"

"Peace!" thundered out the frowning official; and then, as the wretched prisoner sank back between her guards, and once more endeavored to conceal herself, he extended his arm towards her, and, with outstretched finger, directed the attention of the court to the quailing form of the accused amid a silence so deep that it could almost be heard, and which he ultimately terminated by these extraordinary words:—"You see that woman, gentlemen of the jury, who has just so vehemently declared her innocence; and now I, in my turn, tell you that I entertain no doubt of her guilt; and that I, moreover, believe her to be capable of anything."

Be it remembered that this declaration on the part of the presiding officer of the court—of the man who sat beneath the awful effigy of a crucified Saviour—and to whom had been delegated the supreme duty of administering even-handed justice alike to the accused and to society, did not even await the evidence of the witnesses whose revelations were to decide a question of life and death—but that he volunteered this frightful assertion before any distinct proof of the guilt of the prisoner had been adduced; nor should the fact be overlooked that the jury, which was composed of small farmers and petty tradesmen, regarded with awe and reverence the solemn and stately personage who had arrived from the capital expressly to preside over the tribunal of their remote province, and that they were consequently prepared to consider his opinion as infallible.

I watched the countenances of those who were nearest to me, and I at once perceived that the cruel words of the President had not failed in their effect; nor was it, indeed, possible that such a declaration, pronounced, moreover, with an emphasis which appeared to insure the perfect conviction of the speaker, could do otherwise than impress every one who heard it; and it was amid the sensation produced by this startling incident that the first witness was called and sworn.

This witness was the aunt; and, if my preconceived notions of a criminal trial had already been shaken, I became still more bewildered and surprised as the proceedings progressed. Instead, as it is the case in our own courts of law, of rejecting all merely hearsay evidence, the old woman was urged, alternately by the President and the Procureur, to detail all the reports consequent upon the fire; and to repeat what Jean-Marie So-and-so had said relatively to the prisoner to Dominique, or to Joseph or Jules; while the bitter volubility of the vindictive witness, whose occasional glances of hatred towards the accused sufficiently testified to the feeling by which she was actuated, ably seconded their efforts; and throughout a whole half-hour she poured forth, in the most guttural patois, a tide of village gossip and scandal, all of which tended to cast suspicion upon the prisoner. Two leading facts were, however, elicited from her evidence, which threw considerable doubt upon her statements. The farm at which the fire had occurred was the joint property of her brother and herself; and she had been careful to insure her own portion of the estate against the very calamity which had taken place; nor had she failed, within twenty-four hours of the event, to claim the amount due to her, after having solemnly sworn that she believed the fire to have been purely accidental. She, moreover, admitted, that she had not accused the prisoner of the crime of arson until the money had been paid over to her; while the cross-questioning of the prisoner's counsel soon enabled him to prove that, subsequently to her having done so, on being informed that should her step-niece be found guilty of arson, she would be called upon to refund the insurance money, she had endeavored to recall her accusation, and to persuade her neighbors that they had misunderstood her meaning. It was, however, too late; her extreme loquacity had rung an alarm throughout the village—the ignorant are always greedy of the marvellous—and her disclaimers were universally disregarded. All the inhabitants of the hamlet at once decided that Rosalie was the incendiary; and, with a pertinacity which almost drove the aunt to desperation, quoted her own declarations as evidence of the fact. Thus taken in her own toils, the heartless old woman, instead of acknowledging that she had no authority for the rumors which she had spread, but had been instigated to this act of cruel injustice by her hatred and jealousy of her step-niece, vehemently declared that, since such was the case, if she were compelled to refund the money, she would at least have the life of the prisoner as some compensation for the loss.

When accused by the counsel of having made use of this threat, her denial was faint and sullen, and finally terminated by the fiendish remark, that, if she had ever said so, she was prepared to abide by it; that she maintained the guilt of the prisoner; and that they should do better, even if they lost the money, so that they were rid of her nephew's wife along with it.

As these malignant words passed her lips, a low murmur filled the court, and the President ordered her to stand down. Half-a-dozen other witnesses were then successively called on the same side, and in every case were asked whether they were relatives, friends, or lovers of the prisoner? to which question two sturdy young peasants answered bitterly, "No, thank God!" and in both instances it was elicited by her counsel that they were discarded suitors, who had, since her marriage, caused frequent misunderstandings between herself and her husband.

Still, hour after hour, the tide of words flowed on, and no one proof of guilt had been brought against the prisoner. At intervals some leading question, well calculated to cause her to criminate herself, was abruptly put by the President, and at each denial she was desired to remember that she had confessed as much during her previous examination; but, agitated as she was, she still retained sufficient self-possession to refute the assertion, declaring that she never could have accused herself of a crime of which she was innocent.

As the next name was called, and one of the ushers of the court was about to introduce a new witness, a faint scream burst from the lips of the prisoner, which was succeeded by a violent fit of weeping; and I grew sick at heart, lest she was at last to find herself in contact with an accuser whose charge she could not refute. A slight confusion at the extremity of the hall, a low murmur, and the dragging of heavy steps along the floor, at that moment diverted my attention from the wretched woman; and I saw, slowly approaching the witness chair, an infirm and aged man, supported by two of the subordinate officers of the court. As he was led forward, he looked helplessly from side to side, as if bewildered by the novelty of the scene about him; and, after having been assisted up the steps of the dais, he dropped into the chair to which he was conducted, nor did he attempt to rise when told by the President to stand up while he took the customary oath.

"Stand up," repeated the usher; but the old man continued motionless.

"He can't hear," shouted the harsh voice of his sister from the extremity of the court; "he's been deaf this many a year; you must shout into his ear." The usher acted upon this suggestion; but the poor old man only shook his grey head, and laughed.

"Does he know why he is here?" asked the President, impatiently.

"Not he," replied the same involuntary spokeswoman; "we didn't tell him, or he wouldn't have come."

"Can he be made to understand the nature of an oath?"

"May-be yes, may-be no; he's childish-like; but you can try him."

"This is trifling with the court!" exclaimed the President, angrily; "and cruel to this poor old man. 'Who is he?'"

"Her husband's father, my brother; the father-in-law that she tried to burn out," responded the woman.

"Silence!" shouted the President. "Usher, remove this man from the court, and see that he is taken care of until he can be conveyed to his home."

He was obeyed; the old man was with difficulty induced to leave his seat, and many a tear followed him as he disappeared. It was a most painful spectacle, nor was it the only one which we were destined to witness; for, before the examination was resumed, an individual approached the bench, and whispered a few words to the President, who, with an irritated gesture, impatiently replied, "Well, if it must be so; but we are losing time."

The messenger made a sign, and he had no sooner done so than a woman appeared at a side door carrying an infant in her arms, with which she approached the prisoner, who eagerly leant forward to receive it. The child sprang, with a joyful cry of recognition, into the embrace of its wretched mother, who for a moment strained it convulsively to her bosom; but when she endeavored to give it the nourishment which it required, the infant flung itself violently back, terrified by the feverish contact, and could not be induced again to approach her. Never shall I forget the agony depicted upon the countenance of the unhappy prisoner: her tears seemed to have been suddenly dried up; and, rising from her seat, she gave back the struggling infant into the arms of its nurse, without a word. Had she been the veriest criminal on earth, she was an object of intense pity at that moment!

The proceedings were once more resumed. Other witnesses for the prosecution followed, but the evidence was still vague and inconclusive; and at length the Procureur rose to address the court. His speech was eloquent and emphatic: but, although he cleverly availed himself of every opportunity of bringing the guilt of both charges home to the prisoner, he was rather startling than convincing in his arguments. He repeatedly called upon her to deny the truth of his conclusions, but he gave her no opportunity of doing so; he hurled at her the most bitter invectives, applied to her the most opprobrious epithets, and defied her to summon a single witness to prove her innocence, or to save her from an ignominious death; and, finally he reproached her with her ingratitude to a family by whose generosity she had been raised from poverty to comfort; reminded her of the disgrace which she had brought, not only upon the wretched old man of eighty-six years of age, who had been made through her means a public spectacle, but also upon the helpless children to whom she had given birth, and especially upon the innocent and ill-fated infant who had first seen the light through the iron bars of a prison.

It was a frightful piece of elocution; never for an instant did he appear to remember that the wretched prisoner might yet, despite appearances, have been wrongfully accused, and have been a victim rather than a criminal. There was no leaning to the side of mercy, no relenting, no gleam of light thrown upon the darkness of the picture; and it was evident that the miserable woman felt that she was lost long before his terrible words ceased to vibrate in her ears. For a time she had sat motionless, gazing upon him with a wild stare of affrighted wonder; but as he rapidly heaped circumstance upon circumstance, recapitulated the gossip of the villagers, and deduced from the most apparently unimportant facts the most condemnatory conclusions, she gradually sank lower and lower upon her seat, until she appeared no longer able to sustain herself; and, when a deep and thrilling silence succeeded to the speech of the public accuser, her choking sobs were distinctly audible.

The Procureur was right: the witnesses for the defence were unable to prove her innocence of the crime imputed to her; but they one and all bore evidence to the irreproachability of her character; to her piety, her industry, her neighborly helpfulness, and her charity, both of word and deed. They showed, moreover, that she had borne with patience and submission the tyranny of her husband's aunt, the violence of that husband himself, and that she had been to her father-in-law a devoted and affectionate daughter.

"But," said the Procureur to one of her panegyrists, "if the accused were indeed the admirable person whom you describe, how do you account for her having made so many enemies, and for the general belief in her guilt prevalent throughout the village?"

"Ha, Monsieur!" replied the brave young peasant, as he turned a hasty and sympathizing glance towards the prisoner; "hate grows faster than love, and lasts longer. Before the neighbors dreamt of Rosalie's good luck—or, rather, bad luck, as it has since turned out, poor woman!—there was many a lad in the village that hoped to make her his wife; but she listened to none of them, and they can't forgive her for having married above them."

"And you, not having been of the number, can afford to say a good word for her. Is that what we are to understand?" asked the Procureur, sarcastically.

"No, Monsieur," was the sturdy reply; "but I loved her too well to bear malice."

A gleam of light at last! But, alas! too faint to penetrate the gloom of her prison cell.

"Stand down," said the President; and the heroic young man obeyed. And this was heroism; for he had boldly avowed his affection for one who had appeared to be abandoned by every other human being—her adopted father had abandoned her in the unconsciousness of second childhood—her infant, in the terror of helplessness—her friends from the dread of shame—she stood alone, until that humble but upright man braved the world's withering scorn, and dared the contemptuous laughter of his fellows to silence one throb of her bursting heart.

The last witness had been heard, and the counsel rose for the defence. He, no doubt, felt that he had undertaken not only a difficult, but an onerous task, for at the commencement of his speech he was visibly agitated: he perpetually repeated himself; and, instead of plunging boldly into the heart of his subject, and at once grappling with the charges brought against his client, he dwelt upon her youth, on the agony of mind and body which she had undergone for so many months, and on the misery which she must have endured when she gave birth to her last infant in disgrace and tears. Suddenly, however, he rallied; and declared, with an energy as startling as it was unexpected, that, although the sufferings which he had enumerated were of themselves almost a sufficient punishment for the crimes of which she was accused, he had no intention of asking an acquittal upon such grounds.

"No, gentlemen of the jury," he exclaimed, vehemently, "we seek no such subterfuge—we desire no impunity which does not restore our honor. We have already endured enough, more than enough; we care not to remain a mark for the finger of scorn and of suspicion; we must leave this court not only free, but justified. I maintain, gentlemen of the jury, that we have a right to demand this; and I have no fear but that you will feel as I do. What has been proved against the accused? I will tell you in a few words. It has been proved that she was pretty and good—so pretty and so good, that half the young peasants of the village sought to win her affections; that she was industrious, obliging, and modest; and that so pre-eminently, that, although poor and humble, the daughter of a daily laborer, and a menial in the family of a richer neighbor, she was chosen by the son of her master for a wife. I will even recall to your minds the fact that he would have won her more lightly, and that it was only when he became convinced of the uselessness of his illicit addresses, that he came forward loyally and generously to offer her his hand—for this circumstance tends to prove her worth—aye, and that hand was given despite the reproaches and opposition of his relatives, who, in their ignorance of the just value of qualities like hers, believed their kinsman, the heir of a few acres of land and a few thousands of hoarded francs, to be degrading himself by such an alliance. You have heard that the marriage was an unhappy one, and it has been inferred that my client was the cause of this unhappiness; but I will merely ask you to reflect upon what you have seen and heard this day, ere you credit the assertion. The prisoner is accused of having attempted the life of her husband by poison. Where was the husband—the intended victim—when his would-be murderer was arraigned for the offence? Where was he? I will tell you, gentlemen: so securely hidden away, that even the emissaries of his vindictive aunt could not trace him out, and drag him hither to appear against a traduced and injured wife. What was the poison? You must allow me to fall back upon the evidence, and to add to it a most material fact. The accusation sets forth that Rosalie, assisted by her aunt, prepared a pan of cabbage-soup for the dinner and supper of the family, and that of this soup they all partook, at noon; it was then set aside till evening, when it was once more placed upon the fire; and at five o'clock, Baptiste being still absent at the wine-shop, the prisoner and her female relative again ate of the soup; and, the embers of the fire being still warm, the pan was carefully surrounded by hot ashes, to await his return. More than once the lid of the pan was raised to stir the contents, lest they should adhere to the bottom of the vessel; and this precaution was taken by the aunt herself, who never moved from the chimney-corner from the termination of her own supper to the return of her nephew, who, according to his usual habit, was far from sober, and who, after partaking of the soup, was attacked by violent sickness. On the following morning, the aunt—you have seen and heard her, gentlemen, and can consequently appreciate her character—showed the dregs of the soup, upon which there floated a species of white flaky film, with infinite mystery, to half-a-dozen chosen friends; after which, she herself flung out the residue of the soup beside the door of the house, where pigs and poultry could alike devour it, and where it doubtlessly was devoured, without any detriment to either from the ashes, which, in the action of stirring the contents, she had herself, beyond all doubt, introduced into the mixture. Why, if she indeed suspected poison, did she cleanse the vessel with her own hands? Why did she, whose god was mammon, incur the risk of poisoning the animals who might partake of it? Great stress was laid upon the fact of the vomiting by which her nephew was attacked after having eaten of this soup; but we have shown that he was a man of intemperate habits, who was subject to this malady; and our wonder should rather be excited by the fact, that he could, while full of wine, have swallowed a mess of this description, than that it should have produced, under the circumstances, the effect ascribed to it.

"Gentlemen of the jury, before God and society, is Rosalie — guilty of having attempted, in that soup, to poison her husband? We calmly await your decision. We now come to the second charge. On a certain evening, the farm of Baptiste's father and aunt is fired; the two women are seated in the common room, or house, as the witnesses have universally described it, meaning thereby the single apartment not used as a sleeping-chamber; this room looks upon the farm-yard; the prisoner is near the window, occupied in repairing her husband's linen; the aunt, according to her habit, is dozing near the fire. Rosalie leaves the room for a few minutes, and shortly after her return remarks that she hears an extraordinary noise upon the premises; upon which she is told that she is a fool, and always full of absurd fancies; but, notwithstanding this rebuff, she again exclaims that she is sure something must be wrong, and that she smells an odor of burnt straw. The words are scarcely uttered, when a body of flame bursts from an adjacent barn; upon which the accused, uttering a loud scream, rushes to the bed-side of her sleeping child, hurriedly wraps it in a blanket, and leaves the house at all speed.

"Was this extraordinary? Was this unnatural? Was this a proof of guilt? M. le Procureur has decided in the affirmative; but I boldly demur to his conclusion. The first impulse of the mother was to save her infant; and in this instance it must have been doubly powerful, since, disappointed in all her other affections, the child of her bosom was all in all to her. You have been told that she lent no assistance in extinguishing the fire; and, personally, I admit that she did not do so. It has been asserted, upon oath, that no one knew where she was hidden until the flames were extinguished; and yet it has been proved that, on leaving her home, she made her way, with her precious burden, to the cottage of her aged and widowed father, who hurried, at her entreaty, to the farm, while she remained alone in his hovel to watch over her infant. We would have produced that father to swear to the fact, gentlemen of the jury, but he has been summoned to a higher tribunal than ours; he was poor, but he was not too poor to feel—humble, but not too humble to be beyond the reach of shame; and the birth of his last grandchild in a prison—I cannot, I dare not dwell upon this subject, gentlemen of the jury—I am warmed by the suffocating sobs behind me that my zeal is degenerating into cruelty; suffice it, then, that the unhappy old man is dead, and that thus one important witness has been lost to us.

"M. le Procureur expatiated largely also upon the expressions of bitter hopelessness, which were from time to time forced from the wrung heart of my unhappy client. She 'wished that the farm were burnt to the ground, and her husband reduced to the rank of a common laborer;' and even declared, while smarting under the tyranny of her near relatives, that 'she would gladly fire it herself, to be relieved from the life of wretchedness to which she was condemned.' I am not about to justify these expressions; I am ready to admit that they were alike unguarded and unseemly; but, gentlemen of the jury, remember the provocation! Is there one of us who has never rashly uttered a word that he would gladly recall? Do we, men of education, of station, and eager for the applause of the world, do we always measure our sentences, and weigh our phrases in a moment of passion? Do not let us lie to our own souls.

"Gentlemen of the jury, I have done. What the prosecution could not prove we cannot disprove; but we can appeal to our God—we can appeal to the judgment of all honest men—and we can appeal to your decision. This we do boldly; this we do fearlessly; we are in your hands, and we are safe. You will restore a wife to her husband—a mother to her children—an outcast to her home. You will do this, for you have sworn to defend the right; and that right can only be maintained by our acquittal."

A low murmur of applause, which was, however, instantly checked, was heard throughout the court; and silence was no sooner restored, than the Procureur once more rose. He dissected with great forensic eloquence the address of the counsel, and alluded with keen and even indelicate sarcasm to the youth and good looks of the prisoner, which had, as he asserted, stood her instead of innocence. He commented upon the want of experience of her advocate, who had, as he declared, sacrificed his judgment to his enthusiasm: and where he should have convinced, had only dazzled his hearers. He even appealed to the prisoner herself whether, had an acquittal been possible, she could have desired it, when, as she must be well aware, it could but entail upon her an existence of obloquy and suspicion: and, finally, he called upon the jury to deliver society from a woman, whose after-career, should she leave that court absolved, might be readily prophesied from its antecedents.

I confess that, as I eagerly watched the countenances of the jury, I entertained little hope for the wretched woman, who sat with clasped hands and bent head utterly motionless, as though she also were counting the brief moments of her forfeited existence; until, as the jury were preparing to retire, one of her guards laid his hand upon her shoulder, and whispered a few words in her ear, upon which she passively rose, and disappeared with the two gendarmes through the narrow door by which she had entered. Thence, as I was informed, she was conducted to a cell, where alone and in darkness, all prisoners await the verdict about to be pronounced upon them; a fearful ordeal to those upon whose guilt or innocence the arbiters of their fate were tardy in deciding.

And while she was thus abandoned to all the agonies of suspense, the court itself became a scene of bustle and excitement. The President, the Procureur, and half a dozen of their friends, had retired to the apartments of the former to partake of refreshments; and they had no sooner withdrawn, than a group of some twenty or thirty privileged individuals gathered together on the platform, some of whom were busied in devouring bon-bons, and exchanging jokes which elicited hearty, although suppressed laughter; while others drew the daily papers from their pockets, and were soon absorbed in politics, totally forgetful of the wretched woman whose fate was even then under discussion in the jury-room.

To myself, this appeared the most painful feature of the trial; the careless mirth and heartless indifference to the agonies of a fellow creature, so recklessly exhibited at such a moment, revolted me; but, happily, the suffering was brief. Ten minutes only had elapsed when the bell once more sounded, every one resumed his seat, and the officials returned to their places, closely followed by the jury. When order had been restored, the President, in a tone of more solemnity than he had hitherto used, asked the supreme question:

"Gentlemen of the jury, is the prisoner guilty, or not guilty?"

The jury rose, and the foreman steadily replied, "NOT GUILTY, M. le President."

The effect of the verdict was electrical. It appeared as though, like myself, nine-tenths of the auditory had believed that there existed no hope for the accused; and while a joyous whisper arose on all sides, I remarked that the Procureur, who had so earnestly striven to secure the condemnation of the prisoner, turned a congratulatory smile upon her advocate, whose anxiety had rendered him as pale as marble; but this circumstance was soon forgotten in what followed.

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the President, "it is my duty to compliment you upon your verdict; you have ably and honorably fulfilled the trust reposed in you. There can be no doubt, in any honest mind, that you have come to a true and just decision. At the commencement of my legal career, when I was yet a mere youth, the interests of my employer compelled me to reside, during several weeks, in the hamlet of which the accused was a native. I have never forgotten—I never shall forget—what I witnessed in that obscure village. It is enough for me to assure you that throughout the whole of my after-experience, I was never forced into contact with so utterly worthless a set of individuals; jealousy, slander, and falsehood, were the aliments upon which they appeared to exist; and it was more than sufficient that the accused, whose reputation you have restored by a most righteous verdict, was pure and modest; and that by the united charms of her person and her character, she had raised herself from a low station to one of comparative affluence, for every mouth to be opened against her. Gentlemen of the jury, once more I say, that I congratulate you; and that I believe the accused to be as innocent of the crimes imputed to her as either you or I."

I could scarcely trust my senses as I listened, and remembered that this very man, only a few hours previously, had branded the prisoner as a wretch so sunk in vice as to be "capable of anything;" but I could detect no similar surprise on any countenance about me. It did not appear to strike his listeners that he had, at the commencement of the trial, cruelly exceeded his privilege, and even foresworn his own conscience. There was no murmur of indignation, no evidence of disgust; but, on the contrary, an approving smile beamed on him from every side, as if in recompense of his tardy frankness.

I was still lost in wonder, when his voice again sounded through the hall—

"Bring in the prisoner."

In another moment, she once more occupied her frightful station; and then the greffier announced to her, in the same monotonous tone as that in which he had read her accusation, the verdict by which she stood acquitted.

In an instant, the purple flush faded from her cheeks, and she became as white as a corpse. She swept her hands across her forehead, gave one long stare about her, and then, with a shriek which rang through the court rather like the cry of a wild animal than the utterance of human lips, she made a spring towards the door, nearly upsetting the gendarmes by whom it was guarded, and disappeared.

All was over. The officials collected their papers; the counsel threw off their gowns; the crowd dispersed; and I regained my home, fervently thanking God that it was not thus that justice was administered in my own happy country.—Sharpe's London Magazine.

NOW, AND LONG AGO.

BY FANNY FALES.

O sisters—sisters! I have been
Where we in childhood dwelt,
The old home by the mountain side,
Where morn and eve we knelt;
The shining poplars, now, as then,
Are waving by the door,
The maple wears its Autumn robe
Of crimson, as of yore;
The deep well, with its mossy pole,
Is standing, as of old,
And the grey bucket drips its wealth
Adown the stones so cold.

I walked along the garden paths,
Where once we used to run,
With footsteps like the startled doe's,
And hearts o'erfull of fun;
I linger'd 'neath the cherry tree
Our father prun'd with care,
And wept, for he—the loving group—
Ah me! they were not there!
I wander'd to the chestnut grove,
The ripe nuts strew'd the ground,
The little squirrels scamper'd off,
At e'en the lightest sound.

And there, thro' the delicious morn
Of Indian Summer weather,
I filled my apron with the nuts,
As when we went together.
I dream'd I was a child again,
Beside my mother's knee,
Or bounding thro' the forest paths
With footsteps glad and free;
My heart rock'd gently on the waves
Of pleasant mem'ries, sung,
As when we went a nutting there
When you and I were young.

Ah, sisters, darlings, it is vain,
This yearning for the past!
I will be grateful for the good,
Along my pathway cast;
For gratitude, and cheerfulness,
Will change all things to gold:—
With Love, the angel, in my heart,
That never will grow old:
And tho' Time weave a silver thread
In every silken tress,
I'll try to find some gift of God's
To succor and to bless.
Then we'll not mourn the days long gone,
Our old home, and friends dear;
But cling the closer to the loved,
That Time has left us here.

CHOICE READINGS.

MEMORY OF MUSIC.—The readiness with which the memory lends itself to the service of music, is another standing phenomenon peculiar to her. By what mysterious paradox does it come to pass that what the mind receives with the most passivity, it is enabled to retain with the most fidelity, laying up the choicest morsels of musical entertainment in its storehouses, to be ready for spontaneous performance without our having so much as the trouble of summoning them? For not even the exertion of our will is required; a thought—ay, less than a thought?—the slightest breath of a hint—is sufficient to set the exquisitely sensitive strings of musical memory vibrating; and often we know not what manner of an idea it is that has just fluttered across our minds, but for the melody, or fragment of a melody, it has awakened in its passage. By what especial favor is it that the ear is permitted a readier access to the cells of memory, and a steadier lodging when there, than of the other organs? Pictures, poetry, thoughts, hatred, loves, promises, of course, are all more fleeting than tunes! These we may let be buried for years; they never moulder in the grave; they come back as fresh as ever, yet showing the depth at which they have lain by the secret associations of joy or sorrow they bring with them. There is no such a pitiless invoker of the ghost of the past as one bar of melody that has been connected with them; there is no such a sigh escapes from the heart as that which follows in the train of some musical reminiscence.

FEMALE OCCUPATION.—Women in the middle rank are brought up with the idea that if they engage in some occupations, they shall lose "their position in society." Suppose it to be so; surely it is wiser to quit a position we cannot honestly maintain, than to live dependent upon the bounty and caprice of others; better to labor with our hands than eat the bread of idleness; or submit to feel that we must not give utterance to our real opinions, or express our honest indignation at being required to act a base or unworthy part. And in all cases, however situated, every female ought to learn how all household affairs are managed, were it only for the purpose of being able to direct others. There cannot be any disgrace in learning how to make the bread we eat, to cook our dinners, to mend our clothes, or even to clean the house. Better to be found busily engaged in removing the dust from the furniture, than to let it accumulate there until a visitor leaves palpable traces where his hat or his arm have been laid upon a table.

FLOWERS.—How the universal heart of man blesses flowers! They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage altar, and the tomb. The Persian in the far-east delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nose-gays, while the Indian child of the far-west claps his hands with glee as he gathers the abundant blossoms,—the illuminated scriptures of the prairies. The Cupid of the ancient Hindoos tipped his arrows with flowers, and orange flowers are a bridal crown with us, a nation of yesterday. Flowers garlanded the Grecian altar, and hung in votive wreath before the Christian shrine. All these are appropriate uses. Flowers should deck the brow of the youthful bride, for they are in themselves a lovely type of marriage. They should twine round the tomb, for their perpetually-renewed beauty is a symbol of the resurrection. They should festoon the altar, for their fragrance and their beauty ascend in perpetual worship before the Most High.—Mrs. Child.

GHOST STORIES.—There is a foolish and pernicious practice with some people, of relating stories to young children to excite alarm and terror. If it was only foolish or unreasonable, it might not justly call forth strong expressions of censure. Yet, even in such case, the practice had better be discontinued, and condemned, as quite improper. Stories to arouse curiosity and excite inquiry, if the subjects tend to utility, are certainly proper and commendable. But the common tales of Blue Beard and Giants, of spectres and ghosts, are extremely injurious in their influence and effects. Unfounded and absurd notions are received, that serve only to terrify, and which even by correct knowledge afterwards received, cannot be entirely subdued or eradicated. It is in vain to reason against them, or to oppose to them the knowledge derived from natural philosophy and the sciences. I have known men of great learning, who were unable to get rid of early but unreasonable fears, produced in childhood by the stories of nurses, or illiterate parents; and who are always occasionally under their unhappy influence, though their sober judgment told them they were fictitious. Let children be taught that the great Creator has impressed laws on all things, which operate uniformly; and that they are in safety, when they behave well and have a reverence for that great and good Being. They should be taught that ghosts and apparitions are wholly fanciful; that all the spectres they need guard against are guilty fears; and if they are virtuous, these will never haunt them, nor ever exist.

INFANCY.—As the infant begins to discriminate between the objects around, it soon discovers one countenance that ever smiles upon it with peculiar benignity. When it wakes from its sleep, there is one watchful form ever bent over its cradle. If startled by some unhappy dream, a guardian angel seems ever ready to soothe its fears. If cold, that ministering spirit brings it warmth; if hungry, she feeds it; if happy, she caresses it. In joy or sorrow, in weal or woe, she is the first object of its thoughts. Her presence is heaven. The mother is the Deity of infancy.

That is not the best sermon which makes the hearers go away talking to one another, and praising the speaker, but which makes them go away thoughtful, and serious, and hastening to be alone.

The gloomiest knell that rings over the fall from virtue must be to hear of the lost esteem of those we love.

THE END OF BEAUTY;

OR,
A SEQUEL TO "WHO WANTS A MONKEY?"

BY CHERICOT.

MR. EDITOR—DEAR SIR: As you have expressed an interest in the fate of Beauty, I had taken some pains to inform myself of his adventures after he had left me, which he did a few days subsequent to his tender parting with the fair Orianna. You may remember that I detailed, at length, my perplexities on his account, and appealed to your sympathy for relief, trusting that you might possibly have some dear, good-natured friend, who, more kind than wise, would ease me of my burden by assuming it himself; but, alas! disinterested benevolence is not a fashionable virtue in these modern times, and as days wore on without any demand for Beauty, I began to despair.

"Is it not incredible," soliloquised I, "that no one should fancy my monkey? Is he not, as the gentle Orianna confessed, the type of a class in which the fair sex delight? A monkey of parts and accomplishments, fond of the ladies (for with a fine, discriminating taste, Beauty adores them, while he will not suffer a man to touch him,) if he be not wise and witty, can he not cut capers like any beau, and in grace and agility excel them all? Is he not a monkey who has seen the world, and, unlike your travelled gentleman, who wearies you with long stories, never a 'tale unfolds;' but, when questioned of his adventures, modestly remains mute or playfully suspending himself to the bars of his cage, insinuates in deeds, if not in words, that 'thereby hangs a tail.'"

And thus my weary thoughts, day after day, were occupied with Beauty. Sometimes, I endeavored to divert my mind, by fancying his infancy and youth in the forests of South America, where, with troops of his fellow monkeys, he sported in the colossal trees covered with splendid flowering vines, now playfully hiding among the rose-colored foliage of the sapuyaca, and anon springing to the feathery summit of the towering palm, while gay butterflies, gorgeous in hue as the flowers on which they fluttered, birds brilliant in plumage and shrill in notes, and myriads of insects, glittering like jewels around him, filled the air with beauty. I imagined the grief with which he was borne from these scenes a prisoner to the island—his surprise at the novelties there encountered, his delighted reception of the caresses of the fair Creoles, whose soft, dark eyes beamed tenderly; while with sweet voices and pearly smiles, they lavished on him those endearing epithets which drop so musically from their coral lips, that one would fain be a monkey to be so cherished. I beheld him, again, caged in his narrow box, and snatched from blooming groves and charming damsels, to be consigned to the deck of a trading schooner, where, amid piles of logwood and goat-skins, he passed the weary days, tormented by the sailors, and longing in vain for the endearments he had lost. I saw him as, leaving the tropics, he bade farewell to the glorious radiance of southern skies, and the constellations under which he was born, and gradually emerged into the cold, northern clime, where he was destined to live among strangers, and finally die a broken-hearted exile.

"Pshaw!" I hear some one exclaim, "you forget you are talking about a monkey!"

Well, sir, or madam, if he be a monkey, I suppose he has feelings.

"Allow that he has; what do you know about them?"

Nothing, I confess, so I will trouble you no more with my waking surmises, but proceed to relate a dream which perhaps you will consider quite as unreasonable.

I fancied that, as usual, I was haunted with impossible devices for disposing of Beauty, when it suddenly occurred to me that in some parts of South America monkeys are considered edible, whereupon I immediately resolved that as I could do nothing else with the poor animal, I would eat him. I had no compunctious visitings of conscience about the cruelty of the act, nor did I stop to reflect that if Lord Monboddo's theory of men being originally monkeys, were true, I might, cannibal-like, devour one of my ancestors, but ruthlessly ordered his destruction, saw him scientifically cooked a la mode, and was preparing to dine on him, when there was a ring at the bell, and the servant ushered in a common-looking man, who said,

"I've come to buy your monkey."

I pointed despairingly to the table, endeavored to articulate—"There he is!" And awoke myself with sobbing to find it but a dream.

But you want to know what really became of Beauty.

I have a friend, and such a friend; but, Mr. Editor, I will not dilate on her virtues, lest you should envy me such a treasure. Suffice it is to say, that this charming person, attracted by the fame of Beauty, and his doings, came one night with her husband to see him; and, after listening to my disinterested eulogium on his docility and good qualities, (I had not the courage to confess his bad ones), acknowledged that she had been longing for a pet of some kind, and if she were not afraid of monkeys, would really like to own him. I assured her of his harmlessness, had his box brought in, and himself set free; and, indeed, sir, if he had been aware of the importance of conciliating her, he could not have displayed himself to more advantage. He received her advances with a gracious smile that disclosed his pearls, threw all the tenderness of his nature into his soft, dark eyes, and laid his black paw in her white hand with a grace which so favorably impressed her; that, though true to his instincts, he did snarl terribly when her husband approached him, she resolved to have him on trial for two weeks, and if he continued as docile as he appeared, to keep him altogether.

Accordingly, the next night, she sent a servant with a chain, to take him to his new home; and I am sure I shall never forget the disturbance that ensued. It was only after incredible efforts and a heroic resistance on his part, that he was captured and chained; and many honorable scars were received by the parties concerned in the conflict. I stood at the door, looking after him, as he was carried, howling like an Indian, down the dark and rainy streets, expecting each moment to see the police start forward to his rescue: but, I suppose, those guardians of the public peace thought it was nothing but a firemen's riot, as they did not make their appearance, for I heard, subsequently, that he reached his new friends without interruption.

I am of a very sociable disposition, and particularly intimate with Beauty's new mistress, yet, for reasons not worth mentioning, I really could not for a long time make it convenient to visit her; but, at last, my evil genius, in the shape of curiosity, induced me to pass her residence, and I was accosted by her little son, who was amusing himself on the pavement with his velocipede, but suddenly checked his movements, when he saw me, to exclaim—

"Oh! what a wicked monkey you sent my mother. She's been out all day trying to get somebody to have him, and nobody won't."

"What has the poor little fellow done?" asked I, innocently.

"Just you go in and see my mother, and she'll tell you what he's been and done."

Now I really did not want to face either my friend or Beauty just then; but what could I do? The young gentleman insisted that his mother wished to see me; so, assuming as virtuous and unconscious an air as possible, I entered the house. But I need not have feared to meet dear Julia, who was just as friendly as if she had never seen my monkey, and began with much humor to detail his exploits.

"In the first place," said she, "while we kept him chained, he was perfectly furious and unmanageable, and as he will not let a man touch him, we were not a little puzzled how to set him free: but, at last the cook managed to do it, and then you should have seen him! He flew up stairs, amusing himself on the way with tearing the paper off the wall; but we hastily followed, and, as he entered the children's play-room, locked the door, and kept him a prisoner for the night, intending to put him in his house the next morning. This happened to be Sunday, and Beauty was forgotten until we had returned from church, when the cook and myself went to liberate him. We found him tranquilly perched on a sofa, doubtless reposing from his labors, of which there was plain evidence in the demolished toys and torn books which made the floor look like Giant Despair's castle courtyard; but this was nothing to the fancy he had taken to enact the part of an amateur artist. A box of paints had been unfortunately left in his way, and disclaiming, in his enthusiasm, the use of brushes, he had merely dipped the colors in water, and decorated the walls, the doors, the mantel-piece and the windows with parti-colored streaks, that had certainly a startling effect."

Here Julia paused to take breath, and after due exclamations of surprise and horror, I ventured to express a hope that Beauty had subsequently conducted himself with more propriety.

"Not at all, I am sorry to say," answered she, "and I must admit that after your representations of his docility, I was much astonished to find him such a torment."

"Perhaps," insinuated I, gently, "evil communications have corrupted his good manners; for, really, his behaviour was unexceptionable while he was with me."

"Why then were you so anxious to part with him?" asked my friend, coolly.

Really, Mr. Editor, I did not know what to say; and observing my confusion, Julia good-naturedly resumed—

"We do not, however, intend to send him back to you, but will endeavor to part with him, if possible, to advantage."

I thanked her eagerly, and then informing her that I intended going to the country the following day, to remain some weeks, I begged her to let me hear from her, which she readily promised, and with a tender embrace, we parted, and I went on my way, rejoicing that I was likely to be no more troubled with Beauty.

Some time had elapsed, when, one day on my return from a walk, a young cousin handed me a letter he had just received with several others that had been enclosed in the same packet. I transcribe it verbatim, ad literatim, for your benefit, and hope you may decypher it more easily than I did:

The next letter was Mr. Crosscuts' missive to Miss Prim:

"MADAM—One nuisance in a neighborhood is sufficient: it is bad enough to be troubled by an old maid, without being haunted by her monkey, and it is my duty plainly to tell you, that if you do not in future keep the animal within bounds, I shall lay my complaint before the Mayor. You may be thankful that you are not at present mulcted in heavy damages for the mischief that beast has done in my premises, and the irreparable injury he has inflicted on my feelings as an ornithologist, an entomologist and a man. Your monkey, madam, has drowned a favorite duck, knocked down a case of rare and valuable birds which I had stuffed with much care as a present to the Academy of Natural Sciences, denuded them of their feathers, and, in short, completely destroyed them; he then finished by devouring an immense collection of insects that I passed the greater part of last summer catching and impaling; but you are a woman, madam, and cannot appreciate the mischief you have caused by your choice of a pet. I pity your infirmity, and, if being unable to get a husband you must have a monkey, why, madam, respect my warning, and keep him at home.

"CROSSMAN CROSSCUTS."

No. 3 was the letter from Miss Prim, elicited by this outrageous assault on her feelings and dignity.

"Miss Prim's compliments to Mrs. Thompson, and sends her a most insulting letter, just received from Mr. Crosscut, who took the liberty to infer that Mrs. T.'s monkey belonged to Miss P.; a gratuitous impertinence for which Miss P. expects satisfaction, not only from the male person referred to, but also from Mrs. T. As it is due to Miss P.'s self-respect to hold no immediate communication with the writer of the accompanying attack on her feminine sensibilities, she considers it Mrs. T.'s duty, as the origin of the obloquy, to be the medium of conveying her sentiments to that individual on his unmanly, cruel, vicious, contemptible, aggravated attack on Miss P.'s untainted fame. Miss P. begs Mrs. T. to inform Mr. C. that he had better mind his own affairs, as Miss P. is perfectly competent to take care of herself without his interference. Miss P. also entreats Mrs. T. to assure that low person, that she scorns his reflection on her years and infirmities, that all the world knows, and Miss P. could prove by the family Bible, if it were not mislaid, that she is not yet thirty years old; but Miss P. excuses Mr. C.'s loss of memory on account of his age. Miss P. further requests Mrs. T. to tell Mr. C., that her adherence to a single life and her steadfast refusal of numerous offers, has caused a larger addition to the bills of mortality than Miss P.'s tender heart can bear to reflect on, while, at the same time, Miss P. cannot attribute Mr. C.'s bachelorhood to any motive but one, Miss P. fears in his case 'the grapes were sour.' Miss P. would remind Mr. C. that there is such a thing as damages for a libel, and she would also ask him if he is in want of a character why it is necessary to take hers? In conclusion, Miss P. hopes Mrs. T. will reflect on her duties as a neighbor, and carefully guard against future annoyance to Miss P., either by the monkey or the man."

You may imagine, Mr. Editor, the remorse and horror I felt at the sufferings of my dear friend. Indeed, I had no peace of mind until I seized a pen, and contritely acknowledged my sorrow for having thrown her on a dilemma with so many horns to it; but, ever amiable, she hastened to soothe my anxieties by the following billet:

"DEAR CHERICUT—I regret you should have been so much distressed by the little contretemps occasioned by Beauty, and hope you will see in them, as I do, only food for mirth, especially as the poor fellow is not likely to trouble either of us again. Before telling you how this desirable consummation has been achieved, I must assure you that I only suffered Master Joe's version of affairs to reach you as matter of amusement. I know the hearty laugh caused by his handwriting, orthography, and grammar, was quite as effectual as homeopathy in curing me. But revenue a nos moulons, or rather to our monkey.

I've told you that we happily secured and despatched him to the office, where, I am sorry to say, he behaved no better than he should do: in fact, Mr. Thompson brought home sad accounts of him. It appears he got loose, jumped out of the window, and paid a visit to a china warehouse, among whose contents he performed a series of fancy dances with such dexterity, as to elude his pursuers, without damaging the crockery; from thence he fled to a druggist's, opposite the office, who was fortunately a friend of Mr. Thompson's, or I do not know what might have been the consequence. This gentleman assured him that Beauty made more chemical combinations in his shop than he quite approved, for, before he was caught, sudorifics and soporifics, emetics and demulcents, alkalies and acids, were mixed together in sad confusion; but with much trouble he was finally recovered, and the porter having, with infinite difficulty, got some of his friends to subscribe to a raffle, Beauty's destiny will be determined next Saturday night, by which time we hope to see you.

"Your affectionate JULIA."

And now, sir, I will only add, that the raffle took place at the appointed time, and my monkey was consigned to the barkeeper of a small tavern on the outskirts of the city, where, I am told, he lives in a wire cage five feet high, and, totally forgetting his good-breeding and the high estate from which he is fallen, has taken to drinking gin and smoking segars. Alas! I fear Beauty is not the only beau, who, beginning the world as a pet of the ladies, has ended his career in the bar-room.

I do not tell you what were the proceeds resulting from his disposal, lest some might think them too much, and others too little; but the satisfactory consequence for me is, that I have forever done with Beauty, while you and your readers will doubtless rejoice that here ends this long

TALE OF A MONKEY.

FRIENDLY WORDS.

BY MAY LINWOOD.

Reader—thou and I are gleaners,
In the harvest field of Time;
Day by day the grain is ripening,
For a sunnier clime.

Whether in the early morning,
Going forth with busy feet,
Or as weary laborers, resting
Mid the noon day heat,—

Let us strive with cheerful spirit,
Each our duty to fulfil,
Till the time of harvest—subject
To the Master's will.

Let us garner up sweet memories,
Bound with ties of love
Pleasant thoughts to cheer the pathway
To our home above;

Trusting that these precious gleanings,
Bound with loving hand,
May in golden sheaves be gathered
To the spirit land.

A BRIEF HISTORY, IN THREE PARTS, WITH A SEQUEL.

PART I.—LOVE.

A glance—a thought—a blow—
It stings him to the core.
A question—will it lay him low?
Or will time heal it o'er?

He kindles at the name—
He sits and thinks apart;
Time blows and blows it to a flame,
Burning within his heart.

He loves it though it burns,
And nurses it with care;
He feels the blissful pain by turns
With hope, and with despair.

PART II.—COURTSHIP.

Sonnets and serenades,
Sighs, glances, tears, and vows,
Gifts, tokens, souvenirs, parades,
And courtesies and bows.

A purpose and a prayer;
The stars are in the sky—
He wonders how e'en hope should dare
To let him aim so high!

Still hope allures and flatters,
And doubt just makes him bold;
And so, with passion all in tatters,
The trembling tale is told.

Apologies and blushes,
Soft looks, averted eyes,
Each heart into the other rushes,
Each yields, and wins a prize.

PART III.—MARRIAGE.

A gathering of fond friends,—
Brief, solemn words, and prayer,—
A trembling to the fingers' ends,
As hand in hand, they swear.

Sweet cake, sweet wine, sweet kisses,
And so the deed is done;
Now for life's waves and blisses,
The wedded two are one.

And down the shining stream,
They launch their buoyant skiff,
Bless'd, if they may but trust hope's dream,
But ah! Truth echoes—"If!"

THE SEQUEL—"IF."

If health be firm—if friends be true—
If self be well controlled,
If tastes be pure—if wants be few—
And not too often told—

If reason always rule the heart—
If passion own its way—
If love—for aye—to life imparts
The zest it does to-day—

If Providence, with parent care,
Mete out the varying lot—
While meek contentment bows to share
The palace, or the cot.—

And oh! if Faith, sublime and clear,
The spirit upwards guide—
Then bless'd indeed, and bless'd forever,
The bridegroom and the bride!

[MUSICAL WORLD.]

DOING GOOD BY STEALTH.—In his younger days, when the late Lord Panmure was only the Hon. William Maule, he often prided himself in bestowing charity on the poor cottars without his person being known, or in the guise of a gaberlunzie. "One one occasion," says the Montrose Standard, "he entered the cot of a poor old woman at Muirdrum, with his wallet slung about him, well filled with oat-meal. On asking charity, he was at once supplied with a handful of Scotia's food, and was invited to rest himself. On entering into conversation with the old woman, he found that she was really poor, and soon persuaded her to buy his beggar's meal at half price. Shortly after he had gone, the old woman began to examine her bargain, when, to her great surprise, she found the meal to contain a goodly mixture of sixpences, shillings, half-crowns, &c. Conceiving the poor beggar man to have made his 'meal-pock' his cash depository also, she made after him, bellowing, 'Hoy, hoy, man, ye've left a' yer siller am' the meal ye selt me;' but the more she shouted, the faster did the beggar walk on, when she gave up the chase and returned, telling her neighbors of the strange bargain she had made, and seemingly very much alarmed as to its having been honestly come by. At last, one more sagacious than the rest, gave it as her opinion, that the beggar man was none other than Willie Maule."

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—Infinite are the consequences which follow from a single, and often apparently a very insignificant circumstance. Paley narrowly escaped being a baker. Cromwell was near being strangled in his cradle by a monkey; here was this wretched ape wielding in his paws the destinies of nations. Henry VIII. is smitten with the beauty of a girl of eighteen; and ere long "the Reformation beams from Bullen's eyes." Charles Wesley refuses to go with his wealthy namesake to Ireland; and the inheritance which would have been his goes to build up the fortunes of a Wellesley instead of a Wesley; and to this decision of a school-boy (as Mr. Southey observes,) Methodism may owe its existence, and England its military, its civil, and political glory.

Madame Grisi, like Sontag, still preserves a youthful appearance. Not long ago a gentleman said to Grisi, "It is astonishing how like you are to your mother?" "You know my mother?" inquiringly remarked the lady. "Certainly. I perfectly recollect hearing her in Paris in 1832, when she played in Norma." "But, sir, it was I whom you heard." "Oh, that is, indeed a joke!" This gentleman would never believe that the Grisi of our day was the Grisi of 1832.

"Mary, where's the frying-pan?" "Jemmy's got it, carting mud and clam-shells up the alley, with the cat for a horse." "The dear little fellow, what a genius he will make; but go and get it; we are going to have company, and must fry some fish for dinner."

"Father, are there any boys in Congress?"
 "No, my boy, why do you ask that question?"
 "Because the paper said the other day that one of the members kicked Mr. Corwin's Bill out of the house."

"Is there any danger from the boa constrictor?" said a visitor to the Zoological Gardens, a few days since. "Not the least, sir; he never bites, he swallows his victuals whole."

Virtue wants more admirers, wisdom more supplicants, truth more real friends, and honesty more practitioners.

PARLOR PASTIMES.

MUSICAL FLAME.—Fit a good cork into a wine bottle; burn a hole through the cork with a round iron skewer, and into it fix a piece of tobacco-pipe about eight inches long. Put into the bottle about two or three ounces of zinc, in slips, such as the waste cuttings from a zinc-worker; now pour water on to the zinc until the bottle is rather more than half full; then add about three parts of a wine-glassful of sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol;) this causes a rapid effervescence at first, but which subsides to a moderate and continuous boiling for a lengthened period: as soon as the boiling is regular the cork with the pipe through it may be inserted into the bottle. If a light be placed to the end of the pipe, a flame will be produced, which will continue to burn so long as there is any visible action in the bottle. This flame is the ignited hydrogen gas (water gas) resulting from the decomposition of water by the acid and zinc, and as such is an exceedingly interesting experiment. Now, to be musical, procure a glass or metal pipe about sixteen or eighteen inches long, and from half to three-quarters of an inch in diameter; place the tube over the flame, and allow the pipe to be about three to five inches up the tube, which will act as a kind of high chimney; it must be held perfectly steady and upright at a particular distance up the tube, which varies according to the size of the flame. A beautiful sound is thus produced similar to an organ pipe; this sound, or "musical flame," varies in note according to the diameter of the tube, being deeper or more bass as the tube is increased in size. By using various sized tubes, different sounds are thus readily produced. The true explanation of this singular experiment remains yet to be solved.

THE INEXHAUSTIBLE BOTTLE TRICK EXPLAINED.—Some of the illusions performed at the theatres are of a very complicated character, and more than one ruse has to be contrived to mislead, or rather to lead, the audience to think differently to what they intend. Tricks within tricks, "Veils within veils," as the shrewd Sam Weller says, are worked to render perfect one deception, and thus it is with the bottle trick. "Wherever does it all come from?" says Mrs. Partington. My dear madam, that's where it is; you are deceived in the least deceptive part of the trick. There is a good deal of deception, certainly, but not more than one-half of what you fancy. In the first place, there are the wine-glasses; supposing them to be filled, they will not contain more than one-quarter of the quantity of the usual glass; they are, in fact, what I heard Mrs. Thingamy (our charwoman) say they were, regular "eight-outs;" that is, a quarter, or gill, will fill eight of such glasses. Let me see, a wine bottle holds nearly eight quarters; eight times eight (for such are the glasses used at the theatre) are sixty-four. No wonder poor Mrs. P. should say, "Where does it all come from?" when she sees five dozen and four glasses filled from one bottle; no wonder that the bottle is christened "Inexhaustible." Secondly, suppose I have a bottle to hold a quarter more than an ordinary bottle, by having it made a trifle larger in diameter, and doing away with the false bottom which exists in all common bottles, why then I could contrive it to hold no less than eighty of the wizard's "bumpers!" Fancy a conjuror having what a wine-merchant has not—an honest bottle. You won't believe it; well, then, here you are deceived again, for it is an honest bottle that is used. Now for the trick. An empty bottle is brought forward (the bottle;) it is washed out before the company, and drained, to show that it is both clean and empty; but it wants wiping (of course,) after being wetted. So a napkin is handed to the magician, with which he wipes the bottle, as much after the fashion of a waiter as he can; but in this clumsy kind of napkin is concealed a weak preparation of spirits of wine, sugar, and water, in a bladder; and thus, in the face of the audience, he fills the bottle without their knowing it. Now, to account for the different liqueurs. This part of the illusion is thus managed. The glasses are arranged on the tray, in a definite manner, known to the operator; into each glass one drop of various flavoring essences are placed, such as essence of noyau, essence of brandy, essences of port or sherry wine, lemonade, peppermint, cloves, pine-apple, pears, &c.; these being filled up with the spirits of wine, according to what is called for by the audience, completes the illusion of the inexhaustible bottle. And if still more be required, the operator may have concealed in his sleeve a bladder of liquid, as easily as a bagpipe-player can stow away a bag of wind. This trick is also performed with a bottle having four interior divisions, each containing a different liquor.

TO PROVE THAT AIR CONTAINS WATER.—However dry the atmosphere may appear to be, it yet contains a considerable portion of moisture: this is rendered evident by the following simple experiment: Put an ounce of dry chloride of calcium, or of acetate of potash, into a wide-mouthed bottle; weigh it with the bottle when the experiment is begun; leave the cork out, and place it in any situation free from dust; in three days or a week again weigh the bottle and its contents—a very perceptible increase in weight will then be discovered, which is entirely owing to the water that the substance employed has absorbed from the atmosphere. A great many chemical substances have this property, such as sulphuric acid (strong oil of vitriol,) subcarbonate of potash, and even chloride of sodium (common table-salt,) but in different degrees. All materials having this quality are said to be "deliquescent," that is, water attractive.

"I compare the art of spreading rumors," says John Newton, "to the art of pin-making. There is usually some truth, which I call wires; as this passes from hand to hand, one gives it a polish, another a point; others make and put on the head, and at last the pin is completed."

Real difficulties are the best cure of imaginary ones; because God helps us in the real ones, and so makes us ashamed of the others.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

It is about time the public demurred to the high prices which popular singers and grasping agents have of late been exacting; and in promoting and sustaining which the press has lent its efficient aid. Since the Jenny Lind furor, which was created through the exceedingly adroit management of that prince of all managers, Barnum, a similar excitement has been attempted with each succeeding star, and, in some cases, not without a good measure of success. That the public have submitted to the thing so long, is a little remarkable. Why must a popular singer claim a thousand dollars a night for singing four or five pieces, when a hundred would be a most liberal compensation? The thing is preposterous! When amusements and recreations are taxed in this way, they become burdensome—are evil rather than good. A man with his wife and two or three daughters, if he would hear Sontag or Alboni, must pay as much for good seats in the concert-room, during a single evening, as would provision his family for a week, or buy fuel enough to keep some poor widow's humble abode warm for a whole winter.

The thing is entirely wrong, and we hope right-thinking and sensible people will give it a little reflection. In all conscience, a dollar for a single admission to any concert is enough. From fourteen hundred to two thousand dollars in the house ought to compensate every one concerned, liberally, and leave a wide margin for the prima donna. Beyond this, whatever is paid is, in all probability, so much lost to justice and benevolence. The man who expends from five to twenty dollars on a single concert, will be apt to consider himself a little poor for a week afterwards; and feel, "in justice to his family," pledged to close dealing with the market-woman and day-laborer, and be utterly insensible to all appeals to a generous humanity. Those who are perfectly able to pay these high prices, do not make up the bulk of the large audiences that sit for weary hours in close and crowded concert-rooms, until all sense of enjoyment is blunted; the larger number, either from a passion for music, that will seek gratification at any cost, or from a weak devotion to the mere popular and fashionable, attend by a sort of constraint, but cannot really afford these exorbitant charges.

At one of the concerts of Madame Sontag, in this city, the agents of the lady had the hardihood, if we may so speak, to advertise a limited number of "standee" tickets at one dollar each! We were pleased to observe that few, if any, accepted the insulting offer.

There is one effectual way of reaching the evil of which we complain, and that is, for the leading concert-goers to refuse to attend any concert, no matter by whom given, when the price is fixed at more than one dollar. At that price, with well-filled houses, the "artists" will receive a most liberal return. Thin off the benches for a few nights, and silence the "cymbal and gong of American enthusiasm," and the most exacting foreign singers will come eagerly to terms with the public. If they can't get three dollars a night, for a few songs, they will warble quite as sweetly for one, and think themselves well paid.

There is no reason or justice in throwing from fifty to two or three hundred thousand dollars into the lap of a public singer in the space of twelve months, when, for a fortune like that, she ought to sing for the public during ten or twenty years. It is downright extravagance! Why should three dollars be paid for a single musical entertainment, when the same money would procure three equally as good, and the singers receive ample remuneration? The public is exceedingly short-sighted in this matter.

Those who can afford to buy tickets at high prices, should remember that there are thousands, equally lovers of music, who cannot; and that, in encouraging the exorbitant demands of singers, they are unjust to the many who are denied the pleasure they are able to enjoy.

The editor of Graham's Magazine, in noticing the suspension of Sartain's Magazine, says of the latter,—"We understand that it spent in three years over $15,000 for original contributions, and it is wrecked, hopelessly wrecked. Will there never be pride enough in the American people," he adds, "to stand by those who support a National Literature, or to urge upon Congress an international copy-right law?" Graham says that he has paid, during the last ten years, over $80,000 to American writers alone. We know that he, with other Philadelphia magazine publishers, have paid out very large sums of money to authors, and that, at one time, but for these magazines, many of our best writers might have burned their manuscripts for all the pecuniary value attached to them. Scarcely a number of Graham's, Godsey's or Sartain's Magazine was issued, that did not cost, for literary articles, more than is paid to most authors for the copy-right of a whole volume. The present taste for the mere cullings of English magazines, instead of the fresh, original productions of our own writers, cannot, we think, long be in the ascendant. It must give place to a healthier state of feeling. The American mind will naturally seek for some expression of its own peculiar modes of thought; for reflections in periodical literature of its own manners, habits and social customs. In the matter of books, the demand for those written by American authors is rapidly on the increase. Through our magazines, the public have come to know and appreciate these authors, and now eagerly purchase and read their books. This shows the inclinations of public taste. The eagerness with which we Americans seek to get the "most for our money," has led to the wide patronage of a publication that obtains without cost, from foreign sources, nearly all of its articles, and is able, therefore, to furnish a larger amount of reading matter, for the same money, than it is possible for magazines to give that pay high prices for what is original. We do not believe, however, that this state of things will long continue. The public mind cannot be satisfied with such mental aliment, and will come back to the more genial home repasts.

But, in order to this, something must be done by the publishers of American magazines to create the revulsion in public taste so much desired. Instead of being drawn aside into an imitation of the work referred to, let them concentrate upon their magazines the best talent to be found in the country; diminish the number of useless engravings, and give, for the same cost, an increase of matter, all original, and of the highest and most interesting character. Let them do this, and our word for it, the public will seek their favorite authors in their pages. There is no lack of talent in this country, but it must be paid for its work. Make it a fair return, and it will produce a fresher, racier, and far more attractive periodical literature than England has ever seen!

In reading books of travel, one is struck with the different points of vision from which two persons have viewed the same scenes, the different conclusions at which each has arrived, as well as the prominence which each has given to things scarcely noted by the other. Four somewhat recent books on Europe, present quite a marked contrast of the kind to which we allude; Greely's "Glances at Europe," Ware's "European Capitals," "The Buckeye Abroad," and Calvert's "Scenes and Thoughts in Europe." Mr. Greely, a man of the people, and a utilitarian, looked directly at the condition of the masses, and regarded them in their social and political condition: Mr. Ware, a man of taste, and a lover of art, sought out the galleries of sculpture, and entertained his readers with descriptions of these, and criticisms upon the masters; or portrayed social customs, as he saw them at the point where his peculiar tastes brought him into contact with society. The third, his mind filled with classic associations, and familiar, from reading, with modern localities of interest, sketches, in a rapid, poetic, and finely descriptive vein, a series of pictures, embracing scenery, public buildings, and views of the people in masses, as vivid as they are captivating;—while the fourth, a modern progressive philosopher, and a worshipper of the genius of Fourier, lets you see little more of Europe than a few of its morbid excrescences, and spots of gangrene, over which he moralizes from page to page, giving out trueism and fine flashes of sentiment, yet keeping you ever in a narrow circle—the limit of his own vision, which seems to embrace a world-wide range.

A man, says a modern reviewer, can only describe what he sees, still, he adds: "the description of an actual fact or appearance varies chiefly as regards the power and spirit of the describer. The impression will differ according to the general character of the recipient, but suggestions must depend upon all the countless circumstances that have contributed to make up the individual life."

Therefore, in estimating truly the value of a traveller's opinions, something of his personal history, character and peculiar modes of thinking, require to be known; also the stand-point he takes, and his power of vision. Unless something of this knowledge be possessed, we cannot read books of modern travel, without forming inadequate or exaggerated estimates of a people's social and political condition.

The tyranny of opinion, in this country, takes the place of physical despotism in Europe and Asia; showing human nature, in its love of dominion, to be the same in both countries. It is remarkable, to what extent, in free America, the spirit of intolerance, and proscription for opinion's sake, exist. No matter how upright your intentions, nor how pure your life may be, you have only to hold an honest difference of sentiment from certain men, and certain cliques, to be denounced in terms of unmitigated opprobrium. Men who do this, no matter to what broad and liberal views they subscribe—no matter how fairly they talk of human progress and the enlargement of human liberty—would be, if the physical power were in their hands, the veriest of tyrants.

Grace Greenwood found nothing of romance in the celebrated Vale of Avoca. "I looked in vain," she says, "in the little streams Avonmore and Avonbeg, in their wedding at Castle Howard, and in their subsequent two-in-oneness, their slow, sedate, matrimonial on-flow, as the Avoca, for that 'purest of crystal' which gleams in the song—the poet's words have a more silvery flowing than these waters, and this valley's 'brightest of green' is surpassed by the verdancy of the romantic tourist who comes hither hoping to behold a picture of entrancing loveliness, which was 'all in the eye' of the melodist. The current of the Avoca is evidently discolored by the copper mines, worked on its banks, most unpoetic and unlooked-for adjuncts to that 'scene of enchantment.' Yet, believe me, I felt a deeper pleasure in seeing the poor countrymen of the poet earning an honest livelihood by mining in those beautiful hills—rude avocation for the 'Sweet Vale of Avoca'—than I could have known in the perfect realization of his most exquisite dream."

We should give ourselves the habit of regarding the world of nature as a world of effects, only. This would lead us to be ever looking upwards and inwards for the causes which produce the visible by which we are surrounded. In the "visible things of creation," there is a likeness and an image of the invisible Creator; and we will, if we look with an earnest and purified vision, not only see God in nature, but recognize the beautiful and instructive relation that exists between the world of mind and the world of matter.

It is a little singular that, in almost all cases, the formation of church choirs is the beginning of trouble in worshipping congregations. Why is this? Harmony should not be the generator of discord; and, yet, it would be difficult, we believe, to find a church which, at some time or other, has not been disturbed in consequence of dissensions among its singing members.

THE ERRING.

BY ALICE CAREY.

"The quality of mercy is not strained:
It droppeth like the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blessed;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown:
His sceptre shows the force of temporal power,
The attribute to awe and majesty,
Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings;
But mercy is above his sceptred sway;
It is enthroned in the hearts of kings;
It is an attribute of God himself;
And earthly power doth then show likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice."—MERCHANT OF VENICE.

If there be one prayer more than another that we need always in our hearts, it is the "Lead us not into temptation." How many, treading in as straight a path, and with as firm a step, perhaps, as ourselves, worn and weary, too, it may be, with the toils of the long and hard way, beckoned aside into what seemed some cool and sheltered nestling-place of rest, have turned from the narrow way, and been lost forever. Vain, henceforth, are all their struggles; darkly between them and the confidence of the world, between them and the friendships they have broken, and, most of all, between them and their own self-respect, lifts "the hand of an all-pitiless demon," evermore.

Is not this a retribution terrible enough—that men and women, too, should pause from their own avocations, and with haughty words and withering looks, coldly measure the distance between themselves and the fallen, even when themselves have kept the way with feeble and faltering steps, and when the very error they affect so to despise, has shone up like a light revealing the hideous darkness into which they else would have gone? For it is of the erring I speak, now, and not of the criminal. Darkened from its primal beauty the soul may be, yet still it is exceeding precious, else in Heaven would there not be such joy over one sinner that repenteth.

If we have kept our robes from the dust, and our hands and our hearts clean, surely we can afford to be charitable and merciful towards those who have not; but even if so, we are yet alike subject to vanity, and the best and worthiest man or woman has reason to cry out, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner," before the holy Searcher of hearts.

Mercifulest of all, when the wicked woman was brought before Him, was He, who Himself was without sin, saying, "Neither do I condemn thee."

To the dark hall of Pilate the multitude throng:
Who is it that follows so meekly a'long—
Unheeding the foreheads with diadems bound,
And the blaze of the jewels and girdles around,
And even the scoffer that mocks at her prayer?—
The Mary forgiven of Jesus is there.

Who sees the thorns plaited—the cross and the nails,
As the spirit that cried, "I will follow thee," fails?
The sun at the noon-tide his brightness refuse,
As they cry in derision, "Hail, King of the Jews!"
The spear of the Roman, the writhe and the prayer?—
The Mary whom Jesus forgave still is there.

The third morn is breaking—how lovely the forms
That are bearing sweet roses and-spice in their arms!

But the white brow of beauty is saddened with woe,
The dark locks are down on her bosom of snow,
As she sits on the rock by the tomb in despair,—
'Tis Mary whom Jesus forgave that is there.

She folds her pale hands on her desolate heart,
And takes up her spices and myrrh to depart;
But, lo! at her feet there are shadows of gold,
The tidings that Jesus is risen are told—
And "glory and honor" are mixed with her prayer,
As she hastens to Galilee—Jesus is there.

One little act of kindness, which says to a degenerate brother, "I also am a man," and, consequently, alike subject to temptation with yourself, will do more for the building up of a ruinous humanity, than all the fiery-tipped arrows that ever went hissing from indignant hands.

I have little charity for that self-righteousness which mingles with its abhorrence of error no pity for the erring. Breathings of wrath and denunciation fill the world, chilling "that best warmth that radiates from the heart, where Love sits brooding over an honest purpose," and darkening the great light that is continually round about us all. We leave the wretched to "uncomforted and friendless solitude," where within the fiery circle of evil thought, "The soul emmoulds its essence, hopelessly deformed by sights of evermore deformity."

With other ministrations, thou, O Nature! Healest thy wandering and distempered child; Thou pourest on him thy soft influences, Thy sunny hues, fair forms and breathing sweets, Thy melodies of words and winds and waters! Till he relent and can no more endure To be a jarring and a dissonant thing Amid this general dance and minstrelsy; But, bursting into tears, wins back his way, His angry spirit healed and harmonized By the benignant touch of love and beauty.

There is less total depravity in the world than we are apt to imagine, and I doubt not but there is something good in almost every nature which the heaven of kindness might reach, and so the whole man be regenerated.

Who can read the beautiful text with which I have prefaced this brief plea, and not be in love with mercy?

MY FIRST CANADIAN LOAF.

FROM "ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH," BY MRS. MOODIE.

After reducing the log cabin into some sort of order, we contrived, with the aid of a few boards, to make a bed-closet for poor Tom Wilson, who continued to shake every day with the pitiless ague. There was no way of admitting light and air into this domicile, which opened into the general apartment, but through a square hole cut in one of the planks, just wide enough to admit a man's head through the aperture. Here we made Tom a comfortable bed on the floor, and did the best we could to nurse him through his sickness. His long, thin face, emaciated with disease, and surrounded by huge black whiskers, and a beard of a week's growth, looked perfectly unearthly. He had only to stare at the baby to frighten her almost out of her wits.

"How fond that young one is of me," he would say; "she cries for joy at the sight of me."

As Tom slowly recovered, and began to regain his appetite, his soul sickened over the salt beef and pork, which, owing to our distance from —, formed our principal fare. He positively refused to touch the sad bread, as my Yankee neighbors very appropriately termed the unleavened cakes in the pan; and it was no easy matter to send a man on horseback eight miles to fetch a loaf of bread.

"Do, my dear Mrs. Moodie, like a good Christian as you are, give me a morsel of the baby's biscuit, and try and make us some decent bread. The stuff your servant gives us is uneatable," said Wilson to me, in most imploring accents.

"Most willingly. But I have no yeast; and I never baked in one of those strange kettles in my life."

"I'll go to old Joe's wife and borrow some," said he; "they are always borrowing of you." Away he went across the field, but soon returned. I looked into his jug—it was empty. "No luck," said he; "those stingy wretches had just baked a fine batch of bread, and they would neither lend nor sell a loaf; but they told me how to make their milk-emptyings."

"Well, discuss the same;" but I much doubted if he could remember the recipe.

"You are to take an old tin pan," said he, sitting down on the stool, and poking the fire with a stick.

"Must it be an old one?" said I, laughing.

"Of course; they said so."

"And what am I to put into it?"

"Patience; let me begin at the beginning. Some flour and some milk—but, by George! I've forgot all about it. I was wondering as I came across the field, why they called the yeast milk-emptyings, and that put the way to make it quite out of my head. But never mind; it is only ten o'clock by my watch. I have nothing to do; I will go again."

He went. Would I had been there to hear the colloquy between him and Mrs. Joe; he described it something to this effect:—

Mrs. Joe: "Well, stranger, what do you want now?"

Tom: "I have forgotten the way you told me how to make the bread."

Mrs. Joe: "I never told you how to make bread. I guess you are a fool. People have to raise bread before they can bake it. Pray who sent you to make game of me? I guess somebody as wise as yourself."

Tom: "The lady at whose house I am staying."

Mrs. Joe: "Lady! I can tell you that we have no ladies here. So the old woman who lives in the old log shanty in the hollow, don't know how to make bread. A clever wife that! Are you her husband?" (Tom shakes his head.) "Her brother?" (Another shake.) "Her son? Do you hear? or are you deaf?" (Going quite close up to him.)

Tom (moving back): "Mistress, I'm not deaf; and who or what I am is nothing to you. Will you oblige me by telling me how to make the milk-emptyings; and this time I'll put it down in my pocket-book."

Mrs. Joe (with a strong sneer): "Milk-emptyings! Milk, I told you. So you expect me to answer your questions, and give back nothing in return. Get you gone; I'll tell you no more about it."

Tom (bowing very low): "Thank you for your civility. Is the old woman who lives in the little shanty near the apple-trees more obliging?"

Mrs. Joe: "That's my husband's mother. You may try. I guess she'll give you an answer." (Exit, slamming the door in his face.)

"And what did you do then?" said I.

"Oh, went of course. The door was open, and I reconnoitred the premises before I ventured in. I liked the phiz of the old woman a deal better than that of her daughter-in-law, although it was cunning and inquisitive, and as sharp as a needle. She was busy shelling cobs of Indian corn into a barrel. I rapped at the door. She told me to come in, and in I stepped. She asked me if I wanted her. I told her my errand, at which she laughed heartily."

Old woman: "You are from the old country, I guess, or you would know how to make milk-emptyings. Now, I always prefer bran-emptyings. They make the best bread. The milk, I opine, gives it a sourish taste, and the bran is the least trouble."

Tom: "Then let us have the bran, by all means. How do you make it?"

Old woman: "I put a double handful of bran into a small pot, or kettle, but a jug will do, and a tea-spoonful of salt; but mind you don't kill it with salt, for if you do, it won't rise. I then add as much warm water, at blood-heat, as will mix it into a stiff batter. I then put the jug into a pan of warm water, and set it on the hearth near the fire, and keep it at the same heat until it rises, which it generally will do, if you attend to it, in two or three hours' time. When the bran cracks at the top, and you see white bubbles rising through it, you may strain it into your flour, and lay your bread. It makes good bread."

Tom: "My good woman, I am greatly obliged to you. We have no bran; can you give me a small quantity?"

Old woman: "I never give any thing. You Englishers, who come out with stacks of money, can afford to buy."

Tom: "Sell me a small quantity."

Old woman: "I guess I will." (Edging quite close, and fixing her sharp eyes on him.) "You must be very rich to buy bran."

Tom (quizzically): "Oh, very rich."

Old woman: "How do you get your money?"

Tom (sarcastically): "I don't steal it."

Old woman: "Pr'aps not. I guess you'll soon let others do that for you if you don't take care. Are the people you live with related to you?"

Tom (hardly able to keep his gravity): "On Eve's side. They are my friends."

Old woman (in surprise): "And do they keep you for nothing, or do you work for your meat?"

Tom (impatiently): "Is that bran ready?" (The old woman goes to the bin, and measures out a quart of bran.) "What am I to pay you?"

Old woman: "A York shilling."

Tom (wishing to test her honesty): "Is there any difference between a York shilling and a shilling of British currency?"

Old woman (evasively): "I guess not. Is there not a place in England called York?" (Looking up and leering knowingly in his face.)

"Tom (laughing): "You are not going to come York over me in that way, or Yankee either. There is threepence for your pound of bran; you are enormously paid."

Old woman (calling after him): "But the recipe; do you allow nothing for the recipe?"

Tom: "It is included in the price of the bran."

"And so," said he, "I came laughing away, rejoicing in my sleeve that I had disappointed the avaricious old cheat."

The next thing to be done was to set the bran rising. By the help of Tom's recipe, it was duly mixed in the coffee-pot, and placed within a tin pan, full of hot water, by the side of the fire. I have often heard it said that a watched pot never boils; and there certainly was no lack of watchers in this case. Tom sat for hours regarding it with his large heavy eyes, the maid inspected it from time to time, and scarce ten minutes were suffered to elapse without my testing the heat of the water, and the state of the emptyings; but the day slipped slowly away, and night drew on, and yet the watched pot gave no signs of vitality. Tom sighed deeply when he sat down to tea with the old fare.

"Never mind," said he, "we shall get some good bread in the morning; it must get up by that time, I will wait till then. I could almost starve before I could touch these leaden cakes."

The tea-things were removed. Tom took up his flute, and commenced a series of the wildest voluntary airs that ever were breathed forth by human lungs. Mad jigs, to which the gravest of mankind might have cut eccentric capers. We were all convulsed with laughter. In the midst of one of these droll movements, Tom suddenly hopped like a kangaroo (which feat he performed by raising himself upon tip-toes, then flinging himself forward with a stooping jerk), towards the hearth, and squinting down into the coffee-pot in the most quizzical manner, exclaimed, "Miserable chaff! If that does not make you rise, nothing will."

I left the bran all night by the fire. Early in the morning I had the satisfaction of finding that it had risen high above the rim of the pot, and was surrounded by a fine crown of bubbles.

"Better late than never," thought I, as I emptied the emptyings into my flour. "Tom is not up yet. I will make him so happy with a loaf of new bread, nice home-baked bread, for his breakfast." It was my first Canadian loaf. I felt quite proud of it, as I placed it in the odd machine in which it was to be baked. I did not understand the method of baking in these ovens; or that my bread should have remained in the kettle for half-an-hour, until it had risen the second time, before I applied the fire to it; in order that the bread should be light. It not only required experience to know when it was in a fit state for baking, but the oven should have been brought to a proper temperature to receive the bread. Ignorant of all this, I put my unrisen loaf into a cold kettle, and heaped a large quantity of hot ashes above and below it. The first intimation I had of the result of my experiment was the disagreeable odor of burning bread filling the house.

"What is this horrid smell?" cried Tom, issuing from his domicile, in his shirt-sleeves. "Do open the door, Bell (to the maid); I feel quite sick."

"It is the bread," said I, taking off the lid of the oven with the tongs. "Dear me, it is all burnt!"

"And smells as sour as vinegar," says he. "The black bread of Sparta!"

Alas! for my maiden loaf! With a rueful face I placed it on the breakfast-table. "I hoped to have given you a treat, but I fear you will find it worse than the cakes in the pan."

"You may be sure of that," said Tom, as he stuck his knife into the loaf, and drew it forth covered with raw dough. "Oh, Mrs. Moodie! I hope you make better books than bread."

We were all sadly disappointed. The others submitted to my failure good-naturedly, and made it the subject of many droll, but not unkindly, witicisms. For myself, I could have borne the severest infliction from the pen of the most formidable critic with more fortitude than I bore the cutting up of my first loaf of bread. After breakfast, Moodie and Wilson rode into the town; and when they returned at night brought several long letters for me. Ah! those first kind letters from home! Never shall I forget the rapture with which I grasped them—the eager, trembling haste with which I tore them open, while the blinding tears which filled my eyes hindered me for some minutes from reading a word which they contained. Sixteen years have slowly passed away—it appears half a century—but never, never can home letters give me the intense joy those letters did. After seven years' exile, the hope of return grows feeble, the means are still less in our power, and our friends give up all hope of our return; their letters grow fewer and colder, their expressions of attachment are less vivid; the heart has formed new ties, and the poor emigrant is nearly forgotten. Double those years, and it is as if the grave had closed over you, and the hearts that once knew and loved you, know you no more.

Tom, too, had a large packet of letters, which he read with great glee. After re-perusing them, he declared his intention of setting off on his return home the next day. We tried to persuade him to stay until the following spring, and make a fair trial of the country. Arguments were thrown away upon him; the next morning our eccentric friend was ready to start.

"Good-bye!" quoth he, shaking me by the hand as if he meant to sever it from the wrist. "When next we meet it will be in New South Wales, and I hope by that time you will know how to make better bread." And thus ended Tom Wilson's emigration to Canada. He brought out three hundred pounds, British currency; he remained in the country just four months, and returned to England with barely enough to pay his passage home.

A VISIT TO THE BIRTH-PLACE OF BURNS.

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

Dear M——: I left Belfast on the evening of the 23d of September, with my friends, Mr. and Miss N——, for a short tour in Scotland. We landed at Ardrossan, a port of no particular note, and from thence took the railway to Ayr. This last is a fine, flourishing town, but aside from the "wee brigs," containing no objects of peculiar interest as associated with Burns. Here we took a droskey, and drove over to the old parish of Alloway. I cannot tell you how sadly I missed you from my side, my dear M——, when approaching, with the true spirit of a pilgrim, the birth-place of that noble poet of Love and Nature, whose sweetest songs I had learned from your lips, almost with my cradle-hymns. As I gazed around on the scenes once dear and familiar to his eyes, my heart, if not all a-glow with its earliest poetic enthusiasm, acknowledged a deep sympathy for, and did honor to, him who, while his soul was lifted into the divine air of poesy, withdrew not his heart from his fellows—who shared humbly in their humble fortunes, and felt intensely their simple joys and bitter sorrows —who, with all his faults, was honest and manly; with all his wants and poverty, proud and free, and nobly independent—who, amid all his follies and errors, acknowledged God and revered purity.

The cottage in which Burns was born, and which his father built, was originally what is here called a "clay bigging," consisting only of two small apartments on the ground floor—a kitchen and sitting-room. The kitchen has a recess for a bed, and here the poet first opened his bewildered baby eyes on a most ungenial world. This room, it is supposed, was the scene of "The Cotter's Saturday Night." I was somewhat disappointed to find this cottage standing on the road, and that it had been built on to, and white-washed out of all character and venerableness. It is now occupied as an ale-house, which besemeth it little as the scene of the beautiful religious poem above named. A few rods from the door stands the "auld haunted kirk," through one of whose windows luckless Tam O'Shanter took his daring observation of Old Nick and the witches, "as they appeared when enjoying themselves." This is a picturesque, roofless, rafterless edifice, in a good state of preservation. In the pleasant old church-yard rests the father of the poet, beneath the tombstone erected and inscribed by one whose days should have been "long in the land" according to the promise, for Burns truly honored his father and his mother.

From the kirk we went to the monument, which stands on the summit of the eastern bank of the Doon, and near to the "auld brig," on the "key-stone" of which poor Tam O'Shanter was delivered from his weird pursuers, and his gray mare "Meggie" met with a loss irreparable. This monument, of which the prints give you a very good idea, is of graceful proportions and a graceful style of architecture. The grounds about it, though small in extent, are admirably kept, shaded with fine shrubbery, and made more beautiful by hosts of rare and lovely flowers. There seemed to me something peculiarly and touchingly fitting in thus surrounding an edifice, sacred to the genius of Burns, with the leafy haunts of the birds he loved, in whose songs alone would his tuneful memory live, and with the sweetness and brightness of flowers, from whose glowing hearts he would have drawn deep meanings of love and pure breathings of passion, or on whose frail, fragrant leaves he would have read holy Sabbath truths, lessons of modesty and meekness, and teachings of the wondrous wisdom of Him who planted the daisy on the lonely hill-side, and the poet in a weary world—the one to delight the eyes, the other to charm and cheer the souls, of his creatures.

Within the monument, we saw that most touching relic of Burns, the Bible which he gave to "Highland Mary" at their solemn betrothal. It is in two volumes. On the fly-leaf of the first, in the handwriting of the poet, is the text, "And ye shall not swear by my name falsely: I am the Lord." In the second, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths." In both volumes is the name of Burns, with his Mason's mark, and in one is a lock of Mary's own beautiful golden hair—a soft, glossy curl, which in that last tender parting may have been smoothed down by the caressing hand, may have waved in the breath, or lain against the breast of the poet-lover.

The view from the summit of the monument is exceedingly beautiful and interesting, embracing, as it does, many of the scenes of the life and song of Burns. The scenery of air is not grand, surely, nor strikingly picturesque; but this view is lovely, quiet and pleasant, beyond description—truly, a smiling landscape. Perhaps something was owing to the rich sunshine and soft air of the day, and more to the wondrous charm of association; but I never remember to have felt a more exquisite sense of beauty, a delight more deep and delicious, though shadowed with sad and regretful memories, than while sitting or strolling on the lovely banks of the Doon, half cheated by excited fancy with the hope that I might see the rustic poet leaning over the picturesque "auld brig," following with his great, dark, dreamy eyes, the windings of the stream below, or, with glowing face upraised, revelling in the clear deep blue, and fair floating clouds above; or, perchance, walking slowly on the shore, coming down from the pleasant "Braes o' Ballochmyle," musing, with folded arms and drooping head, on "the bonnie lass" who had there unconsciously strayed across the path of a poet, and chanced upon immortality. The Doon seemed to roll by with the melodious flow of his song—now with the impetuous sweep of passion; now with the fine sparkle of pleasant wit; now, under the solemn shadows of sorrow; now out into the clear sunlight of exultant joy; now with the soft gurgle and silver trickling of love's light measures; now with the low, deep murmur of devotion. As I lingered there, countless snatches of the poet's songs, and stanza after stanza of long-forgotten poems, sprang to my lips: rare thoughts, the sweet, fresh flowers of his genius, seemed suddenly to blossom out from all the hidden nooks and still shaded places of memory, and the fair children of his fancy, who had sung themselves to sleep in my heart long ago, stirred, awoke, and smiled into my face again.

Happily for me, my companions fully understood and sympathized with my mood;—so little was said, that much might be felt. One sung—and whether it was that his voice, in its deep, pathetic tones, was peculiarly suited to the mournful words and air, or that the scene itself mingled its melodious memory with the singing, I know not; but never before had I been so affected by the song.

"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon;"

On our way back to Ayr, we called to see the sister and nieces of Burns—Mrs. Beggs and her daughters—who we had been assured were most kindly accessible to visitors. This visit was altogether the most interesting and gratifying event of the day. Mrs. Beggs lives in a simple but charming little rose-embowered cottage, about a mile from her birth-place, where all who seek her with respectful interest, receive a courteous and cordial welcome. Mrs. Beggs is now about eighty years of age, but looks scarcely above sixty, and shows more than the remains of remarkable beauty. Her smile could hardly have been sweeter, or her eyes finer, at twenty. Her sight, hearing, and memory, seem unimpaired; her manners are graceful, modest, and lady-like, and she converses with rare intelligence and animation, speaking with a slight, sweet Scottish accent. Her likeness to Naysmith's portrait of her brother is very marked—her eyes are peculiarly like the idea we have of his, both by pictures and description—large, dark, lustrous, and changing. Those eyes shone with new brightness as I told her of our love for the memory of her beloved brother, our sympathy in his sorrows, and our honor for his free and manly spirit—when I told her that the New World, as the Old, bowed to the mastery of his genius, and were swayed to smiles or tears by the wondrous witchery of his song. But when I spoke my admiration of the monument, and said, "What a joy it would have been to him, could he have foreseen such noble recognitions of his greatness!" she smiled mournfully, and shook her head, saying, "Ah, madam, in his proudest moments, my poor brother never dreamed of such a thing;" then added that his death-chamber was darkened, and his death agony deepened by want and care, and torturing fears for the dear ones he was to leave. I was reminded by her words of the expression of an old Scotch dame, in our country, on hearing of the completion of this monument: "Puir Rob! he asked for bread, and now they gie him a stane."

Mrs. Beggs says that Naysmith's portrait of her brother is the best, but that no picture could have done full justice to the kindling and varying expression of his face. In her daughters, who are pleasant and interesting women, you can trace a strong family resemblance to the poet. The three sons of Burns are yet living—two in the army, and one has a situation under Government at Dumfries. All three are widowers. When I saw her, Mrs. Beggs was expecting daily the two youngest, the soldiers, who as often as possible visit Ayr, and cherish as tenderly, as proudly, the memory of their father.

It was with deep emotion that I parted from this gentle and large-hearted woman, in whose kindred and likeness to the glorious peasant I almost felt that I had seen him, heard his voice with all its searching sweetness, and had my soul sounded by the deep divinings of his eyes. It seems, indeed, a blessed thing, that after the sorrow which darkened her youth, the beholding the pride of her house sink into the grave in his prime, broken-hearted by the neglect of friends, the contempt and cruelty of foes, by care and poverty, and bitterest of all, by a weary weight of self-reproach—that she has lived to see his children happy and prosperous—his birth-place and his grave counted among the world's pilgrim shrines—to be herself honored and beloved for his sake, and to sun her chilled age in the noontide of his glory.—National Era.

"Whiskeretts" is the name of the "little John cow-catchers" that the ladies wear on their cheeks in the place "where the whiskers ought to grow." They are formed by drawing down a little tuft of hair from the temple, and curling up in the shape of a ram's horn or a little pig's tail with an extra kink in it.

A WINDY NIGHT.

BY T. B. READ.

Alow and aloof,
Over the roof,
How the tempests swell and roar!
Though no foot is astir,
Though the cat and the cur
Lie dozing along the kitchen floor,
*There are feet of air
On every stair!*
Through every hall—
Through each gusty door,
There's a jostle and bustle,
With a silken rustle,
Like the meeting of guests at a festival!

Alow and aloof,
Over the roof,
How the stormy tempests swell!
And make the vane
On the spire complain—
They heave at the steeple with might and main;
And burst and sweep
Into the belfry on the bell!
They smite it so hard, and they smite it so well,
That the sexton tosses his arms in sleep,
And dreams he is ringing a funeral knell.

MARY.

BY D. ELLEN G. SHEPARD.

In the cottage by the brook,
Where the early day-beams look,
With a mild and radiant eye,
And the low breeze murmurs by,
Bearing perfume from the flowers,
Through the joyous summer hours,
And the bird's low music swells—
There my gentle Mary dwells.

I can see the window now,
With its curtain white as snow,
Trembling in the morning air
That is creeping softly there;
And its screen of clinging vines,
Where the honeysuckle twines,
With its buds of pink and white,
Bursting in the morning light.

I can see the little lane—
And I do not look in vain
For the path where we have trod,
Lined with rows of emerald sod,
Shaded by the maple boughs
That have often swept our brows,
As with tender word and look
We have wandered to the brook.

Oh, that little brook was dear,
With its music low and clear,
Like a far-off tinkling bell,
Waking echoes through the dell;
With the stars so pure and fair,
And the moonlight smiling there—
And the shining flowers that grew
Close beside its waters blue!

Where the proud old elm tree stands,
There we joined our trembling hands,
And 'neath eyes in heaven above,
Plighted there our youthful love.
And I see her pale cheek yet,

With the pearly tear-drops wet,
Though a smile was gleaming through
Eyes of deepest, meekest blue.

Then I wandered far, oh far
From my heart's pure earthly star,
Though I felt her prayers were given,
Daily, nightly, unto Heaven,
For the exile—and I grew Strong and hopeful, when I knew
That beneath our own elm tree,
She was breathing prayers for me.

Now my toil and care are past,
And my soul returns at last
To the haven of its rest—
To my gentle Mary's breast.
I can see her eyes of blue
The low window peeping through,
And I hear her music-strain,
Falling on my heart again!

FORM AND FEATURE.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

It was no feature's winning grace;—
For, as she leant, I failed to see
The hidden sweetness of her face;
But other charms were left for me—
The bending beauty of her head,
So fair, so delicately fine;
The raven ringlets, richly shed
In many a soft and shadowy line!—
I saw no face—but oh, instead
A form, a grace, that seem'd divin!

The hand, like something shaped of snow,
Just touch'd an ear, so small and thin,
That whisper'd love ne'er found below
So sweet a bow to enter in:
I envied e'en the very lace,
Each wavy fold that circled free;
The silken belt that dared embrace
All that on earth must matchless be;
Oh, long before I saw her face
My heart was won—and gone—from me.

TWO CHARACTERS.

Some murmur when their sky is clear
And wholly bright to view,
If one small speck of dark appear
In their great heaven of blue;
And some with thankful love are fill'd,
If but one streak of light,
One ray of God's great mercy, gild
The darkness of their night.

In palaces are hearts that ask
In discontent and pride,
Why life is such a dreary task;
And all good things denied;
And hearts in poorest huts admire
How love has in their aid
(Love that not ever seems to tire)
Such rich provision made.

THE THIMBLE-RIGGER.

[An English correspondent of the Christian Ambassador gives the following as one of his experiences.]

Around the base of the great rock on which Stirling Castle is erected, but still at a dizzy elevation above the plain, there is a wide, conveniently graded walk. It is a favorite promenade of citizens and visitors—and deservedly so, for finer scenery, embracing fruitful field, precipitous crag, winding river, and lofty mountains in the distance, was never beheld than that which is viewed from the westerly and northerly section of the walk.

After passing a rapid curve in that pedestrian gallery, we saw a group of five gentlemen a few rods in advance of us, ministering, we thought, to an invalid who was seated on the ground, with his back against the wall. We had not the Levite's choice of "passing by on the other side," even had we been disposed to avoid participation in the work of humanity.

On closer approach, we perceived that the seated mortal was not an invalid, but a Thimble-Rigger, who was adroitly inveigling the gentlemen into the "loss and gain" (especially the loss,) of gambling, by means of the three hazel-nut cups about the diameter of a thimble, and a ball about the size of a small pea. Under which of the cups is the ball? was the question.

We had frequently heard of this game as one of the many vagabond ways by which certain men swindle a living out of "green-horns," but never before had we seen it in operation. Partly curiosity and partly sympathy with a young man who was sadly in the losing line, induced us to stop and witness the procedure. The young man was speedily minus five pounds, being all his funds except a half crown, and this the Rigger refused to accept as a stake. He was one of the big-bug hum-bugs, and would not play for less than a pound.

The friend of the loser came indignantly to the rescue, determined to win back the spoils. I begged him to desist, and interposed my person to restrain him.

"I beg your pardon, sir, and appreciate your motive," said he, "but I must and will win back my friend's five pounds."

"It is throwing good money after bad," I replied. "Even granting no slight-of-hand cheatery in the case, the Rigger evidently has two chances out of three."

"There, there!" whispered the gentleman, and I turned about. The Rigger's attention was so rivetted upon us that he did not see a gentleman on the opposite edge of the semi-circle, slyly lift a cup, reveal the ball, and immediately re-cover it. In briefer space than this paragraph can be read, the friend of the loser wagered two pounds on that cup, and gained a like sum. This so assured him that he tried it again with a single pound, losing—and again, winning—his funds in the end being exhausted.

Meanwhile the sly trick of lifting the cup was successfully repeated on the right and left of the Rigger, according as his attention was attracted by a growing and absorbing interest in the game.

I am fearful that this fraud against fraud was not unreservedly condemned in my consideration of the case.

"I will stake this lever watch against a pound," said the loser, with all the earnestness of desperation.

"I will play for nothing but money," coolly answered the Rigger.

"I have a bill of exchange for thirty pounds: I will stake it against ten," said the loser, vehemently—for he had seen the little ball on the board, after a sly lifting of the cup as before.

"I will play for nothing but ready money," replied the Rigger.

"Will any gentleman loan me ten pounds on this bill of exchange?" said the agitated loser. No one responded. "Please, sir, loan me five pounds,—three pounds,—two pounds," he continued, addressing himself to me—the sum diminishing as I slowly but decidedly shook my head.

"You shall have this watch as security," he persisted, pressing it on my hand, as I stood with folded arms surveying him sorrowfully.

"Indeed, sir, I must win back my friend's money and my own. Do loan me two pounds: this time I am sure to win." He had seen the little ball, and so had I.

"No, sir," was my reply, "I never gamble, even for the value of a pin, and I will not connive at gambling in any way. I would not wager a pound on that board against a thousand, although certain of winning."

"Do you know which cup the ball is under?" said the Rigger.

"Yes, I do," I replied.

"Then why don't you stake a pound or two, and win?" said he.

"Because, sir, I am opposed to gambling, on principle."

"Perhaps the gentleman has no money, and therefore has no means of winning a pound or two," rejoined the Rigger, sarcastically.

"I am opposed to gambling, sir, on principle," said I, "and I would not bet a penny on your board, were Stirling Castle to balance it in the result."

"Perhaps the gentleman is poor. I was once poor myself. It is no sin to be poor," resumed the Rigger; "or perhaps the money he has isn't his own."

This speech and its insulting tone greatly excited the two losers, and they broke out upon the gamester in terms of stern and terrible invective. It seemed as if they needed little additional aggravation to pitch him headlong over the precipice.

"Take it coolly, gentlemen," said I. "Do not speak after that fashion. Gambling,—swindling, is the man's business. Let him speak of me as he lists. He has no conception of what acting from principle means. I beseech you, do not bet any more," I continued, as the Rigger re-arranged his cups.

"Do you know which cup the little ball is under?" said he, looking towards me with his basilisk eyes.

"Yes, I do," I replied, for at that moment the sly trick of lifting one of the cups was repeated by the gentleman on the extreme left of the semicircle.

"Then why don't you put down a pound—ten pounds—fifty pounds—any sum you please—if, indeed, you have any cash about you," resumed the Rigger in his bantering tone.

"I should certainly win it," I replied, "but it would be the devil's money, and I would not touch it, if it were multiplied a thousand fold."

"The gentleman is excusable because he has no money," persisted the Rigger. "If any other gentleman is more fortunate, he has a chance to win a pound or two,"—again shifting the cups, one of which was immediately lifted slyly by the first loser, who stood on the extreme right.

"O do, sir, do loan me two pounds on this watch; it is an excellent lever for which I paid six guineas," entreated loser No. 2, addressing me. I shook my head, whereupon he addressed my wife. "Please, madam, entreat your husband to lend me two pounds!"

"Even if desirous of success, I should not succeed," she replied. "He has said No, and in vain you ask him. Please, sir, desist from this terrible thing," she continued, greatly excited by both alarm and sympathy.

Nevertheless, he persisted in his entreaty. "I am sure of success this time, and I pledge you my honor that I will stop so soon as I win back what we have lost."

"I will wager a pound," simultaneously exclaimed Nos. 3 and 4 of the group, as they saw No. 5 reveal the little ball by lifting the cup that covered it.

They won their wager. The trial was several times repeated with an adverse result, the losers being mostly blind, (as I thought,) in making choice of the cup. Within half an hour from the commencement, every pound in possession of such as were disposed to engage in the game, passed to the purse of the Rigger. I was positive that the result would have been directly the reverse, had I taken the matter in hand.

"If there be no more funds among you," said the gamester, "we may as well adjourn." Whereupon he arose from the ground, and put the little board, cups and ball, into his pocket, with an air befitting his cold, satirical demeanor throughout, and the fleeced ones looked so chop-fallen, as the group slowly separated, that I sincerely pitied them.

At this instant, two policemen suddenly appeared in view around the corner of the rock. Stepping smartly up to them, "Is gambling allowed on these premises?" said I.

"It is not," was their reply. "Have you lost any money?"

"No, sir; I never gamble in any way," was my response; "that man has swindled several of these gentlemen out of considerable sums, by his three shells and a little ball."

The offender was immediately taken into custody, and marched off on the back track, in company with the party from No. 1 to No. 5 inclusive, (as witnesses against him, I presumed,) myself and family being left to pursue our walk alone. Meeting a citizen, from whom we had received some attention the day previously, I narrated the foregoing incidents. He laughed heartily, and assured us that the five swindled gentlemen (whom I described) were well-known confederates of the Thimble-Rigger!

We were certainly "green-horns"—exceedingly "green!"—for we had not the slightest suspicion of complicity—yet the whole arrangement was designed to defraud me! It was all plain enough, afterwards, and I am willing to be laughed at—nevertheless, I must insist that the acting of these confederates was among the most natural exhibitions I have ever witnessed. Nothing but steadfast adherence to principle, saved me from sin, loss and shame—for I was certain, repeatedly, that I knew where the little ball was. I saw it, without possibility of mistake—yet any sum I might have wagered in the game, would inevitably have been lost, for the Rigger knew what he was about, and could remove the ball at pleasure, by sleight-of-hand, the dupe being not a whit the wiser.

The lesson of this recital will, I trust, be of service. Let no one yield to gambling of any sort. Even when fairly conducted, the chances are with the professional gamester; to which may be added that cheating is not peculiar to the Thimble-Rigger.

THE VALLEY OF THE GREAT SALT LAKE.

[From the London Athenæum we take the following notice of Capt. Stanbury's "Expedition to the Great Salt Lake," recently published by Lippincott, Grambo & Co. of this city. The article is made up mainly of extracts from the work, judiciously taken, and is exceedingly interesting:]

The existence of a vast lake of salt water somewhere amid the wilds west of the Rocky Mountains has been known since 1689; when Baron La Hontan wrote an account—which, however, seems to have been as much indebted to imagination as to observation—of his discoveries in that region. Some attempts have since that time been made to explore its shores; but Capt. Stansbury's party are the first white men that have made the circuit of its waters. The results of the Captain's observations, which were carried on with much skill and immense labor, make the circumference of the lake, exclusive of off-sets, to be 291 miles. The neighborhood around is on the same gigantic scale—consisting of deserts 60 and 70 miles across, separated from each other by precipitous rocky eminences of great elevation. Many of these deserts Capt. Stansbury says would furnish extended plains, absolutely level, upon which a degree of the meridian could be measured to great advantage.

This inland sea is believed by Capt. Stansbury to have been in a past age of infinitely greater extent. He says:—

"Upon the slope of a ridge connected with this plain, thirteen distinct successive benches, or water-marks, were counted, which had evidently, at one time, been washed by the lake, and must have been the result of its action continued for some time at each level. The highest of these is now about two hundred feet above the valley, which has itself been left by the lake, owing probably to gradual elevation occasioned by subterranean causes. If this supposition be correct—and all appearances conspire to support it—there must have been here at some former period a vast inland sea, extending for hundreds of miles; and the isolated mountains which now tower from the flats, forming its western and southwestern shores, were doubtless huge islands similar to those which now rise from the diminished waters of the lake.”

The first view that the party obtained of this extraordinary lake is as well described in the following words:—

“At our feet and on each side lay the waters of the Great Salt Lake, which we had so long and so ardently desired to see. They were clear and calm, and stretched far to the south and west. Directly before us, and distant only a few miles, an island rose from 800 to 1,000 feet in height, while in the distance other and larger ones shot up from the bosom of the waters, their summits appearing to reach the clouds. On the west appeared several dark spots, resembling other islands; but the dreamy haze hovering over this still and solitary sea, threw its dim, uncertain veil over the more distant features of the landscape, preventing the eye from discerning any one object with distinctness, while it half revealed the whole, leaving ample scope for the imagination of the beholder. The stillness of the grave seemed to pervade both air and water; and, excepting here and there a solitary wild-duck floating motionless on the bosom of the lake, not a living thing was to be seen. The night proved perfectly serene, and a young moon shed its tremulous light upon a sea of profound, unbroken silence. I was surprised to find, although so near a body of the saltiest water, none of that feeling of invigorating freshness which is always experienced when in the vicinity of the ocean. The bleak and naked shores, without a single tree to relieve the eye, presented a scene so different from what I had pictured in my imagination of the beauties of this far-famed spot, that my disappointment was extreme.”

This intimate repose is broken at times by the presence of myriads of wild fowl:—

“The Salt Lake, which lay about half a mile to the eastward, was covered by immense flocks of wild geese and ducks, among which many swans were seen, being distinguishable by their size and the whiteness of their plumage. I had seen large flocks of these birds before, in various parts of our country, and especially upon the Potomac, but never did I behold anything like the immense numbers here congregated together. Thousands of acres, as far as the eye could reach, seemed literally covered with them, presenting a scene of busy, animated cheerfulness, in most graceful contrast with the dreary, silent solitude by which we were immediately surrounded.”

The water is described as one of the purest and most concentrated brines known in the world,—clear and transparent as the diamond; and on analysis it was found to contain twenty per cent. of pure chloride of sodium, with about two per cent. of other salts. Of course such a compound must possess an extraordinary buoyant property; and Capt. Stanbury thus relates his bathing experiences:—

“No one, without witnessing it, can form any idea of the buoyant properties of this singular water. A man may float, stretched at full length, upon his back, having his head and neck, both his legs to the knee, and both arms to the elbow, entirely out of water. If a sitting position be assumed, with the arms extended to preserve the equilibrium, the shoulders will remain above the surface. The water is nevertheless extremely difficult to swim in, on account of the constant tendency of the lower extremities to rise above it. The brine, too, is so strong, that the least particle of it getting into the eyes produces the most acute pain; and if accidentally swallowed, rapid strangulation must ensue. I doubt whether the most expert swimmer could long preserve himself from drowning, if exposed to the action of a rough sea.”

In many places in the vicinity of this singular lake, the ground is thickly covered with salt, presenting a most curious and deceptive appearance:—

“The first part of the plain consisted simply of dried mud, with small crystals of salt scattered thickly over the surface. Crossing this, we came upon another portion of it, three miles in width, where the ground was entirely covered with a thin layer of salt in a state of deliquescence, and of so soft a consistence that the feet of our mules sank at every step into the mud beneath. But we soon came upon a portion of the plain where the salt lay in a solid state, in one unbroken sheet, extending apparently to its western border. So firm and strong was this unique and snowy floor, that it sustained the weight of our entire train, without in the least giving way or cracking beneath the pressure. Our mules walked upon it as upon a sheet of solid ice. The whole field was crossed by a net-work of little ridges, projecting about half an inch, as if the salt had expanded in the process of crystallization. I estimated this field to be at least seven miles wide and ten miles in length. How much farther it extended northward I could not tell; but if it covered the plain in that direction as it did where we crossed, its extent must have been very much greater. The salt, which was very pure and white, averaged from one-half to three-fourths of an inch in thickness, and was equal in all respects to our finest specimens for table use. Assuming these data, the quantity that here lay upon the ground in one body, exclusive of that in a deliquescent state, amounted to over four and a half millions of cubic yards, or about one hundred millions of bushels.”

Amongst the other peculiarities of this region, we are informed that the excessive dryness of the air caused the wood-work of the wagon wheels to shrink so much that there was great danger of their falling asunder, and it was only by sinking them in a stream during the night that the Expedition was enabled to proceed with them. From the same cause, the wood-work of the mathematical instruments was rent and split, in some cases breaking the tubes, and otherwise causing serious damage. The mirage on the shore of the Lake where the ground was moist and oozy was very great, and gave rise to optical illusions the most grotesque and fantastic.

The difficulties which the party had to encounter were very great—so that the journey from Fort Leavenworth, on the Missouri, a distance of less than 1200 miles, occupied the Expedition about twelve weeks. But the obstacles in the road to the Salt Lake dwindled into insignificance when compared with the difficulties in its immediate vicinity. In one place, Capt. Stansbury says:—

“At two o'clock, in the afternoon, we reached the western edge of the plain, when to our infinite joy we beheld a small prairie or meadow, covered with a profusion of good, green grass, through which meandered a small stream of pure, fresh, running water, among clumps of willows and wild roses, artemisia and rushes. It was a most timely and welcome relief to our poor, famished animals, who had now been deprived of almost all sustenance for more than sixty hours, during the greater part of which time they had been in constant motion. It was, indeed, nearly as great a relief to me as to them, for I had been doubtful whether even the best mule we had could have gone more than half a dozen miles further. Several of them had given out in crossing the last plain, and we had to leave them and the baggage behind, and to return for it afterward. Another day without water, and the whole train must have inevitably perished. Both man and beast being completely exhausted. I remained here three days for refreshment and rest. Moreover, we were now to prepare for crossing another desert of seventy miles, which, as my guide informed me, still lay between us and the southern end of the lake. He had passed over it in 1845, with Fremont, who had lost ten mules and several horses in effecting the passage, having afterward encamped on the same ground now occupied by our little party.”

The importance of the exploration so gallantly conducted by Capt. Stansbury is indicated by the fact, that the Valley of the Great Salt Lake is the only point between the Missouri and the Pacific Ocean whence supplies of provisions can be procured,—and it is of the utmost consequence, therefore, that it should be considered in any scheme for a road across this vast continent to California.

The number of emigrants to the “Diggings” had been so great, that Capt. Stansbury described the road as being as broad and well beaten as any turnpike road in the country; but the dangers and difficulties which the emigrants have to encounter from the want of bridges or ferries,—and more especially from the terrible scarcity of water, which causes hundreds of cattle to die on the road, thus forcing the emigrants to abandon nearly all that they possess, glad to escape with their own lives,—are numerous and terrible in the extreme.

The evidences of these sufferings meet the traveller's eye all along the route,—but especially as he approaches the district of the Great Salt Lake. The road is strewn with the carcasses of horses and cattle which have fallen exhausted from fatigue and thirst or poisoned by the saline springs,—dozens of wagons lie on the road in heaps, burnt, disabled, or abandoned,—hundreds of pounds of bacon and other provisions, thrown away from the failure of the means of transport,—and with these lie in confused abandonment almost every article of household furniture and every sort of cooking utensil that can be imagined. For hundreds of miles the prairie is covered with excellent clothing, harness, ploughs, miners', blacksmiths' and carpenters' tools of every possible variety,—together with bar iron, steel, and other materials of industry, excellent scientific instruments and books of every description, collected doubtless with much labor and great sacrifice, and carried with infinite trouble and anxiety a distance of perhaps 2,000 miles, to be at last left to rot on the road through this terrible and extraordinary country. No wonder, then, that a vast number of those who set out full of health and vigor either terminate their hopes and fears in these dreary solitudes, or retrace their steps with sad hearts and shattered frames.

Capt. Stansbury's party frequently passed from four to six graves of emigrants in a day,—many of them recently made,—nameless but sad mementoes of disappointed hopes and sanguine enterprise. Scarcely a day passed in which they did not meet some party of emigrants returning in wretched plight,—all that they possessed sold, given away, or abandoned. Some of the men attached to this Expedition disgraced themselves by abandoning it for the land of promised gold. One party of these, as the Captain afterwards heard, were stripped by the Indians of every article they possessed, and were left to find their way to California in the most miserable plight.

An amusing instance is here recorded of the way in which an ingenious emigrant met a difficulty. Having a number of kegs of brandy, which he was compelled to leave in the prairie, he buried his cherished cordial in the earth, covered it like a grave, and placed at the head a full and particular, if not true, account of the deceased,—his name, age, where he was “raised,” and when he fell, being set forth in remarkably distinct characters. Further on, he sold the brandy to some traders, who easily found the affecting memorial, and drew the spirit from its repose.

We have often heard curious anecdotes of the prairie dog; but none more strange than those related by Capt. Stansbury, which from the evidently cautious character of the narrator demand attention. He says that the holes in the ground in which these little creatures live are shared by the rattlesnake—several instances of which came under the observation of the party. But what is still more extraordinary, we are told, that a little, white, burrowing owl (Stryx cucularia) is also frequently found taking up its abode in the same domicile; and this strange association of reptile, bird and beast seem to live together in perfect harmony and peace. The Captain does not give this latter fact on his personal voucher;—but says that he has been assured of it from so many, so various, and such credible sources, that he could not doubt it.

On its way home the Expedition succeeded in striking out a shorter route through the chain of the Rocky Mountains; making a saving of 61 miles in the road from the Great Salt Lake to Fort Bridger, on the Green River,—a distance of about 400 miles. The newly-discovered road has also the great advantage of being very nearly in a perfectly straight line.

INVENTION OF THE SPINNING JENNY.

A late number of Hogg's Instructor, in giving the history of the Peel family, introduces an episode relative to the invention of the "spinning jenny" by a Lancashire weaver, named James Hargreaves, a neighbor and associate of the grandfather of the late Sir Robert Peel, which is exceedingly interesting. Hargreaves was a hard-working and industrious man. His wife Jenny was at the time confined to her bed by illness, though, when well, she materially assisted him in his labors, and was reckoned such an extraordinary spinner for diligence and speed that people called her "Spinning Jenny." At about the same period, the elder Peel had obtained through one Harry Garland, a wild young "chapman," information upon which he commenced his first essays in calico printing; and late on the evening the occurrence detailed below took place. One of his sons—the father of the late baronet—went out to the moor in the moonlight to gather a handful of bilberry leaves, or other foliage, which might be copied as a design for printing. Passing near the house of Hargreaves, he saw a light in the window, and a shadow moving. He halted a moment, and that moment revealed enough to detain him half an hour. What he saw will be comprehended by a perusal of the following extract, the opening scene of which is located at a public house in the neighborhood, whither Hargreaves had accompanied Harry Garland, the young chapman before referred to:

They joined the chapman from Blackburn, and were soon in a merry mood. Joe Pilkington was ready with a song at any time. Perhaps they would have sat later than the usually sober hours of James Hargreaves, had not an incident occurred which disconcerted Garland, and suggested to Hargreaves to go home. Harry seated himself beside Charlotte Marsden, where she was spinning at the farther end of the spacious kitchen. In this apartment the company were assembled. Some who knew the lofty spirit of the beautiful Charlotte, offered to wager with Garland that he could not kiss her. The forward youth attempted the rash act without hesitation, upon which she called him an impudent moth, and, rising indignantly, over-turned her spinning wheel. It fell backward. The spindle, which before had been horizontal, the point towards the maiden's left hand, stood upright. The wheel, which had been upright, and turned by her right hand, (its band turning the spindle,) was now horizontal. It continued to revolve in that position, and to turn the spindle. In a moment, a thought—an inspiration of thought—fixed the eyes of Hargreaves upon it. Garland pursued the indignant Charlotte out of the apartment. The company followed, urging him to the renewal of his rudeness, which, the more he tried to succeed in, the more he seemed to be baffled and humiliated. In their absence, James Hargreaves turned the wheel with his right hand, it still lying as it fell, and, drawing the roving of cotton with his left, saw that the spindle made as good a thread standing vertically as it had done horizontally. "Then why," this inspiration of thought suggested, "should not many spindles, all standing upright, all moved by a band crossing them from the wheel, like this single spindle, each with a bobbin on it, and a roving of cotton attached, and something like the finger and thumb, which now take hold of the one roving, to lay hold of them all, and draw them backwards from the spindles into attenuated threads? Why should not many spindles be moved, and threads be spun, by the same wheel and band which now spin only one!"

Hearing the company return, some saying the young chapman had succeeded in snatching a kiss from Charlotte, others denying it, James Hargreaves lifted the wheel to its feet, placed the roving in its right place, and said—"Sit thee down, Charlotte. Let him see thee spin. Who can tell what may come of this?" Then, after a pause, and a reflection that he should retain his new ideas as secrets of his own, at present, he continued—"Thou may be his wife: more unlikely things have happened. It will be a fine thing to be lady of all that owed Billy Garland may leave some day."

"Wife, indeed!" interjected the vexed maiden, "the moth! Wife, indeed! Who would be wife to it?"

"Weel," said James, "be that as it may; but I mun go whoam. My wife thinks whoam the best place for me, and I think so mysen."

Remarks were made as to why he was going so soon. But Harry Garland had lost spirit after the conflict, and felt the scorn of the maiden more keenly than any reproof which had ever fallen upon his impudence before. He was not in a humor to solicit James Hargreaves to remain; so they parted.

James had reached home two or three hours before young Robert Peel observed the light in his window. On the lad approaching the window, the weaver was standing motionless. Suddenly, he dropped upon his knees, and rolled on the stone floor, at full length. He lay with his face towards the floor, and made lines and circles with the end of a burned stick. He rose, and went to the fire to burn his stick. He took hold of his bristly hair with one hand, and rubbed his forehead and nose with the other and the blackened stick. Then he sat upon a chair, and placed his head between his hands, his elbows on his knees, and gazed intently on the floor. Then he sprang to his feet, and replied to some feeble question of his wife (who had not risen since the day she gave birth to a little stranger), by a loud assurance that he had it; and, taking her in his sturdy arms, in the blankets, the baby in her arms, he lifted her out, and held her over the black drawings on the floor. These he explained, and she joined a small, hopeful, happy laugh with his high-toned assurance, that she should never again toil at the spinning-wheel!—that he would never again "play," and have his loom standing for want of weft. She asked some questions, which he answered, after seating her in the arm-chair, by laying her spinning-wheel on its back, the horizontal spindle standing vertically, while he made the wheel revolve, and drew a roving of cotton from the spindle into an attenuated thread. Then he took her in his arms, and returned her and the baby to bed, and kissed her affectionately, and once more took the baby out, and made it cry with his hard beard. "Our fortune is made when that is made," he said, speaking of his drawings on the floor.

"What will you call it?" asked his wife.

"Call it? What an we call it after thyself, Jenny! They called thee 'Spinning Jenny,' afore I had thee, because thou beat every lass in Staneshill Moor at the wheel. What if we call it 'Spinning Jenny?'"

It was all a mystery to Robert Peel. He went home with his bilberry leaves, and went to bed, wondering if Hargreaves were out of his mind, or if he, too, were inventing some thing, or about to make experiments in some new process of working.

A SCENE FROM REAL LIFE.

BY MRS. ALICE ATKINSON.

"My wife feels as though she were laboring very hard for the benefit of others."

This was spoken by a man who considered himself a good husband: but if he had been one in reality, would his wife have been troubled with such feelings?

Let us consider the subject, and take an occurrence from every-day life, to illustrate it.

Mr. B—— arises in the morning with the intention of going to the city, a distance of twenty miles, and back the same day. In his haste to be gone, he does not observe that his wife is paler than usual. Her health has been poor for a long time, and her altered appearance now, is not even noticed. Although they are in comfortable circumstances, yet neither feel able to keep hired help. As the husband loves neatness and order, for which the wife is remarkable, the latter determines that her washing shall be done in his absence. But many things arise to hinder—the wood is poor and will not burn—the babe requires more care than usual. The sun has passed the meridian and is hastening on his daily course; but her work is not half done. She toils on with an energy beyond her strength, hoping all will yet be well. She pictures to herself the children quietly sleeping in their snug little bed, the floor mopped, the fire bright and cheerful, the table spread with its snowy cloth, and her husband's favorite dish prepared, ere his return.

But, alas! bright anticipations vanish; the day is past, and "evening shades appear;" the babe becomes more troublesome and now takes all the mother's time. She has nearly succeeded in quieting it, when she hears the well-known step on the threshold; her husband enters; he sees the unfinished washing with all its accompaniments of tubs and pails; the fire is nearly gone out, and his little boy, two years old, is splashing water from one thing to another, in great glee. Mr. B—— seizes the child, and places him in a chair in the corner, with so much violence that the room quickly resounds with his screams. He then whips him to still his cries, that his own voice may be heard. Every blow pierces the mother's heart, but she knows remonstrance is vain, and lets things take their course, in silence.

Her turn comes next, and he can hardly find words strong enough to express his indignation; among many other things, he tells her she never has any thing in order; he never knew her to have a fire, or a meal of victuals in season.

By this time, the babe was fairly aroused, and it needed considerable exertion to hush its plaintive cries, but by carrying it about in her arms, the mother was at last triumphant.

She next prepared their evening meal with as much alacrity as exhausted nature would allow; and, as her husband sipped his tea, and enjoyed the genial warmth of the fire, the irritability of his temper passed off, and with it all thoughts of the late unhappy occurrence. He soon retired to rest, and, in refreshing sleep, forgot the toils of the day. His wife had now her washing to finish, and every thing to put in its place, even to her husband's bootjack; for, with all his love of order, he frequently forget to put up his own things. When she had accomplished all, she too retired to rest, but not to sleep—no; every nerve was unstrung; and, as she laid her throbbing head on its pillow, and vainly attempted to sleep, the events of the day would crowd themselves into her mind. Yet she would not allow herself to think unkindly of her husband. She tried to reason thus—"Have I not a good husband? Does he not provide for my actual wants, according to the best of his ability?"

But, notwithstanding all her endeavors, the cruel words which had been uttered by him in wrath, would rush into her mind, like unbidden guests, until tears began to flow in profusion, and memory became busy. Then she thought of the happy home of her girlhood, of the mother that watched over her, of the days when the rose of health bloomed on her cheek, and her brow was unclouded by care. But, most of all, her memory reverted to the bridal day, when her lover promised, in presence of God and man, to love, cherish and protect, until death should them part. She asked herself if she had ever been unfaithful to the marriage vow; conscience answered no; had she not studied her husband's happiness with untiring zeal, until self was all forgotten, health gone, constitution enfeebled? And, now, as she felt herself less able to perform the duties required of her, she felt that her love had been illy repaid. Thus, after a day of overtasked labor, and nearly a night spent in tears, the wife sunk into an uneasy slumber, to be disturbed at intervals by her babe, until the dawn of another day, when the well-rested husband called upon his wife to arise, not doubting but she was as much refreshed as himself.

Now, what had that husband gained by all this? Had not his wife done her best, and what could she do more? It is true, he knew not of her grief and tears; he knew not that such treatment was hastening her to the grave; as she daily sunk under the accumulated weight of care, he knew not that the cause was in any way attributable to himself.

Yet, it would have required but little forbearance on his part to have spoken a kind word, or sympathized with her a little. She would then have performed the same duties with cheerfulness, and considered herself happy in the possession of such a husband. And when her head rested on its pillow, and she strove to hush its throbbings, no images but such as affection brings would have haunted her imagination; and her slumbers would soon have been as calm as those of the loved ones beside her.

If any man, who has a care-worn wife, chance to read this article, let him look well to the subject; and, if he wishes to be met with a smile or look of happiness, let him strive by his own example, to sow the good seeds of affection, and he will be sure to reap an abundant harvest, for "virtue is its own reward."

THE ENDS OF LIFE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I am going to leave school at the expiration of this term," remarked Edward Mayo, a youth between seventeen and eighteen, to his friend and companion, Charles Carpenter, as the two were wending their way homeward, after having finished their studies for the day.

"And I expect to do the same very soon," said Charles, with evident pleasure at the idea.

"What business or profession do you intend learning?" asked Edward.

"I have determined to go into a store. I want to be a merchant. But what have you chosen, Edward? Not one of the learned professions, I hope? But I suppose you have. You will be a lawyer, I have not the least doubt."

"Yes, Charles, I have determined to go into Mr. Barker's office, and read law."

"Well, I'm sorry to hear it, Edward."

"Why are you sorry, Charles?"

"Because you've got a hard, dull way before you, and your final success is uncertain. Few, Edward, I have heard my old uncle say, can gain eminence in legal pursuits; and without distinction, it is but a poor business. The field for merchandizing is broader, and promises to industry and carefulness more certain returns."

"That may be true, Charles; and merchandizing is as honorable and useful a calling as any other; but I have been taught by my father to believe that our success and usefulness in any business will depend very much upon the motives with which we enter into it, and our happiness in that business much more. If we have only a regard to ourselves—if the only motive we have for choosing a profession be the selfish one of getting wealth or honor—then, we may indeed be successful, but cannot be happy in our success. But if, in choosing among those to which our inclinations lead us, we choose that in which we think we can, at the same time that we benefit ourselves, render most important services to others, then we are in the road to honorable success, united to calm contentment."

"Then I would advise you to be a minister," said Charles, half ironically—"you can certainly do more good as a minister than as a lawyer."

"I do not think so," Edward replied. "There are callings many and various that are all useful, as my father has frequently impressed upon my mind, while talking to me about choosing a profession; and there are as great varieties of capacities for filling these. The man whose peculiarity of mind fits him to be a successful lawyer, would not, in all probability, make a good minister; nor would the individual who has a preference for medical science make a good merchant; and so through all the varied callings in life. Each of them is useful and honorable, as I have before said, if they are made useful and honorable."

"Well, maybe you are right," said Charles, "but I am no philosopher, and cannot pretend to look so deeply in matters and things. My old uncle, whose opinions I am bound to respect, because he is kind to me, and has been quite successful in the world, says that he would rather see me a sailor or a soldier than a doctor, lawyer, or preacher. He don't seem to have much opinion, you see, of the learned professions; and I am pretty much like him in that respect. But he thinks I am the very one for trade, in which, he says, I will be sure to be successful, if I am only prudent at first. He prophesies that I will be rich; and all I can say is, that I hope he is a true prophet."

"Father says to me," Edward remarked to this, "that it would be wrong in me to set riches before me as an end. That if I do so, I will look to riches as the one thing in life desirable—that I will be restless until I have gained my end, and then discover that wealth has no power to make me happy. But, that if I will endeavor to give the idea of riches its true subordinate place, and make usefulness to others, as far as I can, the end which I have in view, then I will be happy as well as successful, just so far as I can elevate usefulness as an end above riches."

"You have a strange way of talking, sometimes," said Charles, "but I don't pretend to see things with your eyes, and I am sure I don't wish to. I am going to learn my business, with the same motives that others do, that I may get the ability to make money. Money, you know, is power. Our teacher says knowledge, and so does the proverb: but my old uncle says money, and I believe him."

The two boys parted. In due time each left school, and Charles Carpenter went into a wholesale store to learn the business of merchandizing, while Edward Mayo entered the office of Mr. Barker to read law. Charles found it much easier to keep his end of life in view, than did Edward. But whenever the latter's perceptions of right were obscured, or his ardor in his studies diminished, he went to the one competent and judicious friend, his father, who always helped him to clear and satisfactory views of his duty. It must not be supposed, that the desire to be useful was the only one that influenced Edward in persevering in his studies. That would have been too feeble a principle in his mind, to have carried him through successfully. The desire for wealth and fame, also, contributed its share of incitement to perseverance. Still, the great good was, that he could acknowledge the end of use to be a higher and better one than the end of riches or honor, and, also, that he could remain in the desire to have that end the principal one. He was thus preparing the way to have it, in after-life, gradually, even if it were very slowly, elevated above all the others.

A few years passed away, and the two youths became of age, and each entered upon the responsible duties of life. Charles had his mind well stored with mercantile knowledge, and the principles of trade; and Edward was as well-furnished for action in his peculiar calling. Years passed on, and the name of one was a familiar sound on 'Change, and that of the other as familiar to the public as an eminent lawyer. But each had been governed in action, by the end at first proposed as the true one. Charles Carpenter had grown more and more selfish and unregardful of others, as wealth accumulated on his hands; and had likewise grown morose, irritable, and discontented. Edward Mayo, on the contrary, as his power and sphere of usefulness enlarged, endeavored to bring into quicker activity the desire to be of service to others with which he had, as matter of principle, set out in life; and a real delight ever flowed from bringing this desire into action. While the one was known as a wealthy, but narrow-minded, selfish man, the other was esteemed as a lover of mankind, with the power, as well as the will, to benefit society. Let us look in upon each, successively, at the age of fifty, and then decide which set before him the best end in life.

We will introduce Mr. Carpenter, at his own house, on a stormy evening in December. Tea is ready, and his wife and only daughter, a young lady of twenty, with himself, have drawn up to the table. The meal is nearly half through, and yet not a word has been spoken. He is all absorbed in some business matter that perplexes him, and the idea of a trifling loss has soured his mind, and added to his habitual petulance.

"It's a dreadful night, out," Alice, the daughter says; the oppressive and moody silence becoming so irksome, that she prefers to hear the sound of her own voice, even at the risk of its being unwelcome to others.

The father responds to this by a look which says, almost as plain as words—

"What's the matter with you, ha?" And the mother mutters out a reluctant—"Yes."

A few minutes more elapse, with only the clatter of cups and saucers, when Alice again breaks in upon the funeral silence with—

"I wish you would take us to the theatre, on Thursday evening, to see Celeste, pa."

"Indeed, I shall not, then," is the crusty response. "Get your brother to go with you."

"But, he won't go. I've asked him, already."

"Then you'll have to stay home, for I'm not going."

"I wish you were like Kate Mayo's father," Alice rejoins—"He always goes with her to the concerts, and every place."

"Well, I'm not like him, Miss, and don't want to be! He's one of your philanthropists—hum!—pretending to do a great deal for other people, and not doing anything worth talking about, after all."

"I believe he's an excellent man, pa. Everybody likes him, and everybody speaks well of him; and I'm sure Kate's one of the happiest creatures in the world."

"And you are one of the most miserable, I suppose?"

"I don't pretend to be very happy," Alice answers moodily, and then follows the same cheerless silence.

After the tea-things were removed, the father sat down to his newspapers, and between reading these and meditating on plans for adding to his large stores of unenjoyed wealth, spent the remainder of the evening. Not the slightest intercourse did he pretend to hold with his family. The social delights of the domestic circle had no charms for him. Here, as in the busy world, he was the selfish centre from which went out no radiations. Alice tried to get interested in the pages of a new novel, but in vain. Her heart yearned for living companionship. And as she thought of Kate Mayo, and the bright, happy fireside circle of which she made one, she closed the book with a sigh, and retired to her chamber, hoping to find relief and quiet in the sweet oblivion of sleep.

On the same evening, a very different scene was presented in the family of Mr. Mayo, who, like the merchant, had one son and daughter, now verging upon maturity. The supper hour had passed in cheerful conversation, and after the family returned to the parlor, Mr. Mayo said, smiling—

"I must ask leave of absence for an hour, my children. I suppose my request will be granted?"

"I don't know, pa," Kate responded, laughing in happy, girlish tones, as she hung upon his arm, and looked affectionately into his face. "It will depend very much upon the nature of your excuse."

"That will have to be given, then, before my request can be granted?"

"O, of course! Let us have the reason," Kate said.

"Well, you know that the winter has set in very severely?"

"Indeed, it has, pa," Kate replied, her face at once growing serious. "And I do pity poor, destitute people, this dreadful night."

"A few gentlemen," continued Mr. Mayo, "had a meeting, to-day, for the purpose of putting in operation some measure of provision for the poor and sick during the inclement season. It is well known that every winter great suffering is experienced by many who do all they can to help themselves, and who would rather live poorly and bear many hardships, than become an entire burden upon the community; who would suffer almost everything, rather than become acknowledged paupers. A little assistance to such, in winter, would enable them to bear up in their praiseworthy spirit of independence, without the extreme suffering that many now endure. I have been chosen to draft an address to the public, and I want an hour to-night for the purpose. Am I now excused?" added the father, smiling.

"We were worse than heathens to say no," Kate replied. "But how much time you do give to measures of public benevolence, pa!"

"Not more than I can readily spare from my family and professional engagements, Kate; and I am sure that the pleasure I experience from these acts, is to me a source of pure delight."

"I do not doubt it, pa, and I love my father better, when I think how good and kind he is to every one. Alice Carpenter said to me, yesterday—'O, Kate, if my father was like yours, how happy I should be!'"

Mr. Mayo kissed affectionately the cheek of his daughter, and then left the room to perform the work of benevolence he had assigned himself.

"Poor Alice!" remarked Mrs. Mayo, as her husband closed the door after him. "She always seems so glad to get here, and so reluctant to go away."

"I am sure I never like to go there," said Kate. "There is an atmosphere of constraint and selfishness about the house; and as to spending an evening with Alice when her father is at home, I would almost as lief be at a funeral. He sits moodily reading his newspapers, and we must steal away into a corner, and talk in whispers. If Alice happens to laugh a little loud, her father will rattle his newspaper and look up so cross at her. I would not live in that way for the world!"

"I don't wonder that John has no inclination to stay at home in the evening," remarked Edward, Kate's brother. "He told me, last week, that he wasn't home at night once in a month."

"Why, where does he go?" asked Kate.

"Indeed, that's more than I can tell," Edward replied. "But I fear, from his appearance and manners, that his company is not the best."

"Poor fellow!" ejaculated Mrs. Mayo. "Almost driven from home, and then left to himself, he will, I fear, go to ruin."

"You may well say driven, ma," remarked Kate. "For no young man, who had the liberty to go, could remain in Mr. Carpenter's presence, if he is always as silent and cross as he has been when I have visited there."

"He is in every way unlike our own father," said Edward. "One seems to think about and care about nothing but himself. The other's consideration is, apparently, all for others."

"That is the true secret of their great difference of disposition. The selfish man repulses all, while the benevolent man attracts all. Which would you rather be, my son?"

"The benevolent man, a thousand and a thousand times," Edward replied, fervently.

"Then, like your father, Edward, choose now your ends of life. Resolve that you will seek to be useful to others; that you will put away from yourself every merely selfish motive, as an evil thing. I have heard him often relate, how Mr. Carpenter and he were boys at school, and how they conversed about, and settled their ends of life. Mr. Carpenter, he said, openly avowed, that, in entering upon the task of learning a business, he had no other motive, and wished no other, but the desire to be wealthy, that he might be happy in the possession of wealth; while your father, guided by the excellent counsel of your grandfather, long since passed away, chose a profession, such as suited his taste and talents, fixing in his mind, as far as possible, the desire to be useful. This desire, feeble, he said, at first, he nourished and fostered, until it gradually gained strength, and, in the end, became with him a ruling motive. Now, he is not only happy himself, but makes every one with whom he associates cheerful and happy."

"I am sure you will try to be like father, Edward," said Kate, looking her brother affectionately in the face.

"That I will, sister; and if at any time I find my resolutions, and the power within me failing, I will think of Mr. Carpenter, with his ends of life, and of my father with his."

HOW THE ARKANSAS MAN FOUGHT THE PANTHER.

Samuel Hutson, one of the first settlers on Hutson's Fork, of Buffalo, in Newton county, Ark., a worthy and industrious farmer, with his son Carroll, a lad of ten years, inured to all the hardships which his father underwent, was making his way up the pathless sides of Judah, whose broad shadow darkened the dense forest on its northern slope; and although it was near ten o'clock, A. M., (1845) the labyrinthine vines were yet dripping with the dew, in its dark defiles. The piles of rugged rocks torn loose from the cliffs above by the force of their own gravitation, or the trembling of the earth in ages past, were not obstacles worthy of note to Sam or his son; now wending their way around a bluff of grey limestone—the face of which is swept by the branches of the towering sycamore and the hardy white oak—till they came to an open spur or point, where Hutson showed his son the location of a bee-hive which they had come to note. Carroll deposited the pails, pans, &c., at a little distance, while his father's axe had already begun to make deep incisions in the noble pine.

Hutson is neither large nor very stout; yet, if you will look attentively into his somewhat swarthy face, you will perceive that he is a man for all emergencies.

He had settled at his present homestead, ten years previous—poor, very poor. But by energy and industry he has placed his family in independent circumstances;—it is said now that he is the wealthiest man in Newton county. He loves his early habits, and at each returning autumn, for several consecutive nights, builds his camp-fires on the mountains, and, after an absence of perhaps a week, returns loaded with the triumph of the chase.

But see! the tall pine totters to and fro—the trembling tree is breaking from the stump—a deafening crash, and the ancient forest monarch plunges on the rocks below!

Hutson had dropped his axe, and run a short distance to get clear of the falling limbs, when he saw a large animal a little way off bounding towards him, which he at first supposed to be a deer; but in a moment more, to his dismay, he saw it to be a large panther, and knew from its actions that it was hungry as a hyena, for it made directly at him, with its hair all projecting forward; its glaring eyes and fearful jaws extended, revealing a row of teeth that makes one shudder to think of. What was to be done? Sam did not want that monster to make a breakfast of him. Retreat was in vain. What would you have done?

With the nerve of a Jackson, Sam met his antagonist in the unequal contest.

He seized the beast by the skin of the neck with his left hand, and plied him heavily in the ribs with his right. Round and round they went in the struggle for life and death—life to the victor, but death to the vanquished. At length the panther made a spring to escape. But, no! Sam's ire was up now.

"Oh, ho! your wh-wh-whipped, are you!" he stammered, and he plied him with renewed vigor. Mr. Panther had never been in such a scrape before, (neither had Sam) for the skin of his neck was drawn so tight that he only got his breath with a whiz, and every stroke in the side was answered by a grunt of pain from the panther, and a grunt of exertion from Sam. The animal sunk on his side, and Sam shouted, "Carroll!" The boy sprang to him with the butcher knife, which was plunged into the heart of the beast. Sam was badly scratched; yet he was glad he had got off so well, and never complained at the loss of his shirt.

Mr. PARTHENON, 1862.

POWER MACHINES A BENEFIT TO OPERATIVES.

When spinning jennies and power looms were first introduced into England, nothing would do with the outraged and insulted spinsters and weavers, but pulling down the factories and the breaking the machines. This was a very foolish operation, but the machine-destructives thought it was a very wise one; they, no doubt, imagined they had slain their greatest enemy. Poor short-sighted mortals! how much they resembled Don Quixotte battling with the wind mill! We do not say but the hand-spinners and hand-loom weavers of old enjoyed more of the comforts of life than they do now, and perhaps enjoyed the world with a more hearty relish, but this we do know, that those power machines which have superseded severe human toil, have greatly benefited the very operatives who were ruthlessly opposed to their introduction. Gilbert Burns, the brother of the great poet, though not a poet himself, was a shrewd man, possessed of a sound head, and who had labored severely as a farmer, declared that the invention of the threshing machine was one of the greatest blessings ever conferred upon mankind. The terrible drudgery of the flail was as the life of a helot to him; he became a free man when the threshing machine was invented. There is the machine for planing wood, too; its introduction was violently opposed by carpenters,—their occupation, like Othello's, was gone, and nothing would suit many of them but smashing up the planers. But are there any carpenters in our country, now, who do not look upon this machine as a blessing? It was their emancipation; it relieved them from a toil which, at best, is gross drudgery. The trip-hammer, too, although a very simple innovation, was also looked upon with exceedingly jealous eyes, by the performers of heavy tragedy at the anvil; but what would we have done for the heavy shafting of our steamboats, had those tragedians still monopolized the stage of the stithy? We might go on and enumerate a great number of machines, and recount the benefits which they have conferred upon the operative classes; but we have said enough to direct attention to the point which we wish to elucidate, and the doctrine which we wish to enforce. We are the advocates of all new and useful improvements in machinery, and we are the disseminators of information respecting new inventions and discoveries—this is our business; if we did not believe that machinery conferred blessings and benefits upon mankind, we could not conscientiously follow after such a profession. We believe that machinery has done wonders for the elevation of our race, and we also believe that it has but begun to fulfil its mission; our heart and soul, therefore, is with this work of improvements in machinery.

Some people have extolled the blessings of machinery, for allowing more time for mental development; this is one benefit it has conferred upon mankind, but far be it from us to speak favorably of machinery on this account merely. Laziness is a vice, and a lazy, idle man, should not eat; every man and woman should do something for themselves. There are too many men and women who kill themselves with idleness. There are thousands in our cities who are not under the necessity of working to procure daily bread, who, nevertheless, for their own health and pleasure, should labor, or take active exercise in the open air every day. On the other hand, there are thousands who drudge away at unhealthy occupations, wearing out soul and body to win their daily bread. Improvements in machinery will benefit this latter class, and improve their condition. Improvements in machinery for the rapid and cheap construction, manufacture, and execution of domestic utensils, goods, and labor, are the very things on which the attention of philanthropic inventors should be fixed. "They were good old days," say the old folks at home, "when all things were made for the family on the plantation and farm. Our clothes were not so fine, but nobody wanted; there was less pride and more contentment." There is much truth in this, and we are far from believing that large factories, and congregated hundreds laboring together in pent up workshops, is a higher development of humanity; we believe that, in the majority of cases, it is the very reverse,—men and women have become the servants of machinery, instead of machinery having become their servants. Can we not look to a future of better things? We can at least point to the road which will lead to it; this is our present object. Sewing machines, simple and cheap machines for making boots and shoes, great improvements in small carding and spinning machines, and weaving looms, together with other machines for doing different kinds of domestic labor, would conduce to a greater elevation of our race; this is the climax of our remarks—improvements in machinery for the benefit of the toilers.

JUDGING FROM APPEARANCES.

BY MRS. S. P. DOUGHTY.

"I am glad to see that you have succeeded in finding a new cook," said Mr. Campbell to his wife, as he caught a glimpse of a pleasant, active-looking woman moving about the kitchen. "Does she come well recommended?"

"You will laugh at me, Henry, when I tell you that she does not come recommended at all. She is a stranger in this part of the country, and has never lived out before. Therefore, there is no one to recommend her. But her appearance is so much in her favor that I concluded to take her a month on trial."

"Appearances are very deceitful," replied the husband, gravely. "You should never allow your judgment to be influenced by them."

"I know that we are not to judge from appearances, Henry; but does not this rule admit of some qualification? It is surely impossible to prevent our minds from being somewhat influenced by the external circumstances which are presented to our view. In this case, for instance. A neat, modest-looking girl presents herself at the very moment when we are extremely in want of help. Her story is a simple and plausible one, and as far as I can judge, she is just such a person as we need. Am I not justified in engaging her?"

"I think not, Mary, for you have really nothing to judge from. As far as her neatness and modesty are concerned, they are easily put on for the occasion; and her story is one readily invented."

"But why suppose evil, when we can as readily suppose good?" argued the unconvinced wife. "My rule is always to think well of a person until I am furnished with unquestionable proofs of their deficiencies."

"And mine is, to hold my judgment suspended, and neither to think well or ill of any person from appearances," replied Mr. Campbell.

His wife shook her head incredulously.

"It is impossible, Henry; you cannot do it. I am sure you have often told me that you surrendered your heart the first time you ever saw me. On what could you rest your judgment, save appearances?"

"That is not a case in point, Mary; and, besides, I was young and foolish then. I am growing wiser as I advance in years. But look, the dinner waits our pleasure, and I am anxious to see if the new cook can furnish substantial proofs of her fitness for her duties."

There was certainly nothing to complain of in the well-cooked and neatly-served dinner. And, as weeks passed on, and the new domestic proved perfectly faithful and competent, Mr. Campbell allowed that in this instance, his wife's judgment had proved correct, or rather as he maintained, she had made a "lucky hit," for true to his theory, he still asserted that appearances were no guide to the judgment.

It must be confessed that this was sometimes a most convenient doctrine, for it enabled him to turn a deaf ear to the piteous tales from pitiable looking objects, by whom he was often besieged in his daily walks through the city, while his more sympathizing and credulous wife would have found it impossible to refuse relief.

But experience proved that, although credulity is a great evil, constant distrust of our fellow-beings is a still greater, as it leads us to withhold aid from the really needy and deserving, or to delay our assistance until it is too late.

One evening as the merchant was returning home at a somewhat later hour than usual, his steps were suddenly arrested by a young lad, who threw himself before him, exclaiming in a voice of earnest entreaty—

"For the love of Heaven, give me the means to procure food for my poor mother and little sisters, or they will perish with hunger."

"They always have a mother and sisters," muttered Mr. Campbell to himself, for, though by no means an uncharitable man, he was too well accustomed to this species of imposition so commonly practised in our streets, to be easily induced to bestow relief.

Shaking off the hand which the lad had laid upon his arm, he quietly said—"I have nothing for you;" and passed on. As he did so, he was forcibly struck with the expression of despair, visible in the countenance of the petitioner, and for a moment felt tempted to draw his purse from his pocket; but the good judgment upon which he prided himself prevailed; and, resolved not to be deceived by appearances of distress, which were easily assumed, he kept on his way.

Several times during the evening, the remembrance of the boy seemed to haunt him, and as he again passed the same spot on the following morning, and recalled the earnest despairing entreaty of that last look, he could not but regret the course he had taken.

"I wish I had given him a trifle," he said to himself. "It is quite probable that he was an impostor; but there is a possibility that he was not, and I would rather bestow the money upon one who was unworthy, than refuse it to a really needy person."

As these thoughts passed through his mind, he was overtaken by a friend who lived in his immediate neighborhood, and was often his companion in his daily walks to the city.

"You have the start of me this morning," he exclaimed, as quite out of breath he overtook Mr. Campbell, "but I have been employed in a good work, so I must not regret the delay."

"Did your benevolent duties detain you?" asked his friend, who knew that the gentleman had been appointed by the society for the relief of the poor, visitor for the vicinity in which they resided.

"They did indeed," was the reply. "As touching a case as I have ever met with. The family in question consists of a widow and four children—the eldest, a pale, sickly-looking boy of ten years, and the other three, pretty little girls, of different ages. They have not long been in our neighborhood, and have no acquaintances or friends. They have formerly been in better circumstances, and, though reduced by misfortune to the very extreme of poverty, are reluctant to ask assistance. Last evening, for the first time, as I am told, the boy after unsuccessfully endeavoring to obtain some trifling job by which he could earn a few pennies, applied to two or three of the passers-by for aid, but was ranked with the common class of beggars, and coldly repulsed."

"About ten years old, say you?" interrupted Mr. Campbell. "What is his appearance?"

"Rather tall for his age, and very slender; dark eyes and hair. But let me tell you the rest of my story. I found the poor mother in an absolute state of starvation, having deprived herself almost entirely of food for many days, in order to feed her hungry little ones. Exhausted nature could at length endure no more, and a long and death-like swoon so alarmed her children, that they ran to the nearest house for assistance: and in this way I became aware of their situation. The physician whom I called in tells me that there is yet a chance for the mother's life, but that, had relief been withheld a few hours longer, nothing could have saved her. A kind neighbor has offered to remain with her through the day, and administer the proper restoratives and food in small quantities."

"And you think she will live?" asked Mr. Campbell, with an expression of anxiety which surprised his friend.

"I think so," he replied; "but why does my story affect you so peculiarly? Surely you are not acquainted with the family?"

"Not at all," was the reply; "but, to confess the truth, I suspect I am one of the persons who refused to aid the boy, last evening. I have regretted it several times, but you know the streets swarm with these young beggars."

"I know they do; and it needs great discrimination to distinguish the deserving from the impostor. We must be careful not to condemn them from appearances."

"No, I never judge from appearances," said Mr. Campbell, hastily, "but in this case it seems it would have been better if I had done so."

"You did do so, I should say," returned his friend, smiling, "and there lay your error. You judged from the appearance of the boy, that he was a common beggar, and therefore you refused assistance. In fact, appearances are all we have to rest our judgment upon, in many instances. My rule, therefore, is, not that I will not form an opinion—for this it would often be impossible to avoid—but that I will not rashly condemn. I generally suppose good until I am compelled to a limit evil."

"That is my wife's theory; but I maintain that the judgment must not be swayed by appearances, but hold itself suspended and wait for proof."

"What man never has done and never will do, in my opinion," was the laughing reply. "You are attempting an impossibility, as your experience of last evening may convince you. You refused to aid the boy because you would not be deceived by the appearance of necessity, and of truthfulness which I am sure must have been apparent; but you must confess that you allowed yourself to be influenced by another set of appearances which decided you against him."

"Perhaps so, but this is only a solitary instance. There are always exceptions to general rules. But it is of no use to argue the point, as neither of us will be likely to convince the other of his error."

"Experience will be your teacher, friend Campbell, and I do not despair of hearing you acknowledge your mistake. But, in the meantime, I must wish you good morning, as I have reached the door of my office."

Immersed in the cares and perplexities of the day, Mr. Campbell had not bestowed a second thought upon the conversation of the morning, and was busily engaged with his usual duties, when he was interrupted by the entrance of a somewhat shabbily-dressed, but intelligent-looking young man, who asked in a timid voice if he was in want of a clerk. There was certainly a vacancy which Mr. Campbell much desired to fill, but a slight survey of the applicant convinced him that he would not suit.

"He is one of those poor, inefficient beings who are always unfortunate," he said to himself. "He would not suit me at all. Give me a man who looks as if he knew how to take care of his own interests, and then I shall feel more confidence that he can take care of mine."

A negative shake of the head was the only answer to the question of the disappointed youth, who turned sadly away.

"Poor fellow!" whispered one of the clerks to another. "He will go to ruin, simply because he looks as if he had been unfortunate. This is a hard world to live in. There are few who will extend their hand to a suffering fellow-being, while the prosperous find plenty of friends to push them on their way. And, after all, the unfortunate are often the more deserving. But people in this world will judge from appearances."

But the remarks of the clerk were unheard by the merchant, and quite unconscious that he had again committed the error which he so much reprehended, the little incident soon passed from his mind. Engrossed with business, the hour for dinner arrived ere he was aware, and unwilling to disappoint his ever-punctual wife, he seized his hat, and walked hastily towards home.

"Rather behind your time," was the smiling remark, as he entered the dining-room.

"Yes, it is a busy day, and I must beg that Jenny will be as expeditious as possible in placing dinner upon the table, for I must return without delay."

"It is quite ready," was the reply, and at the words Jenny entered, bearing the dinner-tray.

"I like punctuality," said Mr. Campbell, as he seated himself at the table. "But what is this?" he continued, surveying a pudding of somewhat doubtful appearance.

"Your favorite pudding, Henry, but owing to your being late, it has remained in the oven rather too long. The 'proof of the pudding is in the eating,' however, and I have no doubt you will find this excellent. We must not judge by appearances, you know."

A slight shade passed over Mr. Campbell's countenance, for this remark brought to his mind the occurrence of the previous evening; and his wife, perceiving that in some way she had disturbed him, hastened to add—

"I am becoming quite a convert to your opinion, at least as a general rule, Henry. I have met with a case in point to-day. I dare say you recollect Mrs. Boardman, whom I have mentioned to you several times, lately, as a new acquaintance, in whom I am much interested. She is, as you know, in very straitened circumstances. Some weeks ago, her son, a very promising young man, who has been in business in New Orleans, returned home in exceedingly poor health. He was obliged to relinquish an excellent situation which he had filled with perfect satisfaction to his employers, and for some time before his return was so ill that he feared he should never see his mother again. The hot, unhealthy climate has severely shaken his somewhat delicate constitution, but he is now gaining rapidly. For the last two or three weeks he has been endeavoring to procure some employment, but in vain. I saw his mother this morning, and she seemed quite discouraged. 'Eugene,' she said, 'had gone out with the intention of making personal application to all the principal mercantile establishments in the city, but she feared it would be useless. His sickly, forlorn appearance is against him, and there are few who are charitable enough not to judge by appearances.'

"It seems that every cent which he could save from his salary has been devoted to the payment of debts which his father left at his death, some two or three years ago, and the young man has hardly supplied himself with necessary clothing, so great was his anxiety to save his father's memory from reproach."

"He must be a noble-hearted fellow," remarked Mr. Campbell. "What kind of a situation does he want? I need a good book-keeper, and should really like to employ him."

"That is just the thing that I desired," joyfully exclaimed his wife. "I did not dare hint it to his mother for fear of exciting false hopes; but I had some recollection of hearing you say that your book-keeper had left you, and it occurred to me that his place might not have been supplied. Young Boardman has high testimonials from his employers in New Orleans, but he is timid, and easily repulsed by unkindness or indifference."

"In that case you had better give him a line of introduction to me," returned her husband. "That will make all easy for him. See him, if you can, this afternoon, and if he has not succeeded in obtaining a situation, direct him to my place of business. If I find him capable, I will pay a handsome salary."

Elated at her success, Mrs. Campbell hastened to discharge her commission. Gratefully the young man took the proffered note of introduction from her hand, but as his eye rested upon the number, he said, hesitatingly, "I think I have already called there, Mrs. Campbell, and indeed, I now recollect the name, but it did not occur to me that it was your husband's place of business."

"Probably he was out when you called," suggested the lady.

"Or judged from my appearance that I would not suit him," was the somewhat mournful reply. "I do not recollect the circumstance, for I have called at many different places to-day."

"My husband never judges from appearances," said Mrs. Campbell, confidently. "It is entirely against his principles. Hasten, therefore, and deliver the note, and I will ensure your success."

With warm thanks for her interest and kindness, young Boardman departed.

As he entered the office his heart sunk within him, for the scene of the morning came vividly to his recollection,—that cold shake of the head, without even a word to soothe his disappointment.

"It is useless," he murmured to himself. "I was sure I had been here before. No doubt, Mr. Campbell will regret the encouragement he has given me, when he finds who I am."

His first impulse was to retreat, but at this moment the merchant raised his eyes, and instantly recognizing the visitor of the morning, the truth flashed upon his mind.

"What would my wife say if she knew that I was one of those who condemned her young friend from appearances?" was his not very agreeable reflection, as the young man advanced, and delivered the note of introduction.

Overcoming the momentary feeling of irritation caused by this discovery, Mr. Campbell addressed the applicant with kind frankness.

"I was to blame in repulsing you so unceremoniously this morning, my young friend," he said. "My thoughts were much occupied, and I gave you but a momentary glance. From what my wife has told me I am inclined to think that you will supply the vacancy in my office perfectly well. But a little conversation will enable me to judge better of your qualifications."

Encouraged by his kindness, the sensitive young clerk forgot his diffidence, and by his intelligent answers, soon convinced the merchant that his abilities had not been over-rated. A satisfactory arrangement was made, and young Boardman returned to his mother with the joyful tidings that his duties would commence on the following day.

"I have a little confession to make to you," said Mr. Campbell to his wife, as they seated themselves in their quiet parlor, to enjoy their evening chat.

"A confession! What can it be?" was the surprised reply.

"I am convinced, that like the rest of the world, I am in the habit of judging from appearances, and indeed I have become of your opinion, that it is impossible to help it. The great error which we must avoid, is that of hastily condemning."

"Yes, that is exactly what I have always believed," replied his wife; "but what can have wrought so sudden a change in your sentiments?"

"Experience, that stern teacher, Mary. Listen, and I will relate the two little incidents which have opened my eyes to my own frailty, and given me a truer insight into human nature."

Mrs. Campbell listened with much interest, and cordially responded to her husband's closing remark, that in future, although they might judge, they would never condemn from mere appearances.

An Irish advertisement reads as follows:—
"Lost, on Saturday last, but the loser does not know where, an empty sack, with a cheese in it. On the sack the letters P. G., are marked, but so completely worn out as not to be legible."

THE FALL OF THE LEAF.

BY H. COUTLAS.

At this season of the year, when the leaves are falling around us, and the public squares and sidewalks are covered with the decaying foliage, an explanation of those natural causes which produce the fall of leaves will probably be both appropriate and interesting.

There is no subject on which botanists have entertained a greater variety of opinion than on the fall of leaves. The causes which produce their excision from the stems and branches of plants are so exceedingly complicated, that a much more advanced condition of botanical science seems to be necessary before they will be clearly and accurately understood. It is obvious that leaves are thrown off by plants because they are no longer of any service to them, and the means by which nature effects their separation are truly wonderful, and at the same time instructive.

The causes which produce the decay and fall of leaves, are partly chemical and mechanical. The water which enters the roots of plants as it percolates the soil, dissolves a small portion of earthy matter. This is partly deposited in the woody and fibrous tissues of the stem, but principally in the cellular tissue of the leaves, by the evaporation which is continually taking place at their surface. In this manner the interior walls of the leaf cells become incrustated or thickened by deposits of mineral matter, just as earthy matter accumulates at the bottom of a pot used for culinary purposes, and the leaf is thus rendered finally unfit for the performance of its functions. The mineral matter deposited in the cells is sometimes beautifully crystalized, the earths or bases taken up by the roots uniting with the acids formed in the vegetable organs. The most common kinds of crystals are those of the carbonate and oxalate of lime, which are of different sizes and forms, rhomboidal, cubical and prismatic, but the most prevalent form is the acicular or needle-shaped. It is to this form that the term raphides (raphis a needle) was originally applied by Decandolle, although it is now used indiscriminately in reference to all cellular crystals.

In the autumnal months, the light becomes less powerful, the leaves lose their green color, and their cells becoming gradually and entirely choked up with mineral matter, the sap no longer circulates through them. They absorb oxygen from the air, and the result of their different degrees of oxidation is seen in all that variety of autumnal tint, which casts such a charm over the dying landscape.

Whilst these chemical changes are taking place, nature is at the same time preparing to effect the mechanical excision of the leaf from the plant. It is necessary here to remark, that a leaf is simply an expansion of the green cellular bark of the young shoot, which is thus spread out by the divergence of the woody fibre ramified through its substance. This woody fibre issues from the side of the shoot in separate bundles, which, when the leaf is perfectly formed, unite together, constituting its footstalk. The points of issue of these woody bundles may be seen in the form of little round dots on the leaf scar, after the leaves have fallen.

Now, at first, all leaves are contiguous with the stem. As they grow, an interruption of their tissue takes place at the base of their footstalk, by means of which a more or less complete articulation is formed. The cause of this articulation is owing to the continuation of the growth of the stem after the leaf has attained its full growth, which it generally does in a few weeks. The growth of the leaf being completed, all its functions languish, in consequence of the increased deposition of mineral matter within its cells, the base of the petiole or footstalk being unable to adapt itself to the increasing diameter of the stem; the excision advances from without inwards, until it finally reaches the bundles of woody fibre, which are the main support of the leaf.

Whilst, however, nature is forming a wound, she is at the same time making provision to heal the same; for the cuticle or epidermis of the stem is seen to grow over the surface of the scar, so that when the leaf is detached, the tree does not suffer from the effects of an open wound. The provision for separation being thus completed, the leaf is detached by the growth of the bud at its base, by the force of the winds, or even by its own weight. Such is the philosophy of the fall of leaves, and we cannot help admiring the interesting and wonderful provision by which nature heals the wounds even before they are absolutely made, and affords a safe covering from atmospheric changes, before the parts can be subject to them.

The decay and fall of leaves is, therefore, not the result of frost, as is commonly supposed, for leaves begin to languish and change color (as happens with the red maple, especially,) and even fall, often before the autumnal frosts make their appearance; and when vegetation is destroyed by frost, the leaves blacken and wither, but remain attached to the stem; but the death and fall of the leaf is produced by a regular vital process, which commences with the first formation of this organ, and is completed only when it is no longer useful. There is no denying, however, that the frosts of autumn, by suddenly contracting the tissues at the base of the petiole, accelerate the fall of leaves. All must have noticed, on a frosty morning, in autumn, that the slightest breath of air moving amongst the decayed and dying leaves, will bring them in complete showers from the trees to the ground.

In general, we may say, that the duration of life in leaves is inversely as the force of the evaporation which takes place from their surface. For we find that the leaves of herbaceous plants, or of trees which evaporate a great deal, fall before the end of the year, whilst the leaves of succulent plants, or of evergreens, which latter are of a hard and leather texture, and evaporate but little, often last for several years. In pines, firs, and evergreen trees and shrubs, there is an annual fall of leaves in the spring of the year, whilst the growth of the season is taking place, but as this leaf-fall is only partial, consisting of one-half or one-third at a time, there is always a sufficient number left on such trees to keep them clothed with perpetual verdure. Hence is it, that the entire foliage of such trees consists of leaves which have been attached to the stem from one to three or five successive years.

In the beech and hornbeam, the leaves wither in autumn, and hang on the branches in a dead state through the winter. Such leaves, when examined, will be found to be contiguous with the stem at the base of their petiole, and, therefore, without that articulation, or joint, which so materially aids in the disruption of the leaf from the stem. These dead leaves fall off when the new leaves expand in the spring.

Most of the trees of this country have deciduous leaves, and in winter our woods are bare, and no longer cast their shadows on the earth; but the forests of tropical climates are evergreen, and usually retain the same appearance throughout the year. A perpetual shade is thus afforded by nature, which, in some measure, gives relief against the continuous heat of these regions. In tropical countries, however, many trees lose their leaves during the dry season. This is seen in the forests of Brazil, called Catingas.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

LITTLE MINNIE.

BY MAY LINWOOD.

Art thou weary, little Minnie?
Lay thy head upon my knee;
It makes the old man's heart rejoice,
Thy sunny face to see:
Well may the aged falter,
Who tread life's rugged way;
When even little Minnie Grows weary of her play.

Tell thee a story, Minnie?—
Nay, I am growing old;
And all the stories of my youth,
Long since to thee were told.
But, if thou'lt listen, darling,
There's something I would say,
That you may oft remember,
When I have passed away.

Minnie! my holiest thought for years,
That's cheered me many a day,
Is the memory of the mother,
Who taught me first to pray;
Minnie! do you remember
Your gentle mother too,
Whose only grief in dying
Was the thought of leaving you?

Ah, child, I mind me of the time,
A tiny babe wert thou—
When the baptismal dew of Heaven
Was sprinkled on thy brow;
Thy mother gave her one pet lamb,
One of Christ's flock to be;
Now, in the fields of Paradise,
She waiteth there for thee.

Ah, Minnie! little Minnie!
When at the close of day,
You kneel beside your little bed,
Your evening prayer to say;
Then pray to God to aid thee,
To keep thy mother's vow;
That sin's dark shadow ne'er may rest
Upon thy fair young brow.

Remember thy Creator!

These words were kindly given,
Even as a Father's hand, that leads
His little ones to Heaven;
Ah! Minnie, closely hold His hand—
As through life's path you roam,
Though rough and thorny be the way,
'Twill safely lead you home.

And when they lay me by her side,
In the peaceful churchyard there,
And you sometimes gaze with tearful eyes,
Upon this vacant chair,
These words, perchance, your lonely heart
With soothing thoughts may fill;
Think, darling, we who loved you
Are watching o'er you still.

Good night, my little Minnie!
You're weary now, I know;
Yes, twine your arms around me,
And kiss me ere you go;
Then hie thee to thy chamber—
Another day has gone—
Good night, my precious Minnie:
God bless thee, little one!

A HOME PICTURE.

One autumn night, when the wind was high,
And the rain fell in heavy plashes,
A little boy sat by the kitchen fire,
A popping corn in the ashes;
And his sister, a curly-haired child of three,
Sat looking on just close by his knee.

The blast went howling round the house,
As if to get in 'twas trying;
It rattled the latch of the outer door,
Then seemed it a baby crying:
Now and then a drop down the chimney came,
And sputtered and hissed in the bright red flame.

Pop, pop—and the kernels one by one,
Came out of the embers flying;
The boy held a long pine stick in his hand,
And kept it busily plying;
He stirred the corn and it snapped the more,
And faster jumped to the clean-swept floor.

A part of the kernels hopped out one way,
And a part hopped out the other;
Some flew plump into the sister's lap,
Some under the stool of the brother;
The little girl gathered them into a heap,
And called them a flock of milk-white sheep.

All at once the boy sat still as a mouse,
And into the fire kept gazing;
He quite forgot he was popping corn,
For he looked where the wood was blazing.
He looked, and fancied that he could see
A house and a barn, a bird and a tree.

Still steadily gazed the boy at these,
And pussy's grey back kept stroking,
Till his little sister cried out, "why, Bub,
Only see how the corn is smoking!"
And sure enough, when the boy looked back,
The corn in the ashes was burnt quite black.

"Never mind," said he, "we shall have enough,
So now, let's sit back and eat it;
I'll carry the stools and you the corn;
'Tis nice—nobody can beat it."
She took up the corn in her pinafore,
And they ate it all, nor wished for more.

CHAPTER ABOUT INDOLENCE.

BY MISS C. M. TROWBRIDGE.

"Mother, here is a paragraph I must read to you," said Susan Miller, as she raised her eyes from the newspaper which had engrossed her attention for the last fifteen minutes, and fixed them upon her mother who was sitting near by engaged in sewing.

"I should like to hear it, my dear," replied her mother.

Susan read—"Success in life can only come from, and is the legitimate result of, a firm resolution to work—to work honestly and industriously; and these habits must be formed in childhood or they will never be formed."

"Now, mother, that is just what I think," said Susan, when she had finished reading the paragraph. If there is one thing which disturbs me more than any other, it is to see one of these lazy people spending more than half their time in doing nothing at all. For my own part, I never can rest easy to be idle hardly a moment. I always wish to be doing something, and I am thankful I am not one of the indolent sort."

"You are?" said her mother, with a quiet smile, and an expression of countenance which it puzzled Susan to interpret.

"Yes; I am sure I am. I know that I have many faults, but I can hardly think that indolence is one of them," said Susan, thoughtfully, and with much less of assurance in her manner and tone of voice than was at first manifested.

The truth was, the expression of her mother's countenance had led her to ask herself if she had not been a little too hasty in assuming that she was never indolent. She was not sure that this was the case, but the fact now occurred to her mind that she had more than once discovered in herself faults from which she had supposed that she was quite free, and the self-confidence with which she had at first congratulated herself upon being free from the sin of indolence, was considerably diminished.

"I shall agree with you in part, my dear," said her mother, "but only in part. From that passive form of indolence which manifests itself in a disinclination for all employment, I think you are quite free. It is true that you are almost always busy; but you know there is such a thing as busy idleness."

"I am not quite sure that I understand you, mother."

"If you do not understand me, I suppose you will not object to my using some practical illustrations to make my meaning plain. You are always willing to be employed, but are you equally sure that you are always willing to be employed about the very thing which duty requires of you to do?"

"Don't you remember when you were at work upon your lamp-mat, yesterday morning, your brother James came in and asked you to sew some buttons on to his vest, and you replied, 'Oh no, I can't, James. Go and ask aunt Lucy to do it.'"

"But I was very busy at work upon my mat, then, and I did not like to put it aside."

"Are you quite sure that indolence had nothing to do with your refusing to sew on the buttons?"

"How could I be called indolent then, mother, when I was working busily all the morning upon my mat?"

"If you refused to sew on the buttons because you thought the work you were doing was more useful and important, and that it would be wrong to leave it, then indolence had nothing to do with your refusal."

"I cannot say that this was my reason for refusing," said Susan, blushing.

"I do not think you can, my dear. You refused because you loved the employment you were engaged in, and was not willing to leave it for work which you considered much less agreeable, though it might be more useful. Was it not so?"

"Yes, mother, I suppose it was. But do you consider all the time I spend in such employments as spent idly?"

"By no means. But if you refuse to lay aside such employments when duty calls, and things more important require your attention, I think you can hardly plead not guilty to the charge of indolence."

"But why was it not just as well to send James to aunt Lucy?"

"It was not, for several reasons. In the first place, aunt Lucy was engaged as well as you. Was it right to require her to lay aside what she was doing, to perform your duties, that you might have nothing to consult but your own inclination in choosing your work?"

"Again, if you had complied with your brother's request, he would have seen that you were willing to deny yourself to perform a service for him. In this way, you would have bound him to you with one more cord of affection, and by so much have strengthened the gentle influence a sister should ever exert over a brother. All this you lost by sending him away to aunt Lucy."

"I see that I was wrong, mother: but I do not as clearly see that the wrong was the result of an indolent spirit."

"Supposing James had taken his vest to Mary, and found her lounging idly upon the sofa, if she had sent him to aunt Lucy, because she did not wish to do it, should you not have called her indolent?"

"Yes, mother, I certainly should; that would have been a very clear case."

"But what is the real difference? We have supposed that Mary sent him away because it was too much trouble to do it. It was easier to sit still, and she much preferred it. You send him away because it is much less trouble, and more agreeable for you to do what you are doing. Now, what is the difference?"

"Not quite as much difference, I confess, as I at first supposed; but it is rather discouraging to be convicted of indolence, when I thought I was such a pattern of industry."

"Very many have made the same mistake before you; more fail of success in life from an indulgence in this kind of indolence than from a disinclination for all kinds of labor. They do not wish to sit down and fold their hands, but they take good care not to choose a rugged path. Others may climb the mountains, and scale the

THE OLD MAN'S BRIDE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The day had nearly closed, and Mrs. Bullfinch was alone, brooding over the dark prospect that opened to view in the future, and striving to find strength for what was before her, in considerations of duty, when she was informed that two gentlemen had called and wish to see her. Their names were sent up, and she remembered them as merchants and friends of her husband. After a few hurried changes in her dress, and a strong effort to compose her exterior, she descended to the parlors. She was met by the two gentlemen—both of whom were struck with her womanly dignity and repose of manner—with a deferential courtesy, that, under the circumstances, was grateful to her feelings.

"Our visit, Mrs. Bullfinch," said one of them, "is painful, and yet pleasant. In your husband's misfortunes we sympathize, and we sympathize with you in particular, as being necessarily a sharer in any evil that affects him. Of the extent of his losses, you are, of course, aware."

Mrs. Bullfinch bowed.

"You know that his estate will not pay the claims against it?"

She bowed again.

"Creditors," he resumed, "are never over considerate of debtors. The first impression of a loss sours the feelings and creates hardness. Therefore, in dealing summarily with a debtor, they are apt to be uninfluenced by any considerations of humanity. But I am pleased to say, that, in the present case, some better feelings have prevailed. Your husband's creditors, called back to right considerations, by one of their number, have instructed us to present you, as your own property, one of the houses included in his estate. This pleasant duty we have now called to perform,—here are the title deeds duly authenticated."

And he handed the papers to Mrs. Bullfinch, who took them in silence. She was too much affected to reply.

"And we are further instructed to say, that all your household furniture, plate, jewelry, &c., are likewise presented to you."

"Say to them in return," replied Mrs. Bullfinch, as soon as she could command her voice, "that one who has a second time in life felt the iron hand of misfortune, thanks them with a grateful heart."

She spoke with feeling, and yet with a degree of self-possession, and evidence of fortitude, that filled them with admiration. As they arose to depart, one of them said—

"A creditor of your husband's was alluded to as having instigated the others to this act. I don't know why I should mention his name; but it seems as if he should get the credit of his generous impulse. I am not aware that you ever met him personally; or that he is a particular friend of Mr. Bullfinch. His name is Wellford—one of the firm of Lane, Latta & Co."

The sudden flush that came into the face of Helen, was not unmarked by her visitors. But its meaning they did not comprehend.

From their elegant home, the broken merchant and his family in due time retired. The small house, remote from their old place of abode, which the generous consideration of the creditors of Mr. Bullfinch had reserved for his wife, received them, and there they began their new life; rather be it said—there Helen began her new life. As for Mr. Bullfinch, he lived little more than the life of a beast; and Mrs. Lee, the mother of Helen, when reverse of fortune came, found good reasons for deserting her daughter, and seeking another home, in a distant city, with a wealthy relative.

A year sufficed to exhaust nearly all the resources of Mr. and Mrs. Bullfinch. Surplus furniture and plate had been sold, and on the money this yielded, they had lived. No employment had been sought by Mr. Bullfinch; and, for a portion of nearly every day during the year, he was unfit for intelligent activity.

At last, articles of necessity had to be parted with in order to procure the daily supply of meat and drink—the drink costing, usually, more than the meat. And so it went on, until extremity came. Before this was reached, Mrs. Bullfinch had anxiously debated the question of personal effort on her part for the support of herself and husband. She had the same ability to earn money as before her marriage; but, pride and womanly delicacy both took alarm the moment the thought came into her mind, and both argued strongly against the suggestion. But, necessity toys not with inclination. Sternly she bends all to her will.

"Let me have a dollar," said Mr. Bullfinch, one morning, to his wife, as he was preparing, soon after breakfast, to go out.

Helen opened her purse, with a kind of half involuntary movement—showed him the inside, and answered, gloomily—

"I have nothing."

"Nothing?" He looked surprised.

"Not a single cent," was answered.

"I gave you twenty dollars of the money for which the clock, sofa and ottomans sold."

"I know; but half of it was owed at the store; and the remainder has been expended to keep the table."

"What are we to do?" said the old man, as he took off his hat, laid aside his cane, and sat down with an air of despondency.

"I do not know," Helen sighed as she spoke.

"We can't starve," said Mr. Bullfinch, fretfully.

Helen did not answer.

"I've tried hard to get into some employment," continued the old man, still in a fretful voice. "But it's all been of no use. Oh, dear! What is to become of us? We must live."

Still his wife remained silent. She knew the thought was in his mind; and momentarily expected what came next—

"The fact is, Helen," said he, firmly and positively, "we shall have to sell this house. It will bring three thousand dollars. It's no use to keep it, if we must starve."

Mrs. Bullfinch shook her head.

"What are we to do? Have you any money with which to buy bread?"

"Not now." It was plain from her manner, as well as from the altered tone of her voice, that her mind had come to a sudden conclusion. "But I will get what we want, at least for the present."

"Where?" enquired her husband.

"I can't answer your question now. Enough, that I will procure money for the supply of immediate wants. As to parting with our home, there must be greater extremity than now exists before I consent to the sale. While we have that in possession, there is a place where we can, at least, hide ourselves from the world."

"And starve," said the old man, impatiently.

"I will take care that we do not starve."

"You? Where are your resources? Have you money hid away? I thought you said, just now, that you had not a penny."

"Nor have I. But I will, as I said, procure enough to supply present needs."

As to how and where she expected to get money, Mrs. Bullfinch would give her husband no satisfaction. Soon after, the old man went out, and took his way to the business quarters of the city. He had tasted no stimulating drink since the night before, and was now burning with an intense desire for a glass of brandy. But he had no money with which to procure the wished for indulgence. All at once a suggestion came to his mind. At first he pushed it aside with a feeling of shame. It returned, and was now dwelt upon. The expedient proposed was simple and almost certain of success: yet the old manliness and independence of feeling fought against its adoption. But, resistance grew feebler and feebler, as thirst became stronger. At last appetite gained the advantage. Then, with a quickened pace, he moved forward, and kept on until he reached Front street, near Chestnut. There were few merchants in that neighborhood with whom he was not well acquainted. Into one of the stores he entered.

"How are you, Mr. Bullfinch?" The salutation was cordial, as the person addressing him held out his hand.

"Pretty well, thank you," said the old man, in no very cheerful voice.

"What are you doing now? I haven't seen you in this neighborhood for months."

"Not a great deal. When men at my age are pushed aside, it is pretty much all over with them. The sooner they are out of the world the better, perhaps, for them and the world too."

"Don't talk in that way, Mr. Bullfinch."

"How can I help it? But, I won't worry you with my grumbling. I've called to ask a small favor?"

"Well, what is it? Let me hear?"

"Will you lend me five dollars?"

"Certainly," replied the merchant. And he took from his pocket book a bill and handed it to Mr. Bullfinch. The act was prompt and cheerful.

"Thank you! Thank you!" said the old man, his partly averted countenance flushing with both pleasure and shame. "You are very kind. I will return it to-morrow."

"Don't trouble yourself. It will do at any time," was kindly answered.

Mr. Bullfinch went quickly from the store.

Soon after, he was sitting in a neighboring tavern with a bottle of wine before him.

As soon as her husband left the house, Mrs. Bullfinch went to her chamber, and, unlocking a private drawer, took therefrom a small ebony box, richly inlaid with gold. Within, were a few articles of jewelry and a gold watch. The intrinsic value of these was not great; but, to Mrs. Bullfinch, they had a value not estimated by common standards. The watch had belonged to her father. There was a plain gold ring in the box, a gift from Henry Wellford, which she never could find it in her heart to return, though, after her breach of faith, she no longer considered herself privileged to wear it. A cameo breast-pin, from the same source, had also been preserved; and, likewise, a pair of neat agate ear drops. These were the last lingerers in her jewel-box. All else had gone to meet the common wants of nature.

With what a fixed, sad look, did Mrs. Bullfinch sit and gaze on these memorials! And must she part with them now? The thought was more than she could bear. Suddenly shutting the box, and restoring it to the drawer, she commenced moving about the room, in a quick manner, her countenance showing earnest thought. Was there no other temporary resource but this? How earnestly was her mind searching about for a way to escape the sacrifice! After awhile, she paused, and bent her head, as if debating some new thought. A light came into her face.

"That may do," was breathed audibly. She then dressed herself to go out, and, after removing from her jewel-box the ring, breast-pin, and ear-drops, and restoring them to the drawer, she took the elegant box and the gold watch, and left the house. To the store of a well-known jeweler, in Chestnut street, where she had, not a very long time previously, made liberal purchases, she went, direct. Something in the manner of Mr. C——, the owner of this store, had left on her a favorable impression as to his kindness of heart, and this had determined her to ask of him the particular favor she wished granted. He was engaged with some ladies, when she entered, and she, therefore, retired towards the back part of the store, to wait until he was at leisure. One of the ladies she immediately recognized as an acquaintance, with whom a few formal visits had been reciprocated. Drawing her veil closer, she avoided a recognition, had the lady been disposed to remember her. From a momentary abstraction of mind, the words, "Bridal presents," uttered by one of the ladies, drew her attention.

"Oh, do let me see them, Mr. C——," was eagerly asked.

The jeweler took from the case a few costly and elegant articles, and exhibited them to his customers.

"Beautiful exquisite! charming!" and similar words of admiration reached the ears of Mrs. Bullfinch.

"Who is the bride?" was next inquired.

The tones of the jeweler were low, but the name—"Miss Morgan," was distinctly heard by Mrs. Bullfinch.

"Indeed! Oh! I had heard of her intended marriage," said one of the ladies.

"I wonder how her family are pleased with the match? Not wonderfully well, I should think," gossiped the other.

"Why not? He bears an excellent character, and is connected with one of the wealthiest houses in the city."

"And yet," was replied, with a half contemptuous toss of the head, "his family is nothing. He was a poor young man of whom nobody had heard, when taken into his present business. For my part, I wonder at Sally Morgan. She has had better offers; and could, at any time, get a husband in the first social rank. But there is no accounting for tastes."

"In my opinion," said the other lady, "he is quite good enough for her, and, if I dared say it, too good. Hers is an old family, it is true, but not without its blemishes. There's some blood in it I shouldn't like to have in my veins. Her uncle, as everybody knows, made a wonderfully narrow escape. Most people don't hesitate to say, that if he had his deserts, he would be well acquainted with the walls of a state prison. But people will talk."

"Yes, people will talk; but it doesn't do to pay much attention to what they say. With me, such things usually go in at one ear and out at the other. As for Sally Morgan, if she likes him, why, I suppose, it's nobody's business. She's got to live with him."

"He'll make her a good husband, without doubt," was replied.

"There's no question of that," now remarked the jeweler. "I've known Henry Wellford for some years, and know him to be a true man. As for Miss Morgan, I think she's made a wise choice."

Every word of this conversation was heard distinctly by Mrs. Bullfinch. Its effect was marked by the fact that she arose up, and, with a hand grasping tightly her veil, went quickly from the store.

"What lady was that?" enquired one of the gossiping customers, following with her eyes the retiring form of Helen. "There's something familiar in her style and manner."

"I don't know," replied Mr. C—. "Who was it, James?" addressing a clerk.

"A lady who wishes to speak with you," was answered.

"What did she want?"

"She wished to see you, personally, about something."

"You don't know her?"

"I'm not positive, sir; but I think it was Mrs. Bullfinch."

"Mrs. Bullfinch!" ejaculated both of the ladies at once. "I wonder if it was her!"

"Most probably," said Mr. C—. "I now recognize the manner and appearance, although I did not see her face. Poor woman! Fortune has played her falsely."

"She's served right, and I'm glad of it," remarked one of the ladies. "I've no respect nor pity for a young girl who marries an old man for his money."

"It's a little strange that she did not wait until I was disengaged," said the jeweler.

"I rather think I can explain this," said the last speaker. "We mentioned the approaching marriage of Miss Morgan and Mr. Wellford. It is said that Wellford was an old lover, and that she jilted him because he was poor, and wedded old Bullfinch. It must have cut her to the very core when she heard that he was about to marry into one of the best families in the State."

"And she in poverty and neglect," remarked the other. "So it goes. The wheel of fortune keeps turning. No one who is at the top to-day, can tell how soon he will be at the bottom." •

But enough of their remarks. When Mr. Bullfinch came home at dinner-time, he found his wife lying on the bed, in a state of mental and bodily prostration so alarming, that he deemed it best to send immediately for a physician. Of little use, however, were medical prescriptions. Days went by ere she rallied from the state in which her husband had found her, and weeks ere she was able once more to get sufficient command of her feelings to enter the path of duty, and move, with a firm step, along the rugged way.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Why the intelligence of Mr. Wellford's approaching marriage, should have told so disastrously on the mind of Mrs. Bullfinch, we will not attempt to inform the reader. That such an event was one, of all others, among the likeliest to occur, she must have known. If the hope, scarcely acknowledged to herself, of freedom, by the death of her husband, from her present bonds, and an ultimate union with the only being ever truly loved as woman can love, really existed in her heart, it had received a total extinguishment.

When, at length, she awoke, once more, to a partial interest in external things, and to a dim sense of duty, she found that an extremity existed which made immediate action, on her part, necessary. During the time in which her mental paralysis continued, Mr. Bullfinch had procured temporary supplies of money, by borrowing small sums from old mercantile friends, after the manner indicated in the preceding chapter. But, a failure to return the little obligations, as promised, soon exhausted that resource, and absolute want of food made his proposal to raise a sum of money, by mortgage on their house, one that Mrs. Bullfinch could not disregard. But for the intelligence received by her at the jeweler's, or rather the effect of that intelligence, she would have made an effort to get a few music scholars, and thus removed the necessity for selling or mortgaging their home. To do this, was still her purpose; but she had not yet sufficient strength, either of body or mind, to undertake the work, and so, after a few feeble objections, consented to the execution of a mortgage on the house for the sum of five hundred dollars. Her husband proposed a thousand, and, for some time, contended for that amount. But, in this, Mrs. Bullfinch was decided; so, finding further parley useless, the old man contented himself with the smaller amount; on receipt of which, he placed half the money in the hands of his wife, retaining the rest to pay off, as he alleged, sums borrowed during the preceding three months, to meet the cost of living. It was quite true that he had borrowed, and to the extent declared; but, as to the repayment, that was neither designed nor accomplished.

Scarcely a month elapsed, during which time Mr. Bullfinch was in a more besotted state than usual, ere the whole of his share of the five hundred dollars had disappeared; and he applied to his wife for money. She had only one hundred dollars left; servant's wages, sundry little amounts due to baker, milkman, and grocer, with actual cost of living during the time, having drawn heavily upon her resources. On hesitating to comply with his wishes, he became very angry, and used such threatening and abusive language, that, under the excitement of indignation and alarm, Mrs. Bullfinch took from a drawer the purse containing all the money she possessed, and tossing it to her husband, said—

"There! Take the whole of what remains. But don't expect me to keep the table any longer. If you come home at any time, and find no dinner prepared, don't ask me for a reason."

"I said," growled the old man, as he thrust the purse into his pocket, "that five hundred dollars was too small a sum. The mortgage should have been for a thousand."

Scarcely had the money passed from the hands of Mrs. Bullfinch, ere she saw and repented of the hasty act, which left her without so much as a single dollar. In a little while after, her husband left the house. During the afternoon, he sent home a barrel of flour, half a dozen hams, a basket of wine, a gallon of brandy, and sundry articles of groceries. On the next morning he went to market, and made some liberal purchases in the provision line. But, beyond this, no further account was made of the hundred dollars. How he was using the remainder, his daily condition too plainly made manifest.

Again Mrs. Bullfinch aroused herself from the state of mental inactivity into which she had fallen. Not since the day of her visit to Mr. C——'s store, had she been abroad. Whether the marriage of Mr. Wellford had taken place or not, she had never heard. It was the same to her, however, for she regarded the event as past. Once more she took her jewel-box, and the gold watch that had been her father's, and again visited the store of Mr. C——. She found the jeweler disengaged. He recognized her, and spoke with such real kindness of manner, that she was encouraged to utter freely her request, which was, that he would purchase of her the jewel-box at as fair a price as he could afford to pay; and, also, lend her the sum of twenty-five dollars on the gold watch, he having the privilege of selling it in order to repay himself, if she did not return the money in six months. To this Mr. C——, whose feelings were touched by the great change he saw in the young and still beautiful face of Mrs. Bullfinch, consented without an instant's hesitation. For the jewel-box, he paid her twenty-five dollars.

As, with a lighter heart, Mrs. Bullfinch turned to leave the store, she found herself face to face with Henry Wellford and his happy young bride, who were just entering the jeweler's. For a moment the eyes of Wellford and Helen rested on each other. Heart-secrets, that volumes could not have expressed, were read by both in that instant of time. Their paths crossed not again for many years!

Other purposes were to have been accomplished by Mrs. Bullfinch on this the first occasion of her venturing abroad for many weeks; but, the sudden meeting with Wellford, and visible confirmation of his marriage, so deeply disturbed her, that she hurried home, and once more, in solitude, let the rising floods of emotion sweep over her spirit. When, in a measure, their force was spent, she gathered anew her mental energies, and proceeded to put in execution a purpose for some time entertained, which was to endeavor to procure music scholars; or, if need be, give lessons in French and Spanish. She had some pride left, but not a great deal; the little that remained, kept her from going among any of those with whom, during the prosperous days of her husband, she was brought in social contact. To whom, then, should she make known her purposes? From whom seek the aid and encouragement she needed? Towards one lady her thoughts turned, when first this expedient was thought of, and towards her they still turned.

That lady was Mrs. Barker. Helen had never met her since her unhappy union with Mr. Bullfinch; and now the thought of calling upon her produced a painful shrinking. To expose, personally, and to Mrs. Barker in particular, the utter failure of all her marriage hopes—based upon the sand as they were—was a trial from which all her womanly instincts drew back. Yet, as she revolved the subject, and considered all other resources and expedients, the trial of calling on Mrs. Barker, and soliciting her interest, seemed the least of all that were presented. And so, a few days after her visit to the jeweler's, she went to see that lady.

"Mrs. Bullfinch?" said Mrs. Barker, speaking to herself, as the servant retired, after announcing a visitor. "Mrs. Bullfinch? Can it be Helen Lee!"

She arose instantly and went down to the parlors. The countenance of the pale, slightly-formed lady who came forward to meet her, as she entered, was that of a stranger in which is seen something familiar. A hand was hesitatingly extended, which was taken by Mrs. Barker.

"You do not remember me?" said the lady.

"Why, Helen!" exclaimed Mrs. Barker. "Is it possible? Your voice is unchanged, but I would have passed you in the street a dozen times without recognition."

"I am a good deal changed, I believe," Mrs. Bullfinch replied, striving to speak calmly, yet betraying the disturbed state of her feelings.

"Your father is——"

"In a better land," was answered, in a failing voice.

A few moments of silence on both sides gave Mrs. Bullfinch time to regain her self-control. As soon as she had done so, she said:

"I have always believed, Mrs. Barker, that you felt an interest in my welfare."

"You have believed right, Helen," replied Mrs. Barker, with much kindness of manner,—"And if there is anything in which I can now serve you, speak of it freely."

"You are, no doubt, aware that Mr. Bullfinch has failed in business."

"I heard as much; but never learned any particulars."

"The loss of property was total; and with the exception of a small house, which the creditors generously presented to me, everything passed from our possession."

"How unfortunate!" was the lady's simple remark.

"The misfortune," continued Helen, "took from Mr. Bullfinch all mental energy. Since then, he has not attempted to do business. Already we have mortgaged our house, and spent the money obtained therefor. Another mortgage, or a sale of the house, will produce temporary aid; but, unless I make some effort to obtain a regular income, the end can easily be seen—hopeless destitution."

"My poor child!" said Mrs. Barker, in a voice so full of real sympathy, that Helen's constrained feelings gave way, and bursting into tears, she sobbed and wept for several minutes.

How vividly, in that brief time, came the past before the eyes of Mrs. Barker! The progress of events had left her in no ignorance of Helen's purpose on a former visit, made a few years before. How distinctly she saw her now, as she turned from her in that very room, with such a hopeless air, and almost fled from the house. A kind reception of the poor girl then, and a patient hearkening to her petition—what years of almost unimaginable suffering would it not have saved!

"And you wish me to aid you in this purpose?" said Mrs. Barker, after Helen had grown calm.

"That is the object of my present visit, Mrs. Barker."

"Speak to me freely then, and with the assurance that all in my power to do shall be done."

"Simply, then, I wish to resume my former vocation. You know my abilities as a teacher. May I hope, through your aid, to obtain a few scholars?"

"You may, Helen. My own daughters, as you may suppose, no longer take lessons either in music or French. But, in my large circle of friends, are many, I do not doubt, who would be glad to avail of your services. I will call on two or three, during to-day; and to-morrow see others. On day after to-morrow, I hope to be able to make a good report. Will you call?"

"O yes. How kind you are! I will never forget you, Mrs. Barker. In our extremity, how rarely do we meet with a friend!"

Mrs. Bullfinch did not know how sharply these words smote upon the ears of her auditor. Never forget her! How could the memory of the one who, with scarcely an effort, might have saved her from a life of misery, ever retire a moment from conscious thought?

In a week from that time, Mrs. Bullfinch resumed her old vocation of teacher, under the efficient patronage of Mrs. Barker. It was not long before she had scholars enough to occupy all the hours she could give to instruction. How earnestly and patiently she applied herself; and how insensibly but surely did she win her way into the regard of all with whom she became associated. Her unhappy marriage relation, while it repelled those who did not know her personally, as evidencing something wrong in her character, excited in those who did know her, a kindly sympathy.

Ah! With what different feelings from those of old experienced did she now prosecute her daily tasks! Filial love and duty then inspired her efforts, and sweet was her daily reward. Now, she toiled to support an old, ill-natured, besotted husband, the very sight of whom was an offence to her. Urged by a stern sense of duty, she went forth, each morning, and resumed her uncheered tasks, and nightly returned to shiver beside the domestic altar, on which an unhallowed sacrifice had long since been burned to ashes.

And thus the days, weeks, months and years moved on. Years! Who would not shrink from turning the leaves in Helen's book of memory during this long time, and reading the record? Our hand, at least, shall not essay the painful task.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Nearly fifteen years have passed. Few beyond ordinary changes have taken place during this period. Mr. Bullfinch still cumbers the ground. More and more daily does his life become that of a beast, which merely seeks sensual gratification. To eat and drink to excess is his only enjoyment. Mrs. Bullfinch goes forth daily, in patience, and from a deeply-grounded sense of duty, earning the food and raiment that both consume. So close was the relation between income and expenses for some years, that she was not able to redeem the gold watch which had belonged to her father. It had been pledged for a certain time. When that time passed, she considered the dear relic forfeited; and, with many secret tears, resigned it, as among her heart's lost treasures.

One day about this time, Mrs. Barker, who had remained the fast friend of Mrs. Bullfinch, said to her—

"Mrs. Wellford was asking me about you to-day. She has two dear little girls, whose musical education it is now time to commence. She has heard you spoken of so frequently, and has formed so high an opinion of your ability and character, that she is particularly desirous to have them under your care. Of course, I had nothing to say but what was in your favor. The only question is, as to your engaging any more scholars at present. You are doing too much, for health now."

No change was visible in the countenance or manner of Mrs. Bullfinch, when this communication was made. She merely bent her eyes to the floor, in thought, for some moments. Then looking up, she replied—

"I hardly know what to say, Mrs. Barker. Nearly all my available time is now occupied, and it scarcely seems right to crowd in any more engagements."

"Very true. But think it over for a day or two. If you can undertake to give lessons to Mrs. Wellford's children, I think you will find the task an easy one, for, from what I have seen of them, they appear to be bright and teachable. As I said, their mother is particularly desirous to have you instruct them. She remarked to me while speaking of the matter, that if she could get them in your care, she should feel entirely satisfied."

"I will see what can be done, and let you know in a few days," replied Mrs. Bullfinch. Her manner was more abstracted than at first; yet no signs of emotion were visible;—none, in fact, was felt. Years since, her heart had acquired an even pulsation not to be easily disturbed by memories of the past.

The first inclinations of Mrs. Bullfinch were against accepting the office of teacher to Mr. Wellford's children. But, as she dwelt on the subject, her mind favored the proposition; and, in the end, she engaged to give them musical instruction. In arranging the hours, unacknowledging to herself the reason, yet acting from an instinct of delicacy, she fixed upon those during which the father of the children would be occupied in business, and, therefore, away from home.

"Don't you think I'm fortunate?" said Mrs. Wellford to her husband, after she had made an arrangement with Mrs. Bullfinch.

"In what respect?" he inquired.

"In regard to Maggy and Ella. Mrs. Bullfinch was here this morning, and has agreed to undertake their musical education."

"She has!"

Mr. Wellford spoke with a degree of surprise that caused his wife to say—

"Why, what has possessed you to believe that she wouldn't teach our children?"

"I understood that she already had more scholars than she was able to attend to," replied Mr. Wellford, smiling. "Even you were in doubt as to whether her services could be procured."

"True enough. And yet, there seemed to be, in your mind, some reason beyond this. However, we won't quarrel about that," Mrs. Wellford added, in a pleased tone of voice. "She has promised to come, and, from all I have heard of her, I think, as I said at first, we're fortunate. There's something very interesting about her; and I don't wonder that she attaches almost every one. I was drawn towards her at first sight. So gentle, so retiring, yet so self-possessed and lady-like. I wonder what could have induced her to marry that old man?"

"His money, it is said," remarked Mr. Wellford.

"It doesn't seem possible that she could have been so mercenary. If that were her reason, how sadly she has been disappointed!"

"Sadly enough, without doubt," replied Mr. Wellford, speaking partly to himself.

"I am sure she never could have loved him."

"Loved him! No: She must have loathed him in her heart!"

"I can scarcely believe that of her," said Mrs. Wellford. "If she had loathed him, she never would have married him."

"I don't know. The pressure upon her may have been very great. Her father was poor and in ill-health. From her slender income as a teacher, came the entire support of the family. Filial love alone, I am sure, prompted the act. For the sake of her parents, she sacrificed herself."

"That was an error," remarked Mrs. Wellford.

"An error!" said her husband, warmly. "Nay, it was more than an error—it was a crime."

"You speak strongly."

"Not too strongly, as I view these matters. To wed thus—where there was neither sympathy nor respect on her part, to say nothing of love, was an act so directly in violation of every law of nature, that I can designate it by no word of softer import than crime."

"If you were to look into her face," said Mrs. Wellford, smiling, "you would hardly find it in your heart to call her a criminal."

"Perhaps not. Doubtless, she has long since repented in dust and ashes. Poor thing! If all that is said of her husband's habits and conduct be true, she has led a sad life of it. But, when is she to commence giving Maggy and Ella lessons?"

"She will begin day after to-morrow."

"At what hour?"

"Twelve o'clock."

"Does that suit you best?"

"It will suit Mrs. Bullfinch, best."

"Your expectations are high," said Mr. Wellford. "I hope all will come out to your satisfaction."

"I have no fears on that score. Wherever, among my acquaintances, she has given lessons, every one is pleased. That I shall be so likewise, I do not, in the least, doubt."

"Nor do I," remarked her husband. "She is spoken of in the highest terms by persons in whose judgment we ought to have every confidence. With you, I think, we are fortunate in securing her services for our children."

A few days afterwards, Mr. Wellford said to his wife—

"What about Mrs. Bullfinch? Did she come according to engagement?"

"No."

"Did not come?"

"I've seen nothing of her since she was here to make arrangements about the lessons."

"A little singular, is it not?"

"I think so."

"She may be sick."

Mrs. Wellford did not reply, and her husband, after musing for some time, opened the morning paper, which a servant had just handed in, and commenced running his eyes over the columns. Suddenly, he made an ejaculation of surprise. Then, looking up, he said—

"I can explain this absence of Mrs. Bullfinch."

"In what way?" asked his wife.

"Her husband is dead."

"Dead!"

"Yes, here it is. 'Died, suddenly, Adam Bullfinch, late merchant of Philadelphia.'"

"Not many tears will fall over his grave," said Mrs. Wellford. "Even if his wife stood, with dry eyes, beside it, no one would feel surprised."

Mr. Wellford made no answer. A short time his mind seemed lost in reverie. Then he resumed the reading of his newspaper.

CHAPTER XXX.

And so the bond was severed at last—the chain, whose heavy links had galled and fretted for over twenty years, broken. Twenty years—and every cycle an age of misery! Twenty years! Begun in paralyzing fear, continued in disgust, and ending in horror. What a history! Yes, ending in horror—for Adam Bullfinch died the most terrible of all deaths. We will not take you, reader, to his bedside, as he wrestled in the last agony, nor pain your ears with his cries of terror as he vainly strove to escape the haunting demons created in that wild delirium—the drunkard's madness. No—no. Over that we must throw a veil. Enough, that, to the very dregs, Mrs. Bullfinch drank the bitter cup her own hands had placed to her lips. Faithful even to the end did she remain, as few could have remained faithful. It would be idle to say that the death of her husband caused an emotion of grief. She wept not when the earth went rattling down upon his coffin-lid—she sighed not as she turned from his half-filled grave. But, oh! how sad—how unutterably sad was her heart! Compared with her frozen, desolate state of feeling, grief for the loss of an intensely loved object were a luxury of the mind!

Duty had sustained her. In patient obedience to what she saw to be right, she had found strength to bear the almost crushing weight that was laid upon her. And now that her husband was dead—now that there existed no longer a necessity for unremitting effort on her part, the first impulse was to fold her arms, and sink into inactivity. This, however, was but the weakness of an hour. She had not been so long in the school of obedience, without learning some lessons of duty that went beyond the narrow circle of home. Valued as a wise and judicious teacher, and aware of the important use she was performing, she was quick to see that, neither in justice to herself nor society, could she now retire from her position. And so, after the few days' seclusion that a decent respect for the memory of her husband prompted her to observe, she went forth again, and resumed her duties. But little change beyond another shadow on her quiet, sober face, was visible. No one made allusion to the death of her husband, and to none she spoke of it. Not even in the case of Mrs. Wellford, was a reason asked or given as to why the first engagement was not kept.

Until now, Mrs. Bullfinch had not seen the two little girls of Mr. Wellford, the oldest in her thirteenth year, who were to come under her immediate instruction. When presented to her, she was struck with the peculiar sweetness and innocence of their faces. They had the large, dark eyes, broad forehead and slightly receding under lip and chin of their father, with the fair complexion of the mother. As she took their hands, and gazed into their faces, she felt her heart leap towards them, and a gentle glow of love pass with its delightful warmth throughout her entire being.

"They are good children, Mrs. Bullfinch," said the mother, speaking aside, and in a voice low enough not to reach their ears. Then she added, aloud—"I'm sure they will be obedient and attentive. And I shall expect them to learn very fast. You will give them a lesson this morning?"

"I have come for that purpose," replied Mrs. Bullfinch.

"As your time is valuable, I will leave you to begin at once," said Mrs. Wellford, rising. "Now, try your best, dears," she added, in a voice blending affection and pride. A little while the mother stood looking at her children, and then left the room. Upon her retreating form the eyes of Mrs. Bullfinch lingered, with a look of interest; and even after she had withdrawn, her gaze remained fixed, for some moments, upon the door through which she had passed. A deeper inspiration than usual marked the return of thoughts to a more direct perception of the present and its duties.

Never, perhaps, had she felt a deeper interest in pupils committed to her care; never, perhaps, imparted instruction with a purer sense of pleasure. And the children seemed conscious of something that made her more to them than a stranger. Their manner of fixing their large, soft, loving eyes, with an intent, inquiring gaze, upon her face, embarrassed her at times, while it stirred her heart more deeply.

Once or twice, during the hour devoted to the first lessons, Mrs. Wellford came in to observe their progress. She, too, as well as the children, felt drawn towards Mrs. Bullfinch by an internal and irresistible attraction.

"How do you like your new teacher?" asked Mr. Wellford, when, on coming home, at dinner-time, his children crowded around him.

"Oh, she's elegant!" exclaimed little Ella, gaily. "I do like her so."

"Elegant? What do you mean by that, sis?" said her father.

"She's good and nice; and I like her," replied the child, warmly.

"And what do you say, Maggy?"

"I like her very much," replied the elder of the two children. "She is so kind and patient. I'm sure we shall learn very fast."

"I'm sure I hope you will," said Mr. Wellford.

"There's something very interesting about her," remarked Mrs. Wellford. "I never met a stranger who, at first, attracted me so strongly. I think her a very superior woman."

Mr. Wellford did not reply, but he gazed in his wife's face with a look of tenderness, and laying his open hand on her forehead, smoothed, with a caressing motion, the glossy hair that covered her snowy temples.

In a little while, the topic of conversation was changed.

And, now, in the common course of events, Mrs. Bullfinch came to the house of Mr. Wellford as often as twice in each week; and, at each renewed visit, the children grew more and more into her affection, while her coming was ever hailed by them with pleasure. And so it went on for months—even years; yet not once, during the time, had the father of Maggy and Ella met their teacher, of whom they always had so much to say. Frequently had Mrs. Wellford sought to draw her within the social sphere of the family; but she would only come professionally, and lingered scarcely a moment after her duties were done. In her manner, Mrs. Wellford often thought there was something strange—something that indicated a motive for not wishing to remain an instant longer than was necessary to give her lessons. Several times she had observed her start, and listen, as if off of her guard, when the street-door opened. And once, in particular, she remarked that a sudden flush came into her face, as the voice of Mr. Wellford was heard in the passage. But, happily, she was in total ignorance of the fact that her husband and Mrs. Bullfinch had ever met, except casually, and as strangers.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"Forty-five years old. Oh, life! life! How smoothly, for some, the stream glides—how roughly for others!"

It was early in an autumnal day; a thin, golden haze was in the atmosphere; no breeze stirred in the maple branches that spread themselves before the window, near which Mrs. Bullfinch was sitting, yet leaf after leaf, yellow from the first touch of frost, was dropping away, and fluttering to the ground.

"Forty-five years old, to-day," she repeated. "At sixty, my heart should not have been so withered and sapless. Oh! what a desecration of a whole life."

She struck her hand hard upon her bosom, adding—

"Such a trampling down, and tearing up by the roots of luxuriant affection! Long ere this, the vine would have spread itself over the very topmost branches of its sustaining tree!"

"But, peace, peace!" she murmured, her whole manner growing calmer under a strong effort of the still potent will. "Poor heart! Have done with thy bootless throbblings."

And, saying this, she arose, and commenced making preparations to go out, and enter upon her daily round of duties as a teacher. After giving lessons at two places, she went to Mr. Wellford's. She had three scholars there now. A well-known physician's carriage stood at the door. On entering, she noticed that the servant who admitted her looked unusually sober.

"Is any one sick?" inquired Mrs. Bullfinch.

"Oh, yes, ma'am," was replied. "Mrs. Wellford is very ill."

"Not dangerously, I hope."

"I'm afraid so, ma'am," answered the servant. "The doctor has been here for two hours; and Mrs. Wellford looks dreadfully."

"What ails her?" asked Mrs. Bullfinch.

"She's been poorly, and drooping about, you know, for some time, Mrs. Bullfinch. Poor thing! She's lost flesh amazingly of late, as you've no doubt seen. Well, yesterday was Ella's birth-day, and the children had a little party last night. They were all very happy; and I never saw Mrs. Wellford enjoy herself more in my life. The party broke up about ten o'clock, and soon after the company went away, all the children were in bed. It was near eleven o'clock when Mr. and Mrs. Wellford left the parlors. In a little while after they were in their room, I heard a noise up stairs, as if a chair had been knocked over, and then Mr. Wellford called for the waiter in such a quick, loud voice, that we were all frightened, and ran to see what was the matter. On going into their chamber, I saw Mrs. Wellford lying on the bed, her face as white as a sheet, and the blood running out of her mouth. I was so frightened that I screamed and ran down stairs. 'Run for the doctor!' I heard Mr. Wellford say. And, in a minute, the waiter came flying down stairs, and out at the front door as fast as he could run."

"She had broken a blood vessel!" said Mrs. Bullfinch.

"Yes, ma'am. That is what ailed her. The doctor staid with her all night; and came again early this morning. They say he hasn't much hope of her."

"No one is allowed to see her, of course?"

"O, no, ma'am. She's too sick for that. We all go about on tip-toe, as it were; and nurse keeps the children as still as little mice."

"I'm very sorry," said Mrs. Bullfinch, who was startled and deeply pained by this alarming intelligence. The longer and more intimately she had known Mrs. Wellford, the higher had been her estimation of her character. Almost as a sister she loved her; though never with the freedom of a sister had she felt privileged to give voice to her affections.

"I am very sorry," she repeated.

Then adding—"Of course, no lessons can be given here to-day; so I will return home. But, if I could be of any use!"

This last sentence was spoken in an earnest voice, so earnest, that, unconsciously, the tones were slightly elevated, and reached the ears of Mr. Wellford, who, at the moment, was passing one of the landings on the stairway, but a little distance from the place where she stood, in the hall. He came down immediately, calling her name as he did so. His countenance was pale and haggard, his eyes humid, and everything about him showed anxiety and alarm.

"Of use, Mrs. Bullfinch?" he said—"O yes; you can be of great use. Will you not come up and stay with my poor wife, if it is only for a little while? She has whispered your name once or twice."

"Will not my presence disturb her?" asked Mrs. Bullfinch.

"O no: it will prevent disturbance from others. Oh, if you could only remain with her, how thankful I would be!"

There was no resisting this appeal of the distressed husband. Mrs. Bullfinch removed her shawl and bonnet, and with light steps passed up to the sick chamber. As she entered the door, the white face of Mrs. Wellford, white almost as the snowy pillow on which she lay, startled her with its deathliness, even prepared, as she was, for the change. A faint smile was instantly visible, and the lips of the invalid moved; but Mrs. Bullfinch placed a finger on her own lips to enjoin silence. Coming softly to the bedside, she stooped down, and kissed her. The tender impulse that prompted this act, was too sudden and too strong to be resisted. It was the token of a deeper love than she had ever been free to express. The hand that lay in hers—taken as she bent to her lips—gave back a quick pressure; and in a faint whisper, Mrs. Wellford said—

"Don't leave me."

"I will not leave you," was the low, but earnest reply, which was answered by a grateful look. And Mr. Wellford said—

"We shall ever remember your kindness, Mrs. Bullfinch."

In a little while the appearance of the room, the bed, and the person of the invalid underwent a change; and this, without apparent effort or obtrusiveness on the part of Mrs. Bullfinch. As she moved about, in her quiet way, the eyes of the physician were on her. A slight forward motion of his head, showed that he was satisfied with the observation.

"Mr. Wellford," said he, on leaving the room, "a good nurse is more to the doctor, often, than his medicine. It will be more in this case. As you hope for the recovery of your wife, retain this lady with her; at least for a few days."

"She will not leave her, I am sure," replied Mr. Wellford. "But, at your next visit, will you not, yourself, say how much depends on her remaining with my wife?"

"I shall not fail in that," said the doctor, as, after promising to return in a couple of hours, he went away.

But, it was neither in the power of medicine nor good nursing to save the failing wife and mother. The vital forces, already running low, had been too much exhausted by this effusion from the lungs. Instead of rallying, it was soon too evident, that the time of her departure was near at hand—that a few days, at most, must close her earthly pilgrimage. Five children, the youngest but a year old, made up the number of bright jewels in the mother's crown. To leave these, even with a father who tenderly loved and wisely cared for them—Oh, what a trial! When first the painful truth was communicated, it seemed, for a time, more than she could bear.

"My dear, dear husband!" she sobbed, as, with her arms clasped tightly around his neck, she drew his face down to hers, and wet it with her tears. "I cannot leave you. And my children—my babe!—Oh, Henry!"

How weak are words of consolation offered at such an hour, and in view of a separation like this! After the first gush of feeling was over, Mr. Wellford whispered—

"We must look upwards. God will give us strength for the trial."

As he spoke, the tremor in his voice, if it betrayed not his want of confidence in the Divine aid to which he referred, showed the weakness of nature.

The certainty of approaching dissolution, usually brings calmness of feeling, and clearness of thought. It is a wise and merciful provision, that death, which we view at a distance with so much dread, loses its terrors in drawing near. It is no longer a grim monster, but an angel of mercy, to take us lovingly by the hand and lead us safely along the dark passage that opens into the brighter world of spirits. How rarely, in the closing hour, dwells the mind on dissolution—how insensibly it rises into thoughts of eternal life! Words of consolation come with higher meanings; and there is given a trust in Him who doeth all things well, profound enough to still the tempest of emotion even in a mother's bosom.

And it was so in the present case.

True to her promise, Mrs. Bullfinch did not leave the wasting invalid, during the two weeks that she lingered among the beloved ones who, even while they clung to her, felt their hold gradually giving way. Other friends, and near and dear relatives, were with her; but, to the dying one, no hand was laid upon her with such a gentle, loving pressure, no voice was so soothing, no ministration so satisfying as that of Mrs. Bullfinch. And yet, how unobtrusively all was done!

One day, it was near the closing hour, Mrs. Wellford found herself, for a short time, alone with her gentle attendant. A few minutes before, the nurse had taken little Henry, her youngest born, from the room. She had kissed him, and then shut her eyes tightly to keep tears from flowing over her cheeks. Opening her eyes at length, she said, her tones slightly tremulous,

"It is a hard, hard trial, my kind, good friend! How can I leave these dear ones? Who can fill my place to them?"

"I can give but this answer," replied Mrs. Bullfinch, in her low, even tones. "There is One who loves them with a love exceeding even that of a mother."

"I know, I know. Yet, is not my love to be an instrument for their good? While life remains, should not my thoughts regard their future?"

"It should."

"My friend"—Mrs. Wellford took the hand of Mrs. Bullfinch, pressing it tightly in her own, while her eyes were fixed intently upon her face. "If I could know that they were in your care! At Maggy's age, the wisdom of a mother's love is needed, quite as much as its tenderness at the age of dear little Henry. They love you, they confide in you; and love and confidence would make them obedient to your every word. Oh! Mrs. Bullfinch, if I knew they would henceforth be in your wise and loving guardianship, I could pass away without a sigh."

Mrs. Wellford felt the low thrill that came instantly into the hand she clasped so tightly. But, she did not know its meaning, nor comprehend the change of expression that passed over the face of her companion.

What a request to make, and that, too, of one who had, for more than twenty years, loved, with a hopeless, yet undying love, the father of the children she now wished to leave in her keeping! Mrs. Bullfinch were more than mortal not to have experienced a profound agitation. But, what could she reply?

The disturbance of feeling bewildered her thought. Moreover, as the disturbance went deeper, she clearly saw its origin in a yet unextinguished interest in Henry Wellford; and a wave, burdened with anguish from a sense of guilt, swept across her mind. Closing her eyes, she looked up, and, in silence, prayed for strength and guidance.

"You do not answer me," said Mrs. Wellford, in a voice of suspense.

"How can I answer you?" replied Mrs. Bullfinch. Then she added, with less feeling—

"You leave them in a safer and wiser guardianship—that of their own father."

"I know—I know!" was quickly answered. "But—you understand all I can and would say. A father cannot supply the mother's place to his children. They ever need a woman's care, a woman's love. I know my husband will confide in you entirely—that he will trust to your judgment,—and the children—they all love you. Sometimes I have been almost jealous of their attachment; and half jestingly, half in earnest, said, that they loved you better than they loved their mother. So far as your worldly interests are concerned, be sure they will not suffer. I have property in my own right—say that you will become the personal guardian of my children, and I will endow you with a liberal income."

"Speak not of that!" said Mrs. Bullfinch, putting up a hand, and averting her face, that the pleading mother might not see its expression. "With me, these selfish and worldly considerations have long since, I trust, ceased to have influence."

"Then why not give your promise?"

"Because," replied she, in a voice that was very low—only in the diminished tone was steadiness acquired—"another will than ours must give consent."

"Another! whose? O, yes. I see! My husband!"

"Yes."

"If," said Mrs. Wellford, slowly and solemnly, "when I am no more among these household treasures, he asks you to take my place with them, as far as that may be, will you answer yes?"

Many minutes passed before there was any answer. The dying mother saw not her countenance—dreamed not of what was passing in her heart. At last Mrs. Bullfinch said, feebly, and as if the answer had cost a powerful struggle—

"It shall be as you wish."

"Thank God! I can die in peace!" came exultingly from the mother's lips. "Thank God!" she repeated. "Thank God!"

Motionless, almost as a statue, Mrs. Bullfinch remained. A way was opening before her, the very thought of treading which half suspended her respiration. When, at length, she turned to meet the grateful, confiding looks of Mrs. Wellford, her eyes sunk beneath the earnest gaze that was fixed upon her; while she felt the warm blood mounting to her face. The entrance of Mr. Wellford, at the moment, gave her a fitting opportunity to retire. Alone, in earnest self-communion she remained for some time. When she entered the sick chamber again, her heart was beating with even pulses.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The night that followed this solemn interview, broke not again for the wife and mother—not again in this world. To her, there came a better and a brighter morning than dawned for the sorrowing ones she left behind.

The last act of Mrs. Wellford made the way plain for Mrs. Bullfinch. She dictated a will, by the provisions of which a generous income for life was secured to her, and in which she solemnly committed her children to her care. Mrs. Bullfinch had already given her promise that, if desired by Mr. Wellford to do so, she would meet the mother's dying wishes. That desire was expressed in language not to be misunderstood.

In a little more than a month after the death of Mrs. Wellford, Mr. Latta came home from England, with his health so much impaired that his physician said he must, for the present, give up all earnest application to business. It being necessary for the house to be represented abroad, it was determined that Mr. Wellford should take his place for a few months.

Short as the time had been since Mrs. Bullfinch assumed her new position in his family,—short as the time had been, it was yet long enough to give birth in the mind of Mr. Wellford to certain emotions that disturbed and pained him. Tenderly as he had loved his wife, and faithful to her in every thought as he had been—he discovered, already, a newly awakening interest in her for whom his heart had first poured out the gushing waters of affection. Not that, in any respect, Mrs. Bullfinch sought to bend a single thought to herself. Faithful to her trust, as the guardian and friend of his children, she was devoting her life to them with a tenderness and assiduity that never for a moment grew weary. Towards him, she was reserved, though not cold; deferential, but not constrained. None knew better than she, the virtues, the sweet attractions, the loving qualities of her who had been taken from him; and had she thought, that, in so brief a time after her removal, his heart was turning to her with a single pulse beating with old emotions, instantly her high respect for his character would have been dimmed.

"Mrs. Bullfinch," said he, one day, about six weeks after the death of his wife, "I shall be obliged to leave, almost immediately, for England. Mr. Latta has come home, in very bad health, and the doctor enjoins positive relaxation from business. The interests of the house require a resident partner abroad; I must, therefore, take his place for a short time. It will leave on you additional care and responsibility, which I regret; but I hope to be home again in two or three months. I have concluded to take Maggy with me. She is not only old enough to enjoy a trip across the water, but to receive benefit therefrom."

An expression of regret came to the lips of Mrs. Bullfinch, but she checked its utterance, and remained silent.

"My only trouble about Maggy is, the want of a suitable companion to accompany her. I shall, for the greater part of almost every day, be necessarily absent from her—business being the object of my visit."

"She is just at that age," said Mrs. Bullfinch, "when she ought not to be thrown among strangers without a judicious companion of her own sex."

"You are right there," replied Mr. Wellford, in a voice that showed a sudden conviction of the truth involved in her remark. "Right—right!"—he added. Then he sighed, and remained lost in thought for some time.

"I wish I could take all with me," he said, in some animation, as if he were really serious in the suggestion. And, for the moment, he was.

"Had not all better remain?" said Mrs. Bullfinch. "You will not be gone a very long time. Maggy is still at school; and, though past seventeen, but a school girl, and ignorant of the world and its wiles. Will it be wise to interrupt her studies now—in fact, to end them, for she will not be able to study again—or safe to trust her alone, as she must so much of her time be, and among strangers, of whose characters you can never be sure?"

"No, Mrs. Bullfinch, it will not," was the father's emphatic answer. "You are right—right. I thought more of myself than of my child, when I proposed to take her with me. Well"—and he sighed—"I must go alone. The separation from my children will be painful. Yet I shall have one comfort; she, with whom I leave them, will be faithful to her trust."

"If tempted to unfaithfulness," said Mrs. Bullfinch, solemnly, "I will think of their mother, as present, and remember the hour when her treasures were committed, in tears, to my keeping."

"I thank you, in her name, for your earnest love, and untiring faithfulness," said Mr. Wellford, with emotion. "It will take away much of the pain of separation to know, that even a mother's love could not more wisely guard my household treasures."

Fortunately, Mr. Wellford had not spoken to his oldest daughter of his wish to have her accompany him to England. The more he reflected on the matter, the more clearly he saw that Mrs. Bullfinch was right; and the more thankful did he feel that his children had come under the immediate guardianship of one whose love made her so jealous over them for good.

In the short period that elapsed ere Mr. Wellford bade adieu to his family, it became necessary for him to have frequent, earnest, and familiar conference with Mrs. Bullfinch. Many directions had to be given, and on many subjects information was sought. Necessarily their minds came into closer contact, and each saw, without the effort to see, more deeply into the other's thoughts.

"There is one thing that I must require of you," said Mr. Wellford, on the day he was to leave, "and that is a weekly letter, telling me all about my children. It will be some compensation for the weary absence I shall suffer."

"Maggy will write you," replied Mrs. Bullfinch.

"True; but, she can only write her own thoughts and feelings. She can only speak of home from the point of view at which she sees it. You can tell me a hundred things of interest that she would never notice. I will write to you my views and wishes in regard to my children, and you must give me pictures of home."

Mrs. Bullfinch hesitated still, but he extorted the promise. When the hour of parting at length came, and the father, melted into unwonted tenderness as he kissed and embraced his children for the last time, took finally, the hand of Mrs. Bullfinch, he said, as he grasped it tightly—

"I leave all with you—I trust all to your keeping—I do not say be faithful. The word would wrong you. Farewell!"

The close pressure of his hand was but slightly returned. She did not lift her eyes to his face, nor trust her voice in response.

"Farewell: and God bless you all!" added Mr. Wellford, with deep emotion, as he turned away, and hurried from the presence of his family.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

CONCLUSION.

Month after month went by, and still Mr. Wellford remained abroad. The health of Mr. Latta continuing feeble, his physician still enjoined relaxation from business, or, at most, a very moderate devotion of thought and effort in that direction. He could not, therefore, relieve Mr. Wellford. More than a year had elapsed, and yet the father was absent from his family, though yearning in heart to be with his beloved ones again. From loneliness and home-sickness he had suffered greatly—this separation adding to the pain of his sad bereavement.

Mrs. Bullfinch had been true to her promise, in writing once a week. Every steamer brought him a letter, in which were faithful pen-pictures of what was passing at home. The progress of each child in its education, and most of its sayings and doings that were at all likely to interest the absent father, were recorded. Little faults and defects of character were, likewise, at times, set forth to view, and his advice sought as to the best modes of correction. She gave him, too, an account of household matters, and a monthly statement of expenses. Of the latter, he more than once said, in his letters, that it was needless, as he had every confidence in her, and knew that she was faithful and conscientious in all things. Still, the statements were never omitted.

In regard to the tone of her letters, Mr. Wellford was, in some respect, not altogether so well pleased. They had always struck him as cold; but this coldness seemed, as time wore on, to increase. Her letters, too, became briefer, and more formal, while, in writing to her, his own had, almost unconsciously to himself, acquired a greater freedom and a warmer familiarity.

As the time of his absence was still prolonged, Mr. Wellford wrote to have a daguerreotype of each of his children taken and sent to him. This was accordingly done. With what eager and trembling hands did the father open the welcome package when it came. There were five separate pictures, one of each of his children, from Maggy, the oldest, a beautiful young woman, down to dear, dear, little Harry, the youngest born, and, if that were possible, best beloved. If tears dimmed the father's eyes, as he gazed upon the faces of his children, thus pictured for him to the very life, it was no unmanly weakness. Most of all, the youngest seemed changed. A year in a baby's life is a long period. He looked a great deal older, yet, oh, how much more beautiful!

His large, heavenly eyes, his wealth of soft curls, clustering about his neck, and falling over his shoulders, his arching lips that seemed just about to speak to him—all came upon him like a living reality.

But there was another small package, carefully tied and sealed, and Mr. Wellford knew the direction thereon to be in the hands of his oldest daughter. Opening this, he found, within, a letter from Maggy, and what startled and thrilled him with a strange, yet exquisitely pleased, emotion, another daguerreotype, containing two figures, those of Mrs. Bullfinch and little Harry!

The child was sitting in her lap, with his head partly turned, so that he could look into her face, and the look was one slightly anxious, yet full of confiding love. But it was the face of Mrs. Bullfinch that more particularly attracted and chained the eyes of Mr. Wellford. So calm, so pure, so elevated, so spiritual in its beauty! It reminded him of one of Raphael's Madonnas. Instantly, there flowed back upon his heart, in a strong flood, the waters which, for so many years, had been pent up. He kissed, fervently, the pictured face, and, as he did so, murmured—

"Helen! Helen! There has been a great gulf. But it is bridged over at last!"

Opening now the letter of Maggy, he read—

"MY DEAR, DEAR FATHER:—If dear, good Mrs. Bullfinch knew what I was doing, she would scold me dreadfully—no, not scold, for she never spoke a cross word in her life, I'm sure. But if she knew what I was doing, she would be displeased and hurt. I send you her daguerreotype, with our sweet little Harry sitting on her lap. I asked her to let me send it, but she looked half frightened, and said, 'No, indeed, Maggy; not for the world!' But I was bent on your seeing it, so I went out, one day, and had a duplicate made—and here it is! Doesn't she look well? How we all do love her!"

"And now let me tell you how it came that her picture was taken. We all went to sit for our daguerreotypes, to be sent to you. When it came to Harry's turn, he was so frightened that we couldn't get him to sit in the chair. We tried for some time. At last, without thinking what would be the result, Mrs. Bullfinch sat down, and took him on her lap. The picture was taken, and, of course, we had Mrs. Bullfinch as well as Harry. We all said that was just as it should be; but she—and I never saw her face in such a beautiful glow as it was then—said no. After a good many trials, we induced Harry to sit just long enough to get the image fixed."

"Do you know, dear father, that Harry always calls her 'Mamma?' She tried a long time to make him say 'Aunty,' but it was no use. He would call her 'Mamma'—his 'own, sweet Mamma,' he says, sometimes. We all encourage him. I'm sure our own dear mother, of whom she often talks to us, never could have loved him more or taken better care of him."

"The other day, and I've thought strange of it ever since, I handed Mrs. Bullfinch the key of your private secretary, and asked her if she wouldn't get me a seal out of one of the little drawers. Thinking, soon after she left me, of something else that I wanted, I went over to your chamber. I had on light slippers, which made no sound on the carpet. Her back was towards me, but I saw that she had that beautiful ebony jewel-box in her hand, and had taken from it the old-fashioned gold watch it contained, on which she was gazing. A side glance at her face, reflected in a mirror, showed me that she was weeping. I retired without being observed. She stayed a good while. When she brought me the seal, her eyes were red and her face very sober. She has looked more thoughtful than usual ever since. What does it mean? On opening the box, afterwards, I found in it a note, in your handwriting—the address was not given—but the note said, briefly—"A friend restores them to you." On the watch is engraved the word 'Lee.' Wasn't that her maiden name? There's something about this that I don't understand. Can you tell me what it means, father?"

"Yesterday, a lady called to see Mrs. Bullfinch. She came in a handsome carriage, and was very richly dressed. She called Mrs. Bullfinch 'aunt,' and kissed her. Both shed tears at meeting. The lady remained a long time. When she went away, the face of Mrs. Bullfinch looked brighter than it had been for a long time. I asked her who the lady was, and she said that she was a niece of her husband's, who had, some years before, married a wealthy Southern merchant, and now resided at New Orleans. That it was twenty years since they had met."

"I have a good deal more to write about, but must put it off until the next steamer. Good by, dear father. When are you coming home? Oh, how we long to see you once more. MAGGY."

Three months later. Word had come that Mr. Wellford would be home in the next steamer. What joy there was in his household! Even little Harry caught the infection, and would clap his hands, and cry "Papa coming! Papa coming!" although his infantile memory held but a faint picture of his absent parent.

A close observer would have remarked a very decided change in the countenance and manner of Mrs. Bullfinch, after this intelligence came. Her eyes had in them a different light, her cheeks flushed with a warmer hue, her voice was lower, and her air, at times, that of one whose thoughts dwelt not in the present. Far, very far was she from being at ease in her mind—far from thinking of the return of Mr. Wellford, unaffected by a personal interest. Earnestly had she striven to keep down every heart-throb born of old affections—to turn her thoughts away from the absent one, when his image came before her, as it would often come, with eyes that seemed gazing into her very soul. But all was in vain. He was her first and her only love. The polar star of her woman's life; and, now, when to think of him and to love him were no longer a sin, there was no power in earth or heaven strong enough to subdue her leaping pulses—to say to her heart—that trembled at the lowest whisper of his name, peace, be still!

It was full time for the steamer to arrive, by which Mr. Wellford was to come home. Hourly his family were in expectation of intelligence from New York, by telegraph, that he had reached that city, and would be with them in a few hours. All were on the tip-toe of expectation.

It was late in the afternoon, and Mrs. Bullfinch was alone with little Harry, who was in one of his playful and affectionate humors.

"Dear mamma!" he would say, as he twined his arms tightly about her neck, and pressed his lips to hers. "Dear mamma! Aint I your little dove? Aint I your sweet darling? Papa coming home?"

"Dear papa!" said Mrs. Bullfinch, in a tender, affectionate tone.

"Yes; dear papa!" responded the child.

"You'll love him very much, won't you?"

"O yes; and I love you—sweet, good mamma!"

And again the fond creature clasped her neck.

How little dreamed the waiting one—waiting with a heart so burdened with feeling, it had scarcely power to perform its office—that Henry Wellford had entered the room where she was sitting, and was a witness of this scene.

"Helen! Helen! Dear Helen!" he exclaimed, utterly unable to control himself, and springing to her side, he drew his arms about her and his child, and clasped them together to his heart. Trembling and sobbing from excess of joy, she lay there, not making a motion to withdraw herself—she had no power for that—but shrinking closer and closer into his bosom.

"The long night is over—the trial past—dear Helen!" whispered Mr. Wellford, as he began to acquire some command over his feelings. "To my children, you have been faithful even as a mother. They love you as a mother. Be to me, as well as to them, the sunshine of life—the joy of our dwelling."

Slowly Helen raised her head, looked him, for a moment, with glad eyes, in the face, and then buried it again in his bosom.

He was answered.

A few weeks later, and undying love found its long delayed consummation.

DOMESTIC LIFE AND MANNERS OF THE ANCIENT EGYPTIANS.

The Pyramids, temples and palaces of Egypt have been secured by their massive strength against entire destruction; but the houses were built of perishable materials, and no such fortunate accident as that which preserved Pompeii has enabled us to look into the interior of an ancient Egyptian town. We search in vain even for foundations in many places, where the former existence of a considerable population is clearly proved by extensive cemeteries. The houses were built in general of crude brick, and they have either fallen to decay or been destroyed, that their materials might be applied to other purposes. At Thebes, the blackened remains of the foundations bear traces of the conflagrations to which from the time of Cambyses downward the city was exposed. But from these, though we may discover the strength of the walls and the size of the lowest apartments, we could gain no information respecting the interior disposition of the inhabited part, or the height to which the house was raised; and little respecting the arrangement of the streets. Fortunately the paintings of the sepulchres, which so generally relate to domestic life, have preserved some views of the houses in which the scenes represented are carried on. Sir Garduer Wilkinson has explored the remains of an ancient town near Tel-Amarna, which he believes to be Alabastron; and though they may not belong to very remote times, they serve to enlarge the scanty information which we derive from other sources.

Diodorus, speaking of the second Busiris, whom he represents as the founder of Thebes, says that he built the houses of private persons some with four, some with five stories. In the historian's age, great part of Thebes had been long in ruin, and certainly no houses existed there to prove what had been the style of architecture in the mythic reign of Busiris. His statement is probably one of those exaggerations by which the glory of this ancient capital was magnified. That the houses should have been of that height, would be inconsistent with what Diodorus himself tells us, of the indifference of the Egyptians to the magnitude and splendor of their dwellings; it is contrary to the practice of the East in all ages, and to the evidence of the paintings. From these we may conclude that the ordinary plan of an Egyptian house comprehended only a single story besides the basement, with a terrace on the roof, open or covered, surrounded by a balustrade or battlement. In hot climates, two great objects in the arrangement of houses are, to admit air and exclude heat. To attain the latter, the Egyptians made their windows small and their apartments lofty; and for ventilation it is probable that they had a contrivance in the roof, similar to that which is now used in Egypt. Houses which stood detached and enclosed within a wall of their own, had an ornamented garden around them, such as we have already described. Their villas were still more spacious, comprehending a variety of apartments, and had frequently the appendage of a farmyard. The walls of the principal rooms were covered with stucco and ornamented with paintings. These have generally perished; but from the tombs it is evident that the Egyptians in very early times had made great advances in house decoration. Their walls and ceilings are painted in a variety of patterns, combining elegance of form with richness of coloring. Many of them, even of very early kings, exhibit a remarkable resemblance to those which we see in the Mosaics of the Romans, and which have been imitated in our carpets and floor-cloths. What is called the Maander, or Greek border, appears in a tomb of the eighteenth dynasty. The resemblances are so numerous and so striking as to leave no doubt that the Greeks and Romans derived from Egypt these combinations, the artistic excellence of which is attested by the circumstance, that they please as much at the present day, as in the remote age when they made their first appearance.

The tombs contain a considerable number of specimens of Egyptian furniture, but they are usually of an uncouth kind; the luxury which prevailed is, however, sufficiently attested by the paintings. Compared with modern houses, those of Egypt indeed would seem scantily furnished: they had neither curtains, nor carpets, nor mirrors, nor the elegant apparatus of book-shelves, chiffoniers and writing-desks, which literary habits have introduced among us. Musical instruments too were not with them part of the furniture. Stands for flowers, vases of perfume, and even altars for the reception of offerings which were not to be consumed by fire, appear frequently in representations of the interior scenes of Egyptian life. Besides these, tables, chairs and couches were the principal articles which their rooms contained, and these in wealthy houses were made of costly materials, elaborately wrought and polished. Their forms display freedom and elegance; some of them, as the imitation of the legs and feet of animals, have been perpetuated to the present day in the workmanship of the corresponding pieces of furniture. The thrones or chairs of state, which are pictured in the tombs of the kings, were richly gilt and painted, and luxuriously cushioned; the back bends with an easy and graceful curve; the head of a lion, or the entire figure, forms the arm; the sides are occupied with emblematical devices, or the representation of captives bound beneath the throne of the sovereign. The footstools and seats are also richly carved and covered, and exhibit the enemies of Egypt in the same humiliating posture. When the Egyptians reclined on couches which had no back or scroll at the end for the support of the head, its place was supplied by a semi-circle of polished wood upon a stand, on which the head was rested. In that climate the contact of the head during the day with a soft pillow would have been intolerable, and this substitute continues to be used among the Nubian tribes. Whatever may be said of the stiffness and uniformity of Egyptian style when employed on sacred subjects, the artists displayed a sense of beauty and grace, where they were not fettered by religious or conventional restrictions, which places them above all ancient nations except the Greeks.

The Egyptians, like the Greeks in Homer's time and the Israelites till a late period of the monarchy, sat at meat instead of reclining. The Greeks sat in chairs, but the Egyptians on the ground, with the legs bent beneath them, or on a very low stool, sometimes only a mat or a carpet. The dishes therefore would be placed on a table slightly raised above the floor, as now practised in the East, or served round to each guest. Neither knives nor forks were in use, but spoons for eating and ladles for helping have been found. At entertainments, the guests, who were of both sexes, were anointed by the attendants before the feast began, and flowers were placed on their heads, around their necks and in their hands. From the history of Joseph we learn that at Pharaoh's court, it was the business of a chief of the culinary department to prepare pastry for the monarch's table; and the monuments prove that it was made with great care and fashioned into a variety of elegant forms. Except in this respect the Egyptian cookery appears to have been simple—fish, beef, and goose being the chief articles of food. Gazelles and kids are also seen in the hands of the cooks, preparing for the table. The wine and water were placed in porous jars, and the process of evaporation by which they were cooled was promoted by their being fanned. The water of the Nile was purified probably by mixing paste of almonds with it, according to the present practice. Music accompanied the feast; and the Egyptians, like the Greeks, appear to have amused themselves with gymnastic performers and jugglers, and the antics of dwarfs and deformed persons. With what religious rites their more solemn feasts were inaugurated we do not know; in the Ptolemaic times royal banquets appear to have been introduced by prayers for the welfare of the king and the prosperity of the kingdom. At the close of feasts among the wealthier classes, according to Herodotus, a figure of a mummy elaborately painted and gilded, a cubit in length, was carried round by an attendant, who thus addressed the guests: "Looking on this, drink and enjoy thyself; for such shalt thou be when thou art dead." This sounds like an Epicurean exhortation to the enjoyment of life; the same exhibition, however, was susceptible of a moral turn, such as Plutarch gives it. "The skeleton," says he, "which the Egyptians appropriately introduce at their banquets, exhorting the guests to remember that they shall soon be like him, though he comes as an unwelcome and unseasonable boon-companion, is nevertheless in a certain sense seasonable, if he exhorts them not to drink and indulge in pleasure, but to cultivate mutual friendship and affection, and not to render life, which is short in duration, long by evil deeds." This by no means implies that the Egyptians applied it to such a purpose, and he elsewhere speaks of the custom, like Herodotus, as designed to exhort the guests to the enjoyment of life.

An Egyptian custom, which appeared to Herodotus very remarkable, was that of singing a song in honor of Maneros. As he introduces the mention of it immediately after the carrying round of the image, and as Plutarch expressly says that it was used at their banquets, it is probable that it was one of their festive customs. Who Maneros was is variously explained. According to Herodotus, he was the only son of the first king of Egypt (by whom perhaps Osiris, not Menes, was originally intended,) and had died an untimely death. As the same strain, under the name of Linus, was sung by the Greeks, and under some other name by the Phenicians in their own country and in Cyprus, it is evident that the custom of singing it cannot have originated in the death of the only son of Menes. A mythic origin, from some circumstance which was equally interesting to the feelings of all those nations; is much more probable. Plutarch says Maneros was the son of the king of Byblos, involuntarily killed by Isis; and Linus was reputed to have been either the son of Apollo killed by Hercules, or of Urania killed by Apollo. Sappho conjoined Adonis and Linus in one lamentation, whence it is probable that both were personages of the same mythic character. The mourning rites which made a part of all the ancient religions have a primary reference to autumn and winter, when the sun appears to decline in vigor and be preparing for extinction, and vegetative power to be buried in the earth. As the song of Maneros was the most ancient and universal among the Egyptians, it was natural that its origin should be referred to the history of their first king. As the Maneros was a mournful strain, its use at banquets harmonized well with the exhibition of the skeleton or mummy—one reminding the guests of the transitory life of man, and the other of the short-lived beauty of the external world.

It has been generally thought that common life had a very grave and melancholy aspect among the Egyptians, who were oppressed and impoverished by the predominance of the priesthood. The insight which we have gained into their interior life, by means of the monuments, has shown that this was by no means the case. It is true that they had no theatre like the Greeks, no circus like the Romans: and that their public religious ceremonies were not diversified by exhibitions of strength and skill, of musical taste and literary ability like the great panegyrics of Greece. But the life of the people was not so monotonous as it has been supposed to be. We find in the grottoes of Benihasan not only representations of bodily contests, which were probably a part of the military training, but games carried on both by men and women, which are evidently the amusement of the people. In these paintings we see women, generally distinguished by a cap, from the back part of which two or three strings of twisted ribbon depend, playing with balls, sometimes as many as six at once, and engaged in trials of strength, which exhibit flexibility of the limbs in the most extraordinary degree. They make an arch of their inverted bodies, touching the ground with the feet and the back of the head, or stand on the head with the heels in the air. One couple are performing an evolution which is still common with children, locking their arms together behind and lifting each other, or rising from the ground, by bringing the feet and hands to meet. In these feats the women are dressed in tight pantaloons. Among other exercises and contests two men are seen playing at single-stick, their left arms being guarded by shields of wood fastened with straps similar to those which are worn in Italy at the present day, by the players at pallone. Another game is exhibited which is still in use; a man is stretched with his face on the ground, and two others, kneeling over him, strike him with their fists; he is required to guess which strikes him, and if he names the right person, the striker takes his place upon the ground. Others appear to be trying which can fling a pointed knife, so as to enter the most deeply into a block of wood, or raise a bag of sand and sustain it the longest with the uplifted arm. We know that in later times it was a common recreation of the Egyptians to go in boats upon the branches of the Nile in the Delta, or the lakes which it forms as it approaches the sea, and spend the day in festivity under the shade of the Egyptian bean, which grew to the height of many feet. Another amusement which they practised on the river was to man boats, and rowing them rapidly, to hurl or thrust javelins without points against each other as they passed. Such a scene is represented in one of the oldest monuments of Egypt, the tomb of Imai at Gizeh, and one of the parties has been thrown into the river by the shock. In another tomb at Kum-el-Ahmar, we see tables with refreshments spread upon them for the use of the parties engaged in the mimic contest. The young men of London in former times amused themselves with similar encounters on the Thames.

Dice have been found at Thebes, marked in the modern manner, but their age is uncertain. Their use must have been common in the time of Herodotus, since the priests represented Rhampsinitus as playing at dice with Ceres; and we may presume that they would not have given their mythé this form, had they known that the game was of very recent introduction. We do not, however, find any representation of it among the monuments. The account which Plutarch gives, of Mercury playing at dice with the moon and winning from her the five odd days of the year, is evidently a fiction of later times, and therefore furnishes no evidence of an ancient usage. But it appears from the monuments that a game answering to our draughts was in use in very remote ages. Plato attributes the invention both of dice and playing-tables to the Egyptians. In one of the grottoes of Benihasan two men appear seated on the ground with a low table between them, on which are arranged six green and six yellow pieces, all of the same form, with which they are evidently playing; in one instance the greens and yellows are arranged in lines before the respective players, in the other they are intermixed alternately through the whole length of the board. How the board was divided is not shown either here or in the palace of Rameses IV. at Medinet Aboo, where the king appears seated, and playing at this game with a female, probably a royal concubine, who stands before him. The game of mora played by the ancient Romans, and with such passionate eagerness by the modern Italians, was practised in Egypt. The tricks of the juggler also afforded them amusement; we see two men seated, with four inverted cups placed between them, and it is evident that the game consisted in guessing beneath which of the cups some object was concealed.

The vast difference between ancient and modern times, produced by language, religion, the art of war, the improvements in mechanics, cause them at first sight to seem separated by a gulf, in which all transmission of manners and customs is lost. This is especially the case in regard to ancient Egypt, whose peculiarities made it, even to the Greeks and Romans, a world apart from their own. The middle ages produced a similar apparent disruption between the Greek and Roman world and ours. The discovery of so much in Egyptian life, as revealed by the monuments, which closely resembles our own, restores the continuity of ages, and shows that the great revolutions which change the opinions and institutions of mankind and transfer power and civilization to distant regions, leave untouched and unchanged a great mass of the human race, among whom the customs of daily life are perpetuated, and by whose mediation the most distant times and countries are united.—Kenrick's Ancient Egypt under the Pharaohs.

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.

[From Redfield's "Comparative Physiognomy, or Resemblance between Men and Animals," a curious volume, by the way, we take the following remarks on the Aztec children, which show, at least, the author's very close observation of those remarkable specimens of humanity:]

Whoever has seen the "Aztec children," whatever may have been his speculations respecting them, will jump at the idea of their resemblance to mice. The feeling they awaken is a compound of repugnance, playfulness, curiosity, and fondness. But, however much, gentle reader, you may feel a disinclination to touch them, you will be ready to spring upon them as the embodiments of a truth, and clasp them to your hearts. Besides, if you are capable of seeing beauty in a mouse, with his peculiar habits, his confidence, his distrust, his audacity, his silken hair, his delicate structure, his active temperament, his tiny limbs, his round chest, his little big head, his sparkling black eyes, his disproportioned chops, in which mischief is concealed under gravity—if you are capable of sympathizing in his misfortunes, of desiring to protect him, or of a temptation to enlarge him when he has unluckily fallen into a trap—then you are capable of seeing beauty in the Aztec children, and of feeling an affection for them. You will have no disposition to call them fools: they are noodles.

Their resemblance to mice is in everything they do, and in every part from top to toe, but most in the countenance, and in those things which it is impossible for the artist to portray. The only correct impression that can be made upon them is upon the retina: a second-hand solar impression, like the daguerreotype, will never do. In the proportions of the jaws, in the peculiar form and expression of the mouth, in that nose, so full of fire, energy, and comicality, and in a certain something diffused over all so like what we discover in the mouse, we cannot fail to see a wonderful relation between the two. From such lips as those you argue a pair of incisors similar to those of a mouse: and the truth is, the boy, who has his second set, has but one pair of cutting-teeth in each jaw. To the exercise of gnawing we should imagine that nothing could be better suited than the cracker which constitutes their principal food. They are wonderfully mischievous, but not wilfully or maliciously so. The boy is fond of teasing his sister, of intermeddling, of having "a finger in the pie," but it is all for the sake of fun and frolic, the gratification of curiosity, the largest liberty, and the indulgence of the senses.

You must not look in their countenances for the expression of delight, so much as in their feet: their nether extremities are curiosities equal to those of the mouse, and the appearance and feeling of their hands confirm the resemblance. There is no warmth in them—they are like dead things; and though there is a certain glow in the countenance of the girl, it is too literally ruby to answer the expectation arising from the association of "ruby lips." If you would understand the strange sensation that is produced by contact, you can experience it by kissing the lips of a marble statue. Of this we are assured on good authority, for it is no unusual thing for matronly ladies to manifest the common fondness for children towards the girl Bartola. But the countenance of Maximo is absolutely dead, except a faint attempt at roguishness which may occasionally be discovered in the corners of his mouth. The greater amount of love which falls naturally to the female, gives a life-like appearance to the face of his sister, and thus an interest, which his has not.

There is no accounting for tastes except on principles of Physiognomy. People who resemble owls are attracted to the Aztecs, and find in them a gratification of their tastes and an ample field for the exercise of affection and fondness. The same is true of those who resemble cats. In the cat the qualities of the mouse are assimilated, and she can but love that which gratifies her, and which corresponds to the playfulness, the refinement, the cunning, and so many other things, in her own nature. The part of her nature that is not mouse is made up of a bird and fish, both of which she is exceedingly fond. That a cat is fond of mice in a higher sense than is usually understood, is manifest from the delighted expression of her eyes when she sees one, and from her playing with it before she appropriates its little flesh and bones to the gratification of appetite. You can see that the mouse "fills her eye," as something both good for food and fair to look upon. Thus it is that the eye expresses taste and appetite in relation to beauty and quality, which are in most cases inseparable. The little mouse appeals to the cat through her love of infants, which is wonderful; and it is affection, not hatred, in connection with her appetite, that makes her devour it. Females who resemble cats threaten to devour their little ones, play with them as a cat with a mouse, bite harder than they intend, and really feel as if it would be a pleasure to swallow them alive if there was not a higher law of nature, the "sovereignty of the individual" to oppose it. We saw one man in whom the Aztec children excited extraordinary affection and delight. He kissed the girl, was enthusiastic in his admiration of their beauty, and went into an ecstasy at the grace and liveliness of their manners. He had a very parental expression of countenance, and resembled a cat almost as much as the children resembled mice.

These children never walk; they always run. Explaining the constant flexure of their legs by the idea that they may have had the rheumatism some time or other, is ridiculous. Except when they jump, they run with a gliding motion, which requires a peculiar step, like that of the mouse. There is no elevation upon the toes, or from straightening of the limb, so that (as in the absence of locomotion, or of steps and paces) the attention is directed principally to the head, that glides mysteriously along, like a mouse, or like a ball that is kicked from one end of a room to the other; the force seems to be not in itself, but behind it, or out and around. The whole expression of the countenance is external, as if in the gratification of the senses it would spend its existence. In this, too, the Aztec children resemble mice. The first time we saw the boy Maximo, there was so little expression of internal consciousness, that we questioned whether he was alive. In our imagination he was the first man, made of red clay, with the life breathed into his nostrils, where it seemed to reside, but that he had not yet become a living soul. As for Bartola, she should be called "Undine," but how she crept into the soul of the author of that delightful story, it is impossible to conceive. We should not be more surprised to see her in a little chariot drawn by mice, than we were at the first sight of her. Poets may cease dreaming of fairies, for their dreams are realized. If spirits should claim that these were the first fruits of their endeavor to clothe themselves with material forms, we should be inclined to believe them.

But, seriously, these children do not seem like beings of flesh and blood. They may be taken for souls without bodies, or bodies without souls, whichever we please:—

"All eye, all ear, the disembodied soul!"— and that is what these Aztec children are, though it is pretty evident that their spirits are on the outside, and that their senses are external. Their spirits may be said to have "stepped out," and this gives the impression that they are dead. This, and the instant association of their features with the Aztec images, and with the sculptured heads on the Central-American ruins, to which they bear so striking a resemblance, impressed our minds with the idea that they were the work of some modern Prometheus who had discovered the art of creating human beings artificially. That grave countenance, like that of a graven image; those lively extremities, which might owe their activity to galvanism rather than to a head so motionless as theirs; those animated dead eyes; that stifled voice, extorted as it were by screws and pinching; that unearthly attempt to speak; those threads and hinges on which the motive power, whatever it is, is intended to operate—these, and other things too numerous to mention, constitute a resemblance to the mouse. On the whole, they are pretty little contrivances for the diversion of ladies and gentlemen, old and young.

A CHAPTER ON HORSES.

BY H. MILNOR CLAPP.

Of all four-footed brutes, over whom God has given man dominion, the condition of none is so superlatively wretched as that of the horse. A slave from the hour of his birth, in Christian climes, he is early taught to tremble at his master's voice, and as soon as his form begins to develop itself, his toils, his stripes, his privations begin. In the country, indeed, where policy teaches the man to take care of the brute, the situation of the latter is comparatively comfortable to that of his co-laborer in town. Just imagine, for a moment, that the numerous droves which are annually brought to the cities, could, upon the way, by miraculous agency, be made to comprehend the fate that awaits them in our streets, what a general stampede would instantly take place! The race of the Last of the Mammoths would be nothing in comparison; and if there should still exist, in the farthest limits of our late conquests, any fertile pastures yet unvisited by man, be sure that these elysiums of rest would be the fugitives' first abiding-place. Here and there, a pair of sleek nags, intended for some philanthropic gentleman's carriage—perhaps the President or Secretary of the Society for the Suppression of Cruelty to Animals—might be content to stand still on the road, weighing the prospect of ample feed and comfortable stabling, against long family-drives on a warm day, the abuse of deceitful grooms, or the hard hands into which their old age is to be consigned. But hacks of every order, from the omnibus and the livery stable, to the poor cart-drudge, would desperately fly the vision. If anything could add wings to the doctor's horse, it must be the odor of those horrid compounds which are to be forced down the poor creature's throat, upon the least symptom of a cough, or sign of flagging, since it is notorious that gentlemen of a profession, perhaps the best-informed in the community, are the very worst judges of horse-flesh, whether in condition, or out of it. The lawyer would, I think, fare better; inasmuch, as it is fair to infer, that some of the easy pickings of clients would, doubtless, fall on the ribs of his nag. The soldier would, of course, be compelled to fight solely on foot, for the dragoon would be dismounted, and the artillery drawn to battle by the legitimate objects of the instrument of death. The reverend clergy—despite the old fling at them, which is rank scandal—would be horsed and mounted like Mamelukes. Charcoal-men—offences of old date not being brought into the question—might, here and there, obtain a coley, but the fellows who hunt hickory-ashes, and the wretches who go about for slops, would be deservedly left in the lurch. The very scent of the villainous receptacles would turn the stomachs and tails of a thousand horses.

But it is, after all, the poor cart-horse, in all the varieties of his labors, which is worst treated in every particular. Why, even the sailor, who has little time to note abuses on shore, hardly used as he is on the rolling billow, has added his testimony to this fact, while humorously complaining, in doggerel verse, of his tough fare on shipboard.

"Old horse!" says the rhyme, apostrophizing a remarkably suspicious-looking piece of salt junk:

"Old horse! old horse! what brought you here?"

The miserable remains of poor Dobbin, thus conjured, is supposed to answer pathetically:

"From Sacarap to Portland pier,
I've carted stones for many a year,
'Till killed by blows and sore abuse,
They salted me down for sailors' use."

Mark the last two lines. Surely this is the most subtle of all evil treatment—this is, indeed, being pursued beyond the grave; to be killed by blows and sore abuse, and then salted down to feed sailors, as it were, if we are to believe the plain statements of Mr. Dana and others, that the sufferings of the old horse on dry land should be perpetuated on the seas, in the person of poor Jack. The Turks, or the Chinese, themselves, never dreamed of so ingenious a piece of barbarism. If the reader supposes that an attempt to create a smile is intended here, I entreat him to believe that he is mistaken. I take this opportunity, also, to assure the meek and patient witness of man's barbarity, that I am not

"An ignus fatuus, rose
To make me merry with his woes."

No! no! the animal's bucket is too full already, and not mine be the drop to cause it to run over.

It is some comfort to think that, degraded and abused as he is, the condition of the cart-horse has certainly, in some degree, improved within the past ten years. The eye is not as often offended with beholding in our streets, those deplorable specimens of attenuation, vulgarly known as "perambulating skeletons"—"bags of bones," "ribs of death," or "livery stable signs"—expressions of ridicule, under cover of which, unfortunately, the rascally driver too often escapes from the populace, with unbroken bones. Indeed, it is somewhat curious, that, although the lower orders are sufficiently ready to interfere with a brute for over-loading or otherwise ill-using, in public, a poor beast, they never meddle, save by a sneer, or a humorous sarcasm, with the right of the former to starve the latter by slow degrees, the direst of all deaths. I would respectfully call the attention of the Marshal's police to these public exhibitions of comparative anatomy, which are not only abominations in themselves, but may be said, in some sense, to clash with the regular schools. The drivers are, invariably, well fed, lazy rascals, always to be found adding their gross weight to that under which the poor creature is staggering. They often cunningly cover the animal with a ragged blanket, or a ruined coverlet, or some apparent defensible of that kind; but a single glance directed to the beast will discover the trick, and upon lifting the deceitful veil, the appealing ribs and pointed hip-bones will invariably be found beneath.

It is pleasant to turn from this "starved subject" to an anecdote or two, illustrative of the sagacity of the horse, when he, himself, having fallen into the hands of an easy, merciful owner, sets his equine wits to work to impose upon him.

My father once possessed two excellent horses which he used daily in his business—sometimes in single, and sometimes in double harness. One of these, called Black Jack, was a most knowing nag. He was a stout, round-flanked, compactly-built fellow, a good traveller, but sorely against his will. Unluckily for his love of ease, he was matched with a swift, free-going beast. Often I have seen him put back his ears, and reach over the shaft-pole to bite the near horse, when the latter was disposed to mend his gait on a frosty day. It was his custom never to forget a house where a visit had once been paid, and when he was travelling that street, long after attendance had ceased, it was necessary to watch him closely, to prevent his sheering suddenly into the curbstone. On an easy road, where the voice at its usual pitch could reach his ears, he apparently listened to every word of the conversation, in which he would become so much interested, that, if permitted, he would gradually come to a full stop. In winter, when the horses were chiefly used singly, on alternate days, he knew his day of rest better than the groom: and many a scuffle have I witnessed in his stall when he felt himself imposed upon in this important particular. In fact, as soon as he finished feeding in the morning, it was curious to see him watching the motions of the groom. He had a mild, intelligent eye—possessed of more expression than I remember ever to have remarked in a horse before. In this organ of his, I have certainly seen manifested at different moments of the same half-hour, expectation, satisfaction, fear, disappointment, and even fury. For instance, the man busies himself in cleaning up the stable, the eye of the horse follows his every movement; here was expectation plainly depicted in his sagacious looks and his erected ears. Next, the former approaches a horse in another manger, and lays his hand on his halter; Black Jack's ears droop at their tips, and, with a complacent roll of his clear, gray eye, he thrusts his nose down for a grain or two of corn, which had previously escaped his lips in the angles of the trough; here was satisfaction also clearly shown in his demeanor, and, in the loose, lazy way in which he held himself up in the stall. Presently the groom appears to be in doubt, and coming in front of the nags, rubs his head as he cogitates which of the three must go; Black Jack looks sideways at him in so droll a way, that the fellow laughs to himself: here was fear. At last the man makes up his mind, and taking down Jack's collar, approaches him warily, assured from his sulky look that the brute will make him feel his teeth, if he loses sight of his eye for a moment; here was disappointment which often ended in a fight, during which the animal sometimes became outrageous. At last he is subdued, harnessed, and brought out into the yard, where he stands sulkily enough, watching an opportunity to run back into his stall. However, the stable-door is now closed, and the groom is shifting himself in the carriage-house, a window of which looks on the yard. At this moment, perhaps, the kitchen-door opens, and a female servant comes out. The horse instantly shows his teeth, stamps on the bricks, and makes a great show of attacking her. She screams and retreats: he chases her the length of the yard, and out comes the groom, sending his voice before him. After this heroic explosion of spleen, Black Jack stands quiet and disconsolate enough, or else he walks to the window of the carriage-house, and looks in to see, perhaps, if the man's heart will not relent, after all. Receiving another rebuff, he returns to his former position, and hearing now the carriage-house doors open, listens intently. Catching the rumble of the vehicle descending into the alley, he puts back his ears, shakes his head viciously, and charges the dog-house to the great dissatisfaction of Carlo, who, though ready for fun in any shape, has no idea of having his domicile demolished. At length the groom throws open the gate, and Jack turns short round facing the upper end of the yard, as if determined not to see him.

"Come out here," cries the man, who is, perhaps, a few moments behind his time.

The horse tacitly refuses to stir.

"Do you hear there, you rascal?" says the man, equally resolute not to go after him, "come out."

But the horse is looking intently at the kitchen windows, and pays not the least regard to the invitation. The cook grins with her head out of the door; Carlo, by his drooping crest and fearful look, shows that he has doubts whether he is not, somehow, involved in the difficulty; and in the end, another race ensues up the yard, when Jack is captured and led off: the groom, grumbling out his belief, that such a horse is not to be found without the precincts of a circus wall. He was certainly made to go through the world easily, since the person in whose possession he passed in the course of time, informed me that now, at the age of twenty, he is as lazy and as full of finesse as ever.

Occasionally, the horse, though descended from a respectable stock, evinces, from the days of his colthood, a ferocious and unconquerable spirit. An acquaintance of mine, a farmer, in Montgomery county, of this State, once reared a colt, whose intractable disposition proved too much for the whole township. He passed into numerous hands, and was finally sold, for a song, to a Dutch drover. It was a peculiarity of this horse, that he never would allow a man to enter his stall, without attacking him with the utmost ferocity. Several times he put the farmer's life in imminent danger, and once, when by some artifice his neck was secured in a cow-chain, I saw him, by main force, tear the chain from its fastening, and make the whole strength of the farm flee. This horse showed a curious degree of affection to a ram, who came on the farm in company with a cow, purchased from a drove. The ram afterwards attached himself on the pastures to the colt, moved, perhaps, by certain points of resemblance in their character, for the former himself was a very Ajax, easily incited to combat, and in his rage as blind as a wall. He would assault, on provocation, or from sheer caprice, any object on the premises, from the great lord of the pastures, himself, down to a turkey-gobbler. So long as this ram was at the side of the horse, you might safely put the latter in gears, and work him, but if Brimstone—as he was called from his color, to say nothing of his character—once missed his trusty friend, in the words of the farmer, who spoke English indifferently, he was almost certain "to make pieces." The ram, on this account, as well as for his own formidable aspect, was a creature of consequence in the vicinity, and well he knew it. If the horse was to be caught in the field, Brom was to be consulted; if he was to be placed in gears, Brom must stand by the traces; if he was to be mounted, and the rider retain his seat, Brom must lend his countenance to the scene. Often have I suppressed a smile to encounter the worthy old gentleman, attired in his broad-rimmed hat and round gray coat, mounted on Brimstone's back, en route for church—the ram, who had been coaxed to the creek, and washed snow-white, the evening before, trotting alongside, with the gravity of Dean Swift, himself. But the most farcical scene of all, was to see Brimstone, with the other horses, hitched to the threshing-machine, when a stack of rye was to be cleaned. On these occasions, Brom was first to be bribed into the ring, with a handful of corn: he was then to be seized, and hoisted upon a platform, to which he was securely strapped. Here, after a few useless interjections, he sat munching his corn, and look sagely on, while the horses passed under him in a continuous circle, until the day's operations were completed. It was remarked that he added his voice to the cries by which the horses were stopped and set in motion again, from the threshing-floor, and, when released from his post of observation, it was necessary to watch him, as he always directly offered battle to a patient little pony, running back to obtain the vantage-ground for a tilt, shaking his hard head, and bleating out his warcy, in a most ridiculous way. The farmer supposed, with reason, that Brom had, somehow, got a notion into his crooked pate, that the little Canadian, who took his part in the labor of the day, was the instigator of his elevation. Nevertheless, I am inclined to think that he singled him out because, as Sam Weller says "somebody was to be whopped," and the pony, from his diminutive size, was the fairest mark. However, upon other occasions, Brom showed no such prudent preferences, having, as I have already hinted, a heart like a lion, and a head like the anvil of Cyclops. I have more to say of Brimstone and Brom, which, however, I must defer to another chapter.

PARISIAN DWELLINGS.

The different manner in which the Anglo-American and the Gaul build their family nests, is pointedly brought home to the former the night of his arrival at Paris. We live in perpendicular strata: they in horizontal. Our houses stand side by side, each like a tub on its own bottom. Theirs, so far as relate to families, are spread one upon the other, like a pile of gingerbread. With the exception of the principal hotels, and a few recently constructed in the English mode, Parisian houses are arranged after the following fashion: In general, they form a hollow square, allowing a court-yard of sufficient size for a carriage to turn. This shape admits of two ranges of apartments, equivalent in accommodations to houses with us: the one facing the street, the other the court-yard, the kitchen and other conveniences being the two connecting arms. Houses thus constructed accommodate two families on each floor, and are from five to nine stories high. The ground floor is devoted to shops, stables, and the porter's quarters. It is entered by a huge "porte cochere," which is always guarded by the family of the concierge, who act as agents for the proprietors in letting their apartments, and watch all the outgoings and incomings of the mansion. Each range has its wide circular staircase for the gentry, leading as high up as what was once considered the only abode of genius, and another—small, dark, and narrow, like the worm of a ramrod—for the use of domestics.

The porter must be on the "qui vive" at all hours of the twenty-four, to slip back the bolt of the outer door, by means of a string connected with his office, upon the warning ring or cry "Le corden, s'il vous plait." Those who enter after midnight, bestow trilling gratuity upon this Argus, to compensate him for disturbed slumbers. He replies to all questions relating to his charge, pays postages, receives and distributes all letters and parcels that have owners within his domain, uses your fuel as if it were his own, and is always ready to do the amiable—for a consideration.

The floor above the entrance is called the "entresol," being, as its name indicates, between sun and earth, and it is generally inaccessible to the former, at any season of the year, except in the widest streets or avenues. Being low, it rents low, compared with the floor above, which forms the apartment Number 1, in height, finish and decoration, and is, consequently, much the dearest. They then progressively decline in price each story, and also in quality, until they terminate under the roof in a series of little chambers, for the servants of the mansion, two or more of these rooms belonging to each apartment.

The apartments themselves are of every variety and size, to meet the wants of the diversified positions of the inhabitants of this metropolis. Some are of sufficient grandeur and sumptuousness to rival the interior of the more pretending hotels, while others dwindle to the means of the most economical bachelor or money-saving grisette.

This mode of building has some prominent advantages over ours. Externally the houses are more uniform, of greater size, are being built of a soft, grey sandstone, and admit of more architectural ornament. They economize also in ground-room and material, consequently in rent. All the rooms of a family being on one floor, much of the stair work, of which our ladies complain, is saved. In enumerating these advantages, I have enumerated all, unless it may be considered one to be able to bring together the different branches of a family under one roof.

The disadvantages are more palpable. Each floor having its separate kitchen and drains, contributes its quota to an assemblage of odors, based upon the fragrance of shops or stables beneath, which, in spite of locks and bolts, penetrate with an impartial distribution into every room. This nuisance is not always perceptible, but it is a daily liability; and the plain truth is, that there are few of these gregarious habitations that do not give offence to sensitive nostrils more than once during every twenty-four hours. This fact has doubtless some relation to the enormous consumption of perfumery, which, not unfrequently in the street, overpowers all other smells, as the scented individual goes by.

Again, no amount of cleanliness in one story can always be proof against a want of neatness in the next. If one family cooks onions, the neighbors above and below are brought into unmistakable cognizance of the fact. If there be a frolic overhead, the family beneath participate in the noise, without the fun. There lived in the apartment below me a young lady who, for five months, with scarcely the intermission of a day, practiced on the piano, from four o'clock until midnight, and often until two o'clock in the morning. She played and sang delightfully, or otherwise I should have wished myself deaf. In a city where revolutions have become as periodical and necessary as measles, chicken-pox, and hooping-cough to childhood, this species of family roosting has inconveniences sometimes of a graver nature. A few shots fired on the 4th of December last, upon the soldiers, from the upper stories of some houses on the Boulevards, caused a return of ball, grape and musket shot, which lasted an hour, broke in their fronts, riddled them in every part, the inmates escaping how they could. (One individual has it in his power to compromise a hundred lives.

Although this multiplying of families under one roof may be considered as a species of architectural communism, it is very far from being a social one. No one knows his neighbor. There is no door-plate on the several landings, to satisfy curiosity as to who is to be found within. Somehow or other, the occupants never seem to meet on the common stairway. Of the seven families beside my own that occupied No. — of Rue de —, for six months, I knew nothing except that one was English, and another Russian. I could not have distinguished a single member of them all from a casual visitor. It is said that two friends lived for a year in the same house without being aware of the fact, until they accidentally met in the street, and inquired each other's address.

A French kitchen is more like a ship's caboose in size, than the domains of an American cook. What room there is, is mainly occupied by numerous little grates, raised upon a brick platform, and adapted in size to the various copper, "casserolle" or saucepans, so necessary for the preparation of the indispensable "entremets," of French cooking. A Yankee cook would be as much at a loss in one of these kitchens as she would be over a locomotive. One half of the ingenuities of our American furnishing warehouses, would be equally as inexplicable to a French housekeeper. A good broom is not to be found in Paris. Carpets have been introduced into the apartments rented to English and Americans, but the French make but comparatively little use of them, preferring the waxed oak floors, which are cooler and cleaner, but require no little care, at first, for a stranger to preserve his equilibrium. The French use much less fuel than we, warming themselves more by extra clothing and foot-muffs, than by fires.—Parisian Sights and French Principles, seen through American Spectacles.

HOME.—The pain which is felt when we are first transplanted from our native soil, when the living branch is cut from the parent tree, is one of the most poignant which we have to endure through life. There are after griefs which wound more deeply, which leave behind them scars never to be effaced, which bruise the spirit and sometimes break the heart; but never do we feel so keenly the want of love, the necessity of being loved, and the utter sense of desertion, as when we first leave the haven of home, and are, as it were, pushed off upon the stream of life.

When a man readily gives ear to a calumny, he betrays fellow-feeling with the malignity whence it sprang.

THE SEER GIFT.

I proceed to mention a physical phenomenon, which from time to time occurred to the late historian and novelist, Heinrich Zschokke. It is described by him in a sort of autobiography, entitled Selbstschau, which he published a few years ago. It was only last year that Zschokke died, having attained a good old age. Early brought into public life in the troubles of Switzerland, and afterwards maintaining his place in public consideration by his numerous writings, he was personally widely known: he was universally esteemed a man of strict veracity and integrity. He writes thus of himself:—

"If the reception of so many visitors was sometimes troublesome, it repaid itself occasionally either by making me acquainted with remarkable personages, or by bringing out a wonderful sort of seer-gift, which I called my inward vision, and which has always remained an enigma to me. I am almost afraid to say a word upon this subject; not for fear of the imputation of being superstitious, but lest I should encourage that disposition in others; and yet it forms a contribution to psychology. So to confess.

"It is acknowledged that the judgment which we form of strangers, on first meeting them, is frequently more correct than that which we adopt upon a longer acquaintance with them. The first impression which, through an instinct of the soul, attracts one towards, or repels one from, another, becomes, after a time, more dim, and is weakened, either through his appearing other than at first, or through our becoming accustomed to him. People speak, too, in reference to such cases of involuntary sympathies and aversions, and attach a special certainty to such manifestations in children, in whom knowledge of mankind by experience is wanting. Others, again, are incredulous, and attribute all to physiognomical skill. But of myself.

"It has happened to me occasionally, at the first meeting with a total stranger, when I have been listening in silence to his conversation, that his past life, up to the present moment, with many minute circumstances belonging to one or other particular scene in it, has come across me like a dream, but distinctly, entirely, involuntarily, and unsought, occupying in duration a few minutes. During this period I am usually so plunged into the representation of the stranger's life, that at last I neither continue to see distinctly his face, on which I was idly speculating, nor to hear intelligently his voice, which at first I was using as a commentary to the text of his physiognomy. For a long time I was disposed to consider these fleeting visions as a trick of the fancy; the more so that my dream-vision displayed to me the dress and movements of the actors, the appearance of the room, the furniture, and other accidents of the scene, till, on one occasion, in a gamesome mood, I narrated to my family the secret history of a sempstress who had just before quitted the room. I had never seen the person before. Nevertheless the hearers were astonished, and laughed, and would not be persuaded but that I had a previous acquaintance with the former life of the person, inasmuch as what I had stated was perfectly true. I was not less astonished to find that my dream-vision agreed with reality. I then gave more attention to the subject, and, often as propriety allowed of it, I related to those whose lives had so passed before me the substance of my dream-vision, to obtain from them its contradiction or confirmation. On every occasion its confirmation followed, and not without amazement on the part of those who gave it.

"Least of all could I myself give faith to these conjuring tricks of my mind. Every time that I described to any one my dream-vision respecting him, I confidently expected him to answer it was not so. A secret thrill always came over me when the listener replied, 'It happened as you say;' or when, before he spoke, his astonishment betrayed that I was not wrong. Instead of recording many instances, I will give one which, at the time, made a strong impression upon me.

"On a fair day, I went into the town of Waldshut, accompanied by two young foresters who are still alive. It was evening, and, tired with our walk, we went into an inn called the Vine. We took our supper with a numerous company at the public table; when it happened that they made themselves merry over the peculiarities and simplicity of the Swiss, in connexion with the belief in Mesmerism, Lavater's physiognomical system, and the like. One of my companions, whose national pride was touched by their railery, begged me to make some reply, particularly in answer to a young man of superior appearance, who sat opposite, and had indulged in unrestrained ridicule. It happened that the events of this very person's life had just previously passed before my mind. I turned to him with the question, whether he would reply to me with truth and candor, if I narrated to him the most secret passages of his history, he being as little known to me as I to him? That would, I suggested, go something beyond Lavater's physiognomical skill. He promised, if I told the truth, to admit it openly. Then I narrated the events with which my dream-vision had furnished me, and the table learnt the history of the young tradesman's life, of his school years, his peccadilloes, and, finally, of a little act of roguery committed by him on the strong box of his employer. I described the uninhabited room with its white walls, where, to the right of the brown door, there had stood upon the table the small black money-chest, &c. A dead silence reigned in the company during this recital, interrupted only when I occasionally asked if I spoke the truth. The man, much struck, admitted the correctness of each circumstance—even, which I could not expect, of the last. Touched with his frankness, I reached my hand to him across the table, and closed my narrative. He asked my name, which I gave him. We sat up late in the night conversing. He may be alive yet.

"Now I can well imagine how a lively imagination could picture, romance-fashion, from the obvious character of a person, how he would conduct himself under given circumstances. But whence came to me the involuntary knowledge of accessory details, which were without any sort of interest, and respected people who for the most part were utterly indifferent to me, with whom I never had, nor wished to have, the slightest association? Or was it in each case mere coincidence? Or had the listener, to whom I described his history, each time other images in his mind than the accessory ones of my story, but, in surprise at the essential resemblance of my story to the truth, lost sight of the points of difference? Yet, I have, in consideration of this possible source of error, several times taken pains to describe the most trivial circumstances that my dream-vision has shown me.

"Not another word about this strange seer-gift, which I can aver was of no use to me in a single instance, which manifested itself occasionally only, and quite independently of any violation, and often in relation to persons in whose history I took not the slightest interest. Nor am I the only one in possession of this faculty. In a journey with two of my sons, I fell in with an old Tyrolese who travelled about, selling lemons and oranges, at the inn at Unterhauerstein in one of the Jura passes. He fixed his eyes for some time upon me, joined in our conversation, observed that though I did not know him he knew me, and began to describe my acts and deeds, to the no little amusement of the peasants and astonishment of my children, whom it interested to learn that another possessed the same gift as their father. How the old lemon-merchant acquired his knowledge, he was not able to explain to himself nor to me. But he seemed to attach great importance to his hidden wisdom. Zschokke told a friend of mine at Frankfurt, in 1847, shortly before his death, which took place at an advanced age, that in the latter years of his life his seer-gift had never manifested itself."—Mayo's Popular Superstitions.

A MAN CHAINED TO A BALL.

I was a boy once. I would be happy, indeed, could I say that, as I became a man, I put away boyish things, and that I have now now entered upon my duties and my responsibilities as only a man may. But I have one boyish thing about me yet, and it is in this wise:—I was once passing the barrack-yard in the city of Quebec, and hearing the sound as of soldiers, marching, I climbed up the wall and peeped over. There were a company of soldiers, and, a short distance in advance of them, a single private with a large cannon-ball chained to his foot. He had been guilty of some misdemeanor, and was condemned to the task of parading a certain number of hours each day, with this irksome companion. And as I have grown older and learned to think for myself, I have applied its moral in some cases which have come under my observation.

When I see a young man, just on the threshold of life, loitering away his time in unprofitable amusements and unworthy associations, which consume his precious seed-time, and burden him with evil influences which will probably go with him, and form a thorny pillow when he lies in the silent grave, I think that he is chaining himself to a ball.

When a young man cuts off the restraints of early impressions, and enters the bar-room, there to spend his evenings, and perhaps his nights, in dissipation and companionship with sinners, whose god is Bacchus, and whose oblations are profane jests and godless sneers and licentious songs, I turn aside and weep, that he will madly forge and weld the links with which he is chaining himself to a ball.

When I see a young man elastic with hope, whose path points to certain success, or to undying fame, seeking relaxation from the fatigues of business or the application of a student's life, at the gaming-table, or the theatre, or on the bosom of unhallowed delights, I do verily feel assured that that man is chaining himself to a ball which will roll with its victim into a premature grave.

When I see a man suffering important engagements to slip by without fulfilment, from a habit of carelessness or a want of energy, I feel assured that experience will ere long prove to him that he has been chaining himself to a ball.

When a young man runs into debt, and is negligent of paying his obligations when due, or lets his business take care of itself while he is attending to trifling employments, he will find to his sorrow, that he has been chaining himself to a ball.

When a young man forms a habit of extravagance and of living beyond his means, and thus squanders the bounties put into his hand for a virtuous and faithful stewardship, he will find that he is wasting the uncreated capital of a future which is not his, and is, moreover, chaining himself to a ball which will grow more rusty and burdensome every day.

And I have seen young women, too, who have bound themselves by a gilded chain to a ponderous ball.

When I see a young woman, bright in all the loveliness of virgin prime, spending her time and consuming her intellect in chasing the fictions of the novel or the follies of the romance, oh! how gladly would I break the chain which binds her to such a ball!

When I see a young woman neglecting the duties of the fireside, which should be a little paradise of bliss, and threading the mazy walks of the gossip and the tale-bearer, or walking through the highway, "that she may be seen of men," I say to myself, "She is chaining herself to a ball."

When that fair maiden looks into her mirror and admires the beauty pictured there, and sets her heart on its outward adornment, I think she, too, is chaining herself to a ball.

When, in short, I see a young woman spending her time in that which profiteth not, under the teachings and allurements of vanity or fashion, I cannot avoid saying to myself, "She is chaining herself to a ball."

Reader! old or young—man or woman—take those chains off your aching limbs, and be free! —From "Little Silverstring and other Stories."

When you build selfishly, you build frailly. When your acts are hostile to the broad interests of your fellow-men, they are seed which will one day come up weeds, to choke your own harvest-field.

THE TWO HOMES.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"Oh! if the soul immortal be,
Is not its love immortal too?"

See'st thou my home?—'tis where yon woods are wa-ing,
In their dark richness, to the summer air,
Where yon blue stream, a thousand flower-banks laving,

Leads down the hills a vein of light—'tis there'
'Midst those green wilds how many a fount lies gleaming,
Fringed with the violet, color'd with the skies!
My boyhood's haunt, through days of summer dreaming,
Under young leaves that shook with melodies.

My home! the spirit of its love is breathing
In every wind that plays across my track;
From its white walls the very tendrils wreathing,
Seem with soft links to draw the wanderer back.

There am I loved—there pray'd for—there my mother
Sits by the hearth with meekly thoughtful eye;
There my young sisters watch to greet their brother—

Soon their glad footsteps down the path will fly.

There, in sweet strains of kindred music blending,
All the home-voices meet at day's decline;
One are those tones, as from one heart ascending,—
There laughs my home—sad stranger! where is thine!

Ask'st thou of mine?—In solemn peace 'tis lying,
Far o'er the deserts and the tombs away;
'Tis where I, too, am loved with love undying,
And fond hearts wait my step—But where are they?

Ask where the earth's departed have their dwelling;

As' of the clouds, the stars, the trackless air!
I know it not, yet trust the whisper, telling
My lonely heart, that love unchanged is there.

And what is home, and where, but with the loving?

Happy thou art, that so canst gaze on thine!
My spirit feels but, in its weary roving,
That with the dead, where'er they be, is mine.

Go to thy home, rejoicing son and brother!
Bear in fresh gladness to the household scene!
For me, too, watch the sister and the mother,
I well believe—but dark seas roll between.

A FACT.

In his studio, at Florence,
Sat an artist, young and fair,
Writing, by the waxen taper,
Words to lighten lonely care.
Suddenly he fell to weeping,
Rose, and hurried to and fro;
Then, returning to his table,
Thus he wrote, with soul aglow:

"Lady, would that I, a spirit,
In the twinkling of an eye,
O'er the wide and weary ocean,
Unto you alone could fly.
Be you waking, be you sleeping,
Lonely, or in social cheer,

I would breathe to you a wonder
You would smile and weep to hear.

"Five the weeks, this flitting moment,
Since we sat together last,
And your eyes, in love and pity,
On my longing face were cast;
In your warm and soothing fingers
Chilly hands were purely pressed,
And I felt, in such compassion,
Wretchedness itself were blessed.

"Long I gazed on you in silence,
Printing deeply in my heart
Every look and line of feature,
With a lover's truest art;
Much I wished to pour my feeling
Forth in tears of sweet relief;
But my soul was dark and stifled,
Sealed the bitter fount of grief.

"Vainly, until now, my fancy
Strove to see that look again;
Still the misty, changing image
Came and went to me in vain;
Still a hundred other faces
Intervened to vex mine eye,
And my soul, with sorrow sinking,
Would not weep, I knew not why.

"But, to-night, my pen had wandered
From the duty of the day,
And unconsciously was sketching
Random faces, in its play:
Suddenly of you I pondered—
Ah! some angel present then
Breathed on me an inspiration,
Guided my unwitting pen.

"There you were! the half-shut eyelids,
Head inclined and turned aside,
Rounded cheek and hair so silken,
Rounded forehead, high and wide;
There the smile serene, eternal;
There the glance that ne'er was cast
Save by you—so melting, earnest—
Ah! I wept and wept, at last."

Here he dropped his pen in wonder,
While a feeling, sweet and new,
Like a sudden light and music,
Thrilled his lonely being through.
Afterward, a message told him,
She, the loved one, died that night,
And he knew that then her spirit
Flew to him with love and light.

WASHINGTON'S WATCH.—The Christian Watchman relates the following striking anecdote of Washington, in illustration of the practical good sense which he manifested in everything. The incident speaks volumes upon the character of the Father of his Country: "His personal friend, Gouverneur Morris, was about going to Europe, and Washington, along with several letters of introduction, gave him this charge, 'to buy him at Paris, a flat gold watch; not the watch of a fool, or of a man who desires to make a show, but of which the interior construction shall be extremely well cared for, and the exterior air very simple.'
What a mine of wisdom do these words suggest about men as well as watches, 'the interior well cared for, and the exterior air very simple!' Boys and girls, remember Washington's watch, and be just like it yourselves!"

THE FAIRY WIFE.

AN APOLOGUE.

A merchant married a Fairy. He was so manly, so earnest, so energetic, and so loving, that her heart was constrained toward him, and she gave up her heritage in Fairyland to accept the lot of woman.

They were married; they were happy; and the early months glided away like the vanishing pageantry of a dream.

Before the year was over he had returned to his affairs; they were important and pressing, and occupied more and more of his time. But every evening as he hastened back to her side she felt the weariness of absence more than repaid by the delight of his presence. She sat at his feet, and sang to him, and prattled away the remnant of care that lingered in his mind.

But his cares multiplied. The happiness of many families depended on him. His affairs were vast, and complicated, and they kept him longer away from her. All the day, while he was amidst his bales of merchandise, she roamed along the banks of a sequestered stream, weaving bright fancy pageantries, or devising airy gaieties with which to charm his troubled spirit. A bright and sunny being, she comprehended nothing of care. Life was abounding in her. She knew not the disease of reflection; she felt not the perplexities of life. To sing and to laugh—to leap the stream and beckon him to leap after her, as he used in the old lover-days, when she would conceal herself from him in the folds of a water-lily—to tantalize and enchant him with a thousand coqueties—this was her idea of how they should live; and when he gently refused to join her in these childlike gambols, and told her of the serious work that awaited him, she raised her soft blue eyes to him in a baby wonderment, not comprehending what he meant, but acquiescing, with a sigh, because he said it.

She acquiesced, but a soft sadness fell upon her. Life to her was Love, and nothing more. A soft sadness also fell upon him. Life to him was Love, and something more: and he saw with regret that she did not comprehend it. The wall of Care, raised by busy hands, was gradually shutting him out from her. If she visited him during the day, she found herself a hindrance, and retired. When he came to her at sunset he was pre-occupied. She sat at his feet, loving his anxious face. He raised tenderly the golden ripple of loveliness that fell in ringlets on her neck, and kissed her soft, beseeching eyes, but there was a something in his eyes, a remote look, as if his soul were afar, busy with other things, which made her little heart almost burst with uncomprehended jealousy.

She would steal up to him at times when he was absorbed in calculations, and throwing her arms round his neck, woo him from his thought. A smile, revealing love in its very depths, would brighten his anxious face, as for a moment he pushed aside the world, and concentrated all his being in one happy feeling.

She could win moments from him, she could not win his life; she could charm, she could not occupy him! The painful truth came slowly over her, as the deepening shadows fall upon a sunny Day, until at last it is Night: Night with her stars of infinite beauty, but without the lustre and warmth of Day.

She drooped; and on her couch of sickness her keen-sighted love perceived, through all his ineffable tenderness, that same remoteness in his eyes, which proved that, even as he sat there grieving and apparently absorbed in her, there still came dim remembrances of Care to vex and occupy his soul.

"It were better I were dead," she thought; "I am not good enough for him."

Poor child! Not good enough, because her simple nature knew not the manifold perplexities, the hindrances of incomplete life! Not good enough, because her whole life was scattered!

And so she breathed herself away, and left her husband to all his gloom of Care, made tenfold darker by the absence of those gleams of tenderness which before had fitfully irradiated life. The night was starless, and he alone.—London Leader.

HEALTHY AND WARM.

A leading concern of that portion of mankind living on the two sides of the tropics, is to keep themselves comfortably warm. Our forefathers, in this country, cut down the stately forests, and gave us warmth, without destroying the healthfulness of the air. The immortal Franklin economised in fuel without contaminating the nectar of life. After his departure the air was no longer considered sacred. Box and air-tight stoves committed all manner of sacrileges—polluted and poisoned the precious aerial fluid, and thereby carried disease and death into thousands of families. The upper part of ceiled rooms became a reservoir of deleterious fumes and gases. The heads of those six feet high moved in an atmosphere much more heated than those on less elevated shoulders, and the babies frosted their toes. Headaches and other aches and ills were increasingly common without the cause being known. Thousands of citizens have thus been yearly making inroads on their health simply by not attending to the proper mode of warming and ventilating their apartments.

Not until the introduction of heated air by furnaces placed in the lower part of the building, was any considerable attention paid to ventilation. The cast iron furnace, well lined to prevent excess of heat, is inclosed in a chamber of masonry, into which a stream of pure air, from without the building, is constantly rushing, and keeping up a lively intermixture with the heated portions and the evaporations from water. At the same time pipes from the upper parts of the chamber are conveying the warm June air into the apartments by beautifully designed registers, placed at the mouth or end of the pipes near the floor, to regulate the quantity of heated air. A tight room soon becomes heated. We must now have two ventilators connected by the same flue or chimney, one near the floor and the other at the highest part of the room. If we open the upper one, the warm air at the top will flow out, and thus we shall breathe a constantly changing air of the same temperature. If we wish to retain heat and keep up circulation, open the lower register. The theory is a beautiful one, and should form the text of a familiar lecture in every family. If parents and teachers would make use of more household texts, the taste for science and art would be more general, and health would become more a subject of enlightened regard and study. Young people should be taken to our Industrial Exhibitions, to obtain useful knowledge as well as to see the pretty and wondrous. It is injurious to bring up youth amidst the wonders of art without teaching them to investigate. Take, for instance, Mr. Culver's large and splendid exhibition at the recent Fair, consisting of Hot Air Furnaces, 37 ornamental Patent Registers, an artistical Pedestal Register, a beautiful Fire Place Register, and four Cooking Ranges, with their various appurtenances. In this single exhibition of Mr. Culver was a subject for familiar lectures for a week. Let the learners be taken to the extensive wholesale and retail warehouse, 52 Cliff street. Let the principles of the furnaces be explained to them. Let them inquire whether the iron of which they are made is American or foreign, the weight of iron in each furnace, the number sold yearly, the comparative cheapness and advantages of this mode of warming apartments, the improvements that have been made, and the number of men employed in the establishment. Let them be required to copy the numerous and handsome engravings of the various furnaces and registers, and to thoroughly understand the principles of their operation. Such a lesson, well learned, would be of more service throughout life, than six months of mere book education. The statistics of this one establishment would greatly enlarge their ideas of the magnitude of American manufacturing interests.

It is to be hoped that those who attend to the wants of the poor during the present winter, will keep a kindly eye to this subject. A single ventilator may be a most invaluable gift. A single hint may bring in a flood of light, and be health, meat and drink to a whole family.—N. Y. Farmer and Mechanic.

LANGUAGE OF AMERICAN INDIANS.

I have often heard the remark, that it is a great pity some man of science and perseverance does not devote some years to acquiring the different Indian languages, and trying to form some general hypothesis of their origin, from the different customs and traditions extant amongst them. This is very true, and is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but the extraordinary number and complexity of the languages of the Aborigines of America, north and south, completely put it out of the power of one, or even of a dozen philologists, to perform properly. There are as many languages spoken amongst the two or three millions of American savages scattered over the two continents of America, as amongst the six hundred millions of human beings composing the population of the rest of the globe. There are no less than 211 languages spoken in the northern continent and Mexico; 44 in central, and 168 in the southern continent of America. There are thus, according to Vatel, nearly 500 distinct dialects spoken in the New World, without enumerating any which do not differ from each other as widely as the Spanish from the Italian, or the German from the Dutch. After a laborious comparison of the 500 known languages of America with those of the Old World, only some hundred or so words have been found having any distinct, or rather indistinct resemblance. Those few words have been selected from nearly 100 American languages, and are said to bear a kind of resemblance to words at present used in the Mongol, Tonguse, and other northern Asiatic nations; some few also bear a slight resemblance to words in the Celtic and Biscayan languages. These trifling and most probably fortuitous resemblances, although affording a slight foundation on which any number of theoretical superstructures may be raised, are quite insufficient to be of any use in solving the problem, as to how the American continent was peopled. The more an unprejudiced person examines the numerous theories on the subject, the more completely must he be convinced that the data and facts upon which the different theories are founded are insufficient for conclusive argument.—Sullivan's Rambles and Scrambles in North and South America.

IDLENESS A SIN AGAINST OURSELVES AND OTHERS.

[A fair correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator writes thus, in the Lady's Department of that paper:—]

DEAR COUSINS OF THE CULTIVATOR:—Not long since, I heard a lady express a sentiment which suggested a train of thought, which I hope has not proved altogether unprofitable to me; therefore, I will give it you.

A young girl, who had a few months previously returned from school, casually remarked that she had thought of teaching. She said that by working a little harder she might have time—that she did not think it was right for any one to neglect the opportunity where good, in however small a degree, might be the result of their labors, merely because it was "pleasant to be idle," and that teaching was, when entered into with the right spirit, profitable alike to teacher and pupil.

"Indeed, I would do no such thing," said the lady. "I would advise you not. Your father is able to support you without, as long as you will want to stay with him. It is folly for those in your circumstances to think of making such slaves of themselves, when they might live in ease and comfort without."

Do not the principles expressed by this "lady" too often make a nonentity, I might almost say, of those sufficiently endowed, naturally, to become ornaments to society and their sex? Ask history, ask your own consciences whether it were more desirable to become an intelligent, self-relying woman, than a "nice lady," with all her dainty privileges. Would Mrs. Martha

Washington now occupy the place she does in the respect of the nation, had she been afraid of the sight of a cannon, or too "sensitive" to meet, with ready and willing heart and hands, the trying realities and vicissitudes of the times, as well as assume with all honor the courtly graces befitting her station?

An intelligent woman, of our own times, very pertinently remarks:—"We seem to be merging, in every branch of reform, to a 'crisis,' which, I apprehend, is to induce an entire change, to usher in a new era in the world's history; and there never was a time when woman was called upon so peremptorily to act well her part, as now in the great moral revolution which is upheaving every old fabric, and laying in its stead the foundations of a building which will stand firm and enduring as the everlasting hills; for its base is Truth, and its frame-work good deeds, which are the legitimate fruits of a hearty embrace of that which appeals to an enlightened reason; and this must be our 'pole star,' our guide, fearless of consequences."

How exceedingly necessary, then, that those just coming into the field be prepared to meet intelligently any contingency of the times in which they may live. My cousins of the Cultivator circle, let us be ready to do whatever comes within our capacities, for thereby will we be cultivating and enlarging those properties of mind and heart which will make us susceptible of higher, more elevated perceptions of the great, the true and beautiful.

WHAT HAVE THE AMERICANS DONE.

In one of the "Latter Day Pamphlets," Mr. Carlyle asks tauntingly, what have the Americans done?—We have abolished Monarchy, we have abolished Aristocracy; we have sundered Church and State; we have so wrought with our English inheritance, that most Englishmen better their condition by quitting the old home and coming to the new. We have consolidated a State, under whose disinterested guardianship the cabined and straitened of the old world find enlargement and prosperity. We have suppressed standing armies; we have decentralized government to an extent that before our experiment was deemed hopeless; we have grown with such a dream-like rapidity, as to stand, after little more than a half century of national existence, prominent on the earth among the nations; and this, through the wisdom of political organization, whereby such scope is given to industry and invention, that not only are our native means profitably developed, but the great influx of Europeans is healthfully absorbed. We have in fifty years put between the Atlantic and the Pacific an Empire of twenty-five millions, who work more than any twenty-five millions on earth, and read more than any other fifty millions. We have built a State at once so solid and flexible, that it protects all without oppressing any. Our land is a hope and a refuge to the king-crushed laborers of Europe, and from the eminence above all other lands to which it has ascended, by our forecast, vigor, and freedom, it is to the thinker a demonstration of the upward movement of Christendom, and a justification of hopes that look to still higher elevations.

Mr. Carlyle's sneers at our lack of heroism would be unworthy of him, from their very silliness, were they not more so from their sour injustice. Let any people recite its heroic deeds, on flood or field, since we were a nation, and we will match every one of them. And in the private sphere, where self-sacrifice, devotion, courage, find such scope for heroic virtues, our social life is warm with them. But this is no theme for words. For his unworthy ones, we deem well enough of Mr. Carlyle to believe, that, when disengaged from the morbidly subjective, and, therefore, blinding and demoralizing moods, to which he is liable, he is ashamed of having printed them. It looks somewhat as though this passage had been written just to give us an opportunity of victorious retort, or to tempt us into an exhibition of our national propensity to brag,—a propensity, be it said, which is national in every nation we know anything of, whether English, French, German, or Italian. We only beat them in bragging, just as we beat them in ploughs and statues, in clippers and steamboats, in whalemen and electric telegraphs, in cheap newspapers and cheap government. They all do their best at bragging, and so do we,—and we beat them.—Calvert.

A DOMESTIC SKETCH.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the following sketch of a domestic scene that cannot fail to touch a chord in every heart:

"One market day we saw a wagon loaded with wheat coming into town—nothing strange in that certainly. And a man driving the team, and a woman perched on the load beside, and a child throned in the woman's lap—nothing strange in that either. And it required no particular shrewdness to determine that the woman was the property—personal of course—of the man, and that the black-eyed, round-faced child was the property of both of them. So much we saw—so much we suppose everybody saw, who looked. It is a fair inference that the wife came in to help her husband "trade out" a portion of the proceeds of the wheat, the product of so much labor, and so many sunshines and rains. The pair were somewhere this side—a fine point of observation, isn't it?—this side of forty, and it is presumptive, if blessed like their neighbors, they left two or three children at home, 'to keep house,' while they came to town—perhaps two girls and a boy, or, as it is immaterial to us, two boys and one girl. Well, we followed the pair, in and through, until the wheat was sold, the money paid, and then for the trade. The baby was shifted from shoulder to shoulder, or sat down upon the floor, to run off into mischief, like a sparkling globe of quicksilver on a marble table, while calicoes were priced, sugar and tea tested, and plates 'rung.' The good wife looks askance at a large mirror that would be just the thing for the best room, and the roll of carpeting, of a most becoming pattern—but it won't do, they must wait till next year. Ah! there is music in those next years, that orchestras cannot make. And so they look, and price, and purchase the summer supplies, the husband the while eyeing the little roll of bank notes growing small by degrees and beautifully less. Then comes an 'aside' conference, particularly confidential. She takes him affectionately by the button, and looks up in his face—she has fine eyes by-the-bye—with an expression eloquent of 'do now—it will please them so?' And what do you suppose they talk of? Toys for the children; John wants a drum, and Jane a doll, and Jenny a book, all pictures, 'just like Susan so-and-so's.' The father looks 'nonsense,' but feels in his pocket for the required silver; and the mother having gained the point, hastens away, baby and all, for the toys. There acts the mother—she had half promised—not all—that she would bring them something, and she is happy all the way home—not for the bargains she made, but for the pleasant surprise in those three brown parcels. And you ought to have been there when she got home, when the drum and the doll and book were produced—and thumbed and cradled and thumped—wasn't it a great house! Happiness is so cheap, what a wonder there is no more of it in the world!"

THE PROFESSION OF LITERATURE.

[The annexed picture of the rise and fall of a small dealer in literary wares, is from the Westminster Review. It is not altogether without its counterpart in this country.]

We do not hazard much risk of exceeding the truth in saying, that of a hundred men who fail in literature, ninety-nine of them had no business to meddle with it. Literature is a fascination very much like the stage; and of the multitude who fancy they have "a soul above buttons," who throw up "Coke upon Littleton" to strut their hour in print, who despise the honest trade of their fathers, and believe themselves destined to make a figure in the world, the number is incredibly small that are endowed with the attainments indispensable to success. There is no profession so crowded with men so deficient in the qualifications required for their work. In other professions, men rapidly find their level; but in literature, sustained by a vanity which eternally whispers in their ears that they are ill-treated, and fed by a restless ambition which grows by what it does not feed upon, they are a long time before they find out their own incapacity, if they ever find it out. How many such men are there clinging to the skirts of newspapers and periodicals, bitterly complaining of the rejection of articles, the neglect of the public, the caprice and want of judgment of editors, and of everything above the earth and under the earth except their own unfitness for the sphere they have chosen, who might have earned a decent competence in obscurity if they had been brought up to some useful occupation instead of being cast upon that occupation which, of all others, exacts the severest toil, the most varied powers, the greatest self-denial, the most earnest labor and vigilance, uprightness and perseverance! Every youth who has perpetrated doggerel in a weekly paper, or obtained, in an unlucky moment, admission for a fantastical article in a magazine, considers himself ill-used, and a martyr of genius, if he does not command a position for which neither nature nor education has qualified him. The question is, whether such instances should be cited as examples of anything but an egregious misdirection of human energies, and whether they should not be held out to admonish others from falling into the same mistake, instead of being quoted as evidences of the inadequate rewards of literature.

What result other than disappointment can be anticipated from the inveterate folly of a man who persists in a pursuit which he has taken up without the least previous training of his faculties, without study or preparation of any kind? The meanest calling requires some qualifications, and literature most of all. Can a man instruct others who is ignorant himself? or guide the taste of the public if his own be uneducated? Looking rationally at means and ends, what can he expect from persevering in so hopeless a course, but to be baffled in the long run? He hunts a phantom which eludes his grasp at every turn. He is like a child crying for the moon, or a boy chasing a butterfly. Trace the course of a literary adventurer of this numerous class, and wonder on more at the sequel.

A youth comes up to London to "seek his fortune." He has been brought up to no business or profession, and his head is, consequently, full of dreams and indefinite desires. Casting about for occupation, the floating work connected with the newspapers in the way of paragraphing and reporting, presents an easy opening to him, which suits the desultory turn of his mind. The agremens attached to this skirmishing employment captivate his senses, and flatter his vanity. He has access to a newspaper office, where he picks up the jargon of politics, and acquires an off-hand familiarity with the labels of public questions, the names of public men, and the doings of authorship: he has the run of the theatres, and speedily becomes an adept in the vocabulary, or slang, of criticism; he enjoys the free-and-easy intercourse of the loose convives of the press, and, emerging boldly from his chrysalis state, he begins to set up pretensions in the newspaper world as a night-man about town. Living, as the French say, au jour le jour, every day supplies its own expedients and excitements; facility in scribbling grows upon irresponsibility in publication, and thus, having dropped into the stream of vagrant journalism, he is swept on by the force of the current, and may be said to be only learning to swim when he finds himself buffeting the waters. Whatever chance he might originally have had of obtaining a safe and respectable livelihood is gone by. He is no longer capable of applying himself to any of the inglorious, plodding tasks in which diligence and system are compulsory. His habits are broken up; his views are scattered; he has tasted just enough of the pleasures of this gypsying and tramping life to be unfitted to settle down in quiet drudgery. He extends his connection with the papers: he writes in half-a-dozen at a time; he ascends from paragraphs to leading articles; nothing comes amiss to him; he is ready to undertake any variety of subjects, from the highest problem in political science to the lowest conundrum in the column of scraps; the range of his miscellaneous and comprehensive powers includes every conceivable topic that can be compassed by the scissors and pen. But it is as a critic that he displays his versatile agility by the most marvellous feats; the art of reviewing comes to him by intuition; books of history and philosophy, travels and biography, poetry, fiction, and science, fly like chaff before him; and the whole field of literature is mowed down with the indiscriminate celerity of a reaping machine. The Jack of all trades, who is master of none, is not a flourishing man after all. He sows his multifarious labors on the winds, and they scarcely escape from his hands when they are blown away for ever. His receipts are irregular and precarious, but his mode of living is prodigal. His incomings are slow, but his outgoings are fast. He hears on all sides that literary men are not expected to be provident, and he thinks he is licensed to be a spendthrift. With a little care over his exchequer, and regularity in his expenditure, he might manage to maintain a satisfactory position; but he wastes his resources in ways for which there is nothing to show, and spends one half of his life in fighting against embarrassments which the other half is actively engaged in multiplying. After years of universal production and promiscuous dissipation, the utmost he can do is to live from hand to mouth; even that fails him sometimes, and is sure to fail him altogether in the end. He has not made good an inch of solid ground to plant his foot upon. He is even worse off than he was at the beginning; for now at the close of his career, when it is too late to mend or retreat, he discovers that he has spent his life in vain, and that instead of having secured something to fall back upon, he is worn out, dilapidated, and discarded.

ALCOTT'S TAVERN IN MEDON.

BY A TRAVELING NATURALIST.

Alcott's tavern in Medon is situated at the crossing of Sycamore street with a nameless one that turns square to the right, but doesn't run to any particular place. I have never found a person that knew where that right hand road ended. Travellers frequently turn down there by mistake, and about half an hour afterwards they may be seen wending their way thoughtfully back, muttering something about a "deep ravine" and "a broken bridge." Putting this and that together, my curiosity has become aroused in regard to that street, and some of these days I intend to explore it.

Alcott's is exactly opposite the post-office, only three doors from "Our House," and right convenient to the publication office of the "Medon Phoenix," so that no marvel if it be well patronized. I love to sit in his piazza of a shady evening, under the dense grove of locusts that skirt Sycamore street, and observe the travellers as they ride up. "Can I get to stay all night with you?" is invariably the first inquiry. This is answered in a patronizing way by the landlord's "I reckon so—light!" (a light) in which reply lurks our national spirit of independence, so different from the bowing, cringing manners of an English hotel-keeper.

Let us sit here awhile, and look out together. Yonder approaches a group of horsemen, but not one of them will stop here; they are aiming to go on five miles further to "Carrick's stand," thus advancing themselves on their journey, and saving something in the bill; for our country taverns charge considerably less than those in town. As they pass by, Alcott looks at them savagely, and I'll be bound wishes them no good with that growling word "squabs!" Here comes another traveller, but on first sight we know that he lives in the county, and is going home to-night; witness that new hat strapped to his back, and the speed at which he rides; travellers at the end of a day's journey don't use horse-flesh in that way. Now, we have a couple more, each with overcoat and leggins, dry and dusty, the horses stepping gingerly, as if they had already stepped too often, and turning in towards the sign-post, quite of their own free will and accord. It would be cruel to disappoint them, nor do the riders intend it, for with the unfailing query, "Can we get to stay with you to-night?" down they come to terra firma.

A drink of water, a few yawns and stretches, and these seasoned fellows are as fresh as they were when they started at sunrise this morning, forty-three miles back. The conversation is a kind of give-and-take business all about the "crops," politics and health. Neither party has "any news of interest," at least they say so, and yet ere five minutes they have started a dozen topics. Colonel Falconer will certainly be elected sheriff in Tebo,—no less than three persons died last week in the village of Nixville,—the small steamer that plies the Walcott is aground,—the circus will be along within two weeks. All these things, and many others equally important, are communicated, while the wayfarers are removing their wrappers, and resigning themselves to the comforts of a lounge in the primitive way, tilted back, on the hind legs of the chair, their feet full high advanced, and a fragrant cigar in puff. Nobody can appreciate the luxury of tilting to a long-legged man after a hard day's ride has collected all the blood into his lower limbs; therefore, let Madame Trollope talk on.

Alcott's tavern has been the rendezvous of the town-wits for many a year, as his register plainly shows. All manner of facetiæ, some of them by no means the most refined, are recorded in its pages. One entry, however, struck me as pathetic. "John Allen: where from, the world: destination, the grave!" On inquiry, I learned that the poor fellow was in the last stage of consumption, and was borne out feet foremost, only a week after the above record was made.

It is a striking proof of the popularity of Alcott's hotel, that the great men of the land so often visit it. "Daniel Webster and family" call at least once a week; "Henry Clay and suite" quite frequently; while Prince Albert, Lord Wellington and other distinguished individuals, pass through Medon much oftener than a due attention to their national duties would seem to demand.

History is in an error in supposing that General Jackson has departed this life, for he took dinner at Alcott's, according to the record, not three weeks ago.

The same mistake prevails, and, in fact, a most pitiful anachronism has been palmed upon us in making out Napoleon Bonaparte to have died thirty years ago, when this veritable record declares he has called here with Marshal Ney three times in the last twelvemonth. But I leave these matters with the historian, and pass on.

To judge from the lay of the land and the map, Medon lies at least five hundred miles in a direct line from the ocean, but the advertisements, suspended so thickly on the wall, make it quite a maritime place, nearly all of them being headed "For sail," although the context is not so nautical, viz., "For sail, a likely negro lad—a tract of land—a good plow, nag," &c., &c. There is certainly some inconsistency here. By the side of these are notices of strays, among which I observe an animal unknown to naturalists, a broune heffier two year old; of daguerreotypists, travelling circuses, patent medicines—infinite in variety, and certain to do the promised work or no pay—administrator's cards—New Orleans commission merchants—a score of them—and a manuscript copy of the "Corporation Laws of Medon," certified to by the hand of the Mayor and Secretary.

These are prepared on the plan of sugar-coated pills, combining the sawtiter in modo with the fortiter in re. Hitching a horse to a tree or fence, involves a penalty, so the traveller is kindly informed. "Sect. 7. Don't hitch your horse anywhere else only to the rack; you'll grunt when you come to pay a V for a little shade!" Sect. 13 says, "You can't play at long bullets (?) in the corporation—fine from one to twenty if you do!" Boys and sportsmen are deterred by Sect. 3. "Those who wish to fire off guns had better go squirrel-hunting, than to shoot in the corporation; and boys must quit their squibs and crackers. Fine one to five dollars!" Surely, no Medonite can prove refractory under such lenient rules.

One side of the wall is covered with "Mitchell's latest map of the United States, printed in 1835," authority of the highest importance in all mooted geographical points.

It is said that the anti-Texas party, in 1844, gained this county through the influence of this venerable map. As it made Texas a part of Mexico, it was easy for the politicians to prove that the arrangement could not be disturbed, and disturb it they would not. A big hole is worn through the map, denoting the locality of Medon.

It was one warm August afternoon, that I rode for the first time into this town, to lie by for the Sabbath.

The same stereotyped round of characters fell under my observation that congregate in all country towns in the South. There was the tanyard at the outskirts, with its bark-mill moved by the laziest of mules; and its noisy dogs fed to ferocity upon raw meat. There was the blacksmith's shop, with its wheezy bellows slowly rocked by the blacksmith's arm, as his eye scanned the traveller. Three pale-looking journey-men looked up from their shop board, in the establishment of "Morrison, tailor." A parcel of chaps are congregated around the doggery, engaged in "three jumps, half-hammering" with the shop-weights as propellers. It is wonderful how far men can jump in this kind of sport, who are too lazy to feed their father's mules at home. At this low, one-story, log house, too near the road by half, a group of healthy children are playing, carefully watched by the maternal parent who runs out to stare at me as soon as she hears my horse's heels. Slipshod, ragged and ill-mannered, she is nevertheless amiable in my eyes, for the motherly look she casts upon her offspring, and I involuntarily think of four little ones of my own at home. We come to the town-rack, surrounded by groups of sun-burnt horses, that look wishfully after me, as if expecting that attention from me that is denied them by their own negligent masters. Poor creatures, many of them have stood here, drooping in this unshaded place since morning without a drop of water, while the true brutes—their masters—spent their hours in and about yonder foul place, the doggery. Say, ye preachers of natural perfection, is a man a man "for a' that?" or is he the creature that such cruel actions denote him?

The rack is the true entrance to Medon, all beyond that being the outskirts; or, more elegantly, the suburbs.

Now we come to rows of small rooms rented for offices, on which the tin-plates glisten in the down-going sun, with the names of "Dr. Anthony," "James Johnston, attorney-at-law," "Dr. Cutler," "Dr. Smith, botanic physician," "Henry Quackenboss, notary public," and then a daguerrean office, denoted by a frame of likenesses of which the best thing that can be said is, that if they are likenesses, the originals deserve our commiseration. The next block of offices is labelled in the same manner, and so is the next. At this time of day, offices of all sorts are empty, their tenants being engaged elsewhere in the general search for recreation.

Before we come to Alcott's, permit me to turn back a quarter of a mile—merely in imagination, however, for, after riding 35 miles this hot day, I wouldn't do it in reality for anything—and describe to you the grave-yard. It is like country grave-yards elsewhere, uninclosed and fearfully dilapidated. Men who were worth fifty thousand lie here, with no mark except a pile of decaying rails upon their breasts; virgins, cherished in life, have no stone to point out their beds; cherub children are left without a visiter—for such is the habit of the country. It is no indication of hardness of heart, it is only the prevailing fashion, and he who would lead the way in introducing a better, "and would teach others so," would deserve national gratitude.

Shortly after the first bell had rung for supper, there drove up a horse and buggy that fixed every attention. The animal, a fine bay, had been driven at a pace that covered him with sweat, which, fastening the dust that flew in clouds at every step, had clothed him as with a coat of yellow paint. The vehicle was thickly daubed with the same. But it was the inmates that particularly engrossed my observation. I am something of a Lavater in my attachment to the science of physiognomy, and, although frequently mistaken in first judgments, upon the whole, have been rather successful. The couple that descended from the buggy aforesaid, consisted of a man of some forty years, and a lady closely veiled, who seemed to be young. In answer to a question addressed to her by the landlord, she uttered some indistinct tones which led me to think that she had been weeping; but as she hurried into the ladies' apartment, I could not be positive. The man applied himself first to the contents of a glass of whiskey brought from "Our House," and then took his seat amongst us long enough to permit me to make some silent observations. There was an uneasy gaze in his eye that quailed whenever you watched him closely, and he seemed clearly under the impulse of some undefined terror, while at the same time there was a strange look of triumph or gratified desire to me perfectly inexplicable. My science was at fault—either he was a villain or a saint. To the various questions propounded, he made indifferent replies, that soon silenced the inquirers; and when the second bell rang, joined us at the table. Here I had an opportunity of seeing the countenance of his companion, which was that of a girl not more than thirteen years of age, of rare beauty and proportions. She ate scarcely anything—toyed with a few spoonfuls of coffee, and then proposed to her friend to retire. To a remark which he whispered to her, I observed, as I sat directly opposite, that her face became crimson, and she cast at him a look of terror which astonished me. When the supper ended, I hastened to the register and observed the new comers entered as "Dr. Snow and lady, from Whiteville."

Now, I felt confident there was some villainy afloat, for I was well acquainted at Whiteville, and knew of no such person; besides that it was plain to the most ordinary observer that this girl, a mere child, could not be his wife, and I felt an earnest desire to probe the matter to the bottom. I sought Alcott, a fleshy, clever fellow, with dull brains, and told him of my suspicions; but they failed altogether to convince him. Partaking of the selfish fears of his tribe, "he doubted the propriety of interfering with what didn't belong to him;" said "that widowers often marry young girls in this country," and "his customers wouldn't thank him for meddling," and so he hustled back to the supper-table. All this did not deter me, however. I felt a strange anxiety that grew more and more intense as night approached. It seemed to me that I was called upon to act at every risk. I enquired who was the most eminent lawyer in Medon, and went immediately to his house to consult him. He was everything that a lawyer ought to be—courteous, ready and candid. After hearing my statement with due gravity, he admitted that there was a possibility of wrong, but assured me that unless I could substantiate some personal affinity to the girl, that would do to base a claim upon, it was useless to interfere.

Night had come, and candles were brought in by one of his daughters, a charming girl, just budding into womanhood. Observing that the lawyer's eye rested upon her with a father's fondness, I ventured the suggestion, "Suppose it were that sweet girl, and in a villain's hands." This brought him to his feet, and he offered to accompany me back to the hotel, and see if anything could be done. We walked into the lady's parlor, and were fortunate enough to find the pair alone, he with a flushed countenance that denoted some wild thought within—she abandoned in excessive grief.

Both started at our entrance, and walked to the window. It was plain to me that some vile project was about to be executed, and so thought the lawyer; and introducing himself to the so-called Dr. Snow, he told him candidly of his suspicions, and firmly but respectfully demanded the cause of the lady's tears. But the lawyer had found a full match for once. The doctor turned to him with a sneer perfectly diabolical in its scorn, and ordered him to go about his business, for his intrusion was perfectly unnecessary.

"This lady can answer for herself," he continued. "Maria, tell the gentleman, dear, whether you need his services. If you do, here is his fee; for the good man must have that, or he will do nothing;" and the fellow actually pulled out a gold piece, and tendered it to the lawyer with an air of impertinence that was inimitable. The latter kept his gaze upon the girl, however, and, as she hesitated for an instant to speak, said—

"Consider, young lady, what you do! If you need a protector, this may be your last chance. You shall not be injured! Speak—can we aid you?"

Her bosom heaved tumultuously, tears flowed rapidly, and, from the expression of her countenance, I felt certain she would accept his offer; when, glancing timidly up, she caught her companion's eye, glittering like a basilisk's upon her, and faintly replying—

"No, oh, no," fell fainting upon the floor.

An hour afterwards, as I sat thoughtful in my bed-room, the door being open for the comfort of ventilation, the pair passed on the way to their chamber, which was the very next to mine, and I heard his voice, in a low, threatening tone—

"If you dare to do it!"

This confirmed my purpose, and, rushing out, I loudly declared that they should not occupy the same room, that night, if I died to prevent it. A scene followed of immense confusion; the boarders en masse gathered around me; the doctor, rushing to his trunk, drew forth his pistols, and fired a ball that did not miss my head an inch; the young lady again fainted, and was borne off by the half-robed landlady and servants; officers were sent for to secure us both; and what would have been the ultimate consequences, none can say, but at that moment a carriage drove furiously to the door, and a loud voice demanded the landlord's presence below.

At the sound, my pugnacious opponent turned pale, and ceased to speak, for up to that instant he had been loudly threatening what vengeance he would take on me.

My triumph had come. The new comer was the distracted parent of the girl, and my interposition had saved her from the villain. Nothing could exceed his tenderness to his fainting daughter, or his fury when first his eye fell upon her companion. He spit in his face with a loathing that language cannot express, struck him, unarmed and unresisting as he was, for the crowd would have torn the villain limb by limb, had he raised his arm against that grey-haired father, and seemed quite deranged.

The pretended Dr. Snow was a teacher, who had boarded for several months in this gentleman's house, and had requited a thousand kindnesses and attentions by abducting his only child, the flower of his aged years.

The next Circuit Court gave the doctor five years to the penitentiary.

Alcott gives me my bill every time I call on him, for my efforts on behalf of "the sweet girl." The sweet girl, a lovely creature of sixteen, smiles and blushes alternately when I visit at her father's, but never fails to say that she owes her very life to my exertions. Her father says but little about it, but this gold lever which I wear was once his, and I paid nothing for it; this horse was ditto and ditto; and if I had brass enough to accept what his gratitude measures out to me, I might quit collecting shells and flowers, and lie up in clover.

There are many green spots in the past; memory is no heartless jade to present only dark and rugged passages to view. Life has not been altogether barren and cheerless; but of all that I have to treasure up with pleasure and enjoy with delight, this scene at "Alcott's" is one of the most cherished.

THE DIVINING ROD.

[From Dr. Mayo's "Popular Superstitions, and the Truths contained Therein," a book just published by Lindsay & Blakiston, of this city, we make a curious extract.)

In mining districts, a superstition prevails among the people that some are born gifted with an occult power of detecting the proximity of veins of metal, and of underground currents of water. In Cornwall, they hold that about one in forty possesses this faculty. The mode of exercising it is very simple. They cut a hazel twig, just below where it forks. Having stripped the leaves off, they cut each branch to something more than a foot in length, leaving the stump three inches long. This implement is the divining rod. The hazel is selected for the purpose, because it branches more symmetrically than its neighbors. The hazel fork is to be held by the branches, one in either hand, the stump or point projecting straight forwards. The arms of the experimenter hang by his sides: but the elbows being bent at a right angle, the fore-arms are advanced horizontally; the hands are held eight to ten inches apart; the knuckles down, and the thumbs outwards. The ends of the branches of the divining fork appear between the roots of the thumbs and fore-fingers.

The operator, thus armed, walks over the ground he intends exploring, in the full expectation that, if he possesses the mystic gift, as soon as he passes over a vein of metal, or an underground spring, the hazel-fork will begin to move spontaneously in his hands, rising or falling as the case may be.

You are possibly amused at my gravely stating, as a fact, an event so unlikely. It is, indeed, natural that you should suppose the whole a juggle, and think the seemingly spontaneous motion of the divining fork to be really communicated to it by the hands of the conjurer—by a sleight, in fact, which he puts in practice when he believes that he is walking over a hidden water-course, or wishes you to believe that there is a vein of metal near. Well, I thought as you do the greater part of my life; and probably the likeliest way of combating your skepticism, will be to tell you how my own conversion took place.

In the summer of 1843, I dwelt under the same roof with a Scottish gentleman, well informed, of a serious turn of mind, fully endowed with the national allowance of shrewdness and caution. I saw a good deal of him; and one day, by chance, this subject of the divining rod was mentioned. He told me, that at one time his curiosity having been raised upon the subject, he had taken pains to ascertain what there is in it. With this object in view he had obtained an introduction to Mrs. R., sister of Sir G. R., then living at Southampton, whom he had learned to be one of those in whose hands the divining rod moved. He visited the lady, who was polite enough to show him in what the performance consists, and to answer all his questions, and to assist him in making experiments calculated to test the reality of the phenomenon, and to elucidate its cause.

Mrs. R. told my friend that, being at Cheltenham in 1806, she saw, for the first time, the divining rod used by Mrs. Colonel Beaumont, who possessed the power of imparting motion to it in a very remarkable degree. Mrs. R. tried the experiment herself at that time, but without any success. She was, as it happened, very far from well. Afterwards, in the year 1815, being asked by a friend how the divining rod is held, and how it is to be used, on showing it she was surprised to see that the instrument now moved in her hands.

Since then, whenever she had repeated the experiment, the power had always manifested itself, though with varying degrees of energy.

Mrs. R. then took my friend to a part of the shrubbery where she knew, from former trials, the divining rod would move in her hands. It did so, to my friend's extreme astonishment; and even continued to move, when, availing himself of Mrs. R.'s permission, my friend grasped her hands with sufficient firmness to prevent, as he supposed, any muscular action of her wrists or fingers influencing the result.

On a subsequent day my friend having thought over what he had seen, repeated his visit to the lady. He provided himself, as substitutes for the hazel-fork which he had seen her employ, with portions of copper and iron wire about a foot and a half long, bent something into the form of the letter V. He had made, in fact, divining forks of wire, wanting only the projecting point. He found that these instruments moved quite as freely in Mrs. R.'s hands as the hazel fork had done. Then he coated the two handles of one of them with sealing-wax, leaving, however, the extreme ends free and uncovered. When Mrs. R. tried the rod so prepared, holding the parts alone which were covered with sealing-wax, and walked on the same piece of ground as in the former experiments, the rod remained perfectly still. As often, however, as—with no greater change than adjusting her hands so as to touch the free ends of the wire with her thumbs—Mrs. R. renewed direct contact with the instrument, it again moved. The motion ceased again as often as the direct contact was interrupted.

This simple narrative, made to me by the late Mr. George Fairholm, carried conviction to my mind of the reality of the phenomenon. I asked my friend why he had not pursued the subject further. He said he had often thought of doing so, and had, he believed, mainly been deterred by meeting with the work of the Compte de Tristan, entitled Recherches sur quelques effluxes terrestres, Paris, 1829, in which facts similar to those which he had himself verified were given, and a number of additional curious experiments detailed.

At Mr. Fairholm's instance I procured the book, and, at a later period, read it. I may say that it both satisfied and disappointed me. It satisfied me, inasmuch as it fully confirmed all that Mr. Fairholm had stated. It disappointed me, for it threw no additional light upon the phenomena. M. de Tristan had in fact brought too little physical knowledge to the investigation, so that a large proportion of his experiments are puerile. However, his simpler experiments are valuable and suggestive. These I will presently describe. In the mean time, you shall hear the Count's own narrative of his initiation into the mysteries of the divining rod.

"The history of my researches," says M. de Tristan, "is simply this. Some twenty years ago, a gentleman who, from his position in society, could have no object to gain by deception, showed to me, for my amusement, the movement of the divining rod. He attributed the motion to the influence of a current of water, which appeared to me a probable supposition. But my attention was more engaged with the action produced by the influence, let the latter be what it might. My informant assured me he had met with many others in whom the same effects were manifested. When I returned home, and had opportunities of making trials under favorable circumstances, I found that I myself possessed the same endowment. Since then I have induced many to make the experiment, and I have found a fourth, or certainly a fifth, of the number capable of setting the divining rod in motion at the very first attempt. Since that time, during these twenty years, I have often tried my hand, but for amusement only, and desultorily, and without any idea of making the thing an object of scientific investigation. But at length, in the year 1822, being in the country, and removed from my ordinary pursuits, the subject again came across me, and I determined forthwith to try and ascertain the cause of this phenomena. Accordingly, I commenced a long series of experiments, from fifteen to eighteen hundred in number, which occupied me nearly fifteen months. The results of above twelve hundred were written down at the time of their performance."

The scene of the Count's operations was in the valley of the Loire, five leagues from Vendeme, in the park of the Chateau de Ranac. The surface of ground which gave the desired results was from seventy to eighty feet in breadth. But there was another spot equally efficient at the Count's ordinary residence at Emerillon, near Clercy, four leagues south of Orleans, ten leagues south of the Loire, at the commencement of the plains of Solonge. The surface ran from north to south, and had the same breadth with the other. These "exciting tracts" form, in general, bands or zones of undetermined, and often very great length. Their breadth is very variable: some are only three or four feet across, while others are one hundred paces. These tracts are sometimes sinuous; in other instances they ramify. To the most susceptible they are broader than to those who are less so.

M. de Tristan thus describes what happens when a competent person, armed with a hazelfork, walks over the exciting districts:—

When two or three steps have been made upon the exciting tract of ground, the fork, which at starting is held horizontally, with the point forwards, begins gently to ascend; it gradually attains a vertical position; sometimes it passes beyond that, and lowering itself, with its point to the chest of the operator, it becomes again horizontal. If the motion continues, the rod descending becomes vertical, with the point downwards. Finally, the rod may again ascend and resume its first position. When the action is very lively, the rod immediately commences a second revolution: and so it goes on, as long as the operator continues to walk over the exciting surface of ground.

A few of those in whose hands the divining fork moves exhibit a remarkable peculiarity. The instrument, instead of commencing its motion by ascending, descends; the point then becomes directed vertically downwards; afterwards it reascends, and completes a revolution in a course the opposite of the usual one; and as often and as long as its motion is excited, it pursues this abnormal course.

Of the numerous experiments made by M. de Tristan, the following are among the simplest and the best:—

He covered both handles of a divining rod with a thick silk stuff. The result of using the instrument so prepared was the same which Mr. Fairholm obtained by coating the handles with sealing-wax. The motion of the divining rod was extinguished.

He covered both handles with one layer of a thin silk. He then found that the motion of the divining rod took place, but it was less lively and vigorous than ordinary.

By covering one handle of the divining rod, and that the right, with a layer of thin silk, a very singular and instructive result was obtained. The motion of the instrument was now reversed. It commenced by descending.

After covering the point of the divining rod with a thick layer of silk stuff, the motion was sensibly more brisk than it had been before.

When the Count held in his hands a straight rod of the same substance conjointly with the ordinary divining rod, no movement of the latter whatsoever ensued.

Finally, the Count discovered that he could cause the divining rod to move when he walked over a non exciting surface—as, for instance, in his own chamber—by various processes. Of these the most interesting consisted in touching the point of the instrument with either pole of a magnetic needle. The instrument shortly began to move, ascending or descending, according as the northward or southward pole of the needle had been applied to it.

It is unnecessary to add that these, and all M. de Tristan's experiments, were repeated by him many times. The results of those which I have narrated were constant.

Let me now attempt to realize something out of the preceding statements.

1. It is shown by the testimony adduced, that whereas in the hands of most persons the divining rod remains motionless, in the hands of some it moves promptly and briskly when the requisite conditions are observed.

2. It is no less certain that the motion of the divining rod has appeared, to various intelligent and honest persons, who have succeeded in producing it, to be entirely spontaneous; or that the said persons were not conscious of having excited or promoted the motion by the slightest help of their own.

3. It appears that in the ordinary use of the divining rod by competent persons, its motion only manifests itself in certain localities.

4. It being assumed that the operator does not, however unconsciously, by the muscular action of his hands and wrists produce the motion of the divining rod, the likeliest way of accounting for the phenomenon is to suppose that the divining rod may become the conductor of some fluid or force, emanating from or disturbed in the body by a terrestrial agency.

But here a difficulty arises: How can it happen that the hypothetical force makes so long and round-about a course? Why, communicated to the body through the legs, does not the supposed fluid complete a circuit at once in the lower part of the trunk?

Such, at all events, would be the course an electric current so circumstanced would take.

The difficulty raised admits of being removed by aid derived from a novel and unexpected source. I allude to the discovery, by Von Reichenbach, of a new force or principle in the physical world, which, whether or not it is identical with that which gives motion to the divining rod, exhibits, at all events, the very property which the hypothetical principle should possess to explain the phenomena which we have been considering.

No attempts have indeed been made to identify the two as one: and my conjecture that they may prove so, should it even appear plausible, is so vague, that I should have contented myself with referring to Von Reichenbach's new principle as to an established truth and have introduced no account of it into this letter, had I not a second motive for insuring your cognizance of the curious facts which the Viennese philosopher has brought to light. It is less with the view of furnishing a leg to the theory of the divining rod, than in order to provide the means of elucidating more interesting problems, that I now proceed briefly to sketch the leading experiments made by Von Reichenbach, and their results.

Objections have been taken against these experiments, on the ground that their effects are purely subjective: that the results must be received on the testimony of the party employed; and that the best parties for the purpose are persons whose natural sensibility is exalted by disorder of the nerves; a class of persons always suspected of exaggeration, and even, and in part with justice, of a tendency to trickery and deception. But this was well known to Von Reichenbach, who appears to have taken every precaution necessary to secure his observations against error. And when I add, that many of the results which he obtained upon the most sensitive and the highly nervous, were likewise manifested in persons of established character and in good health, and that the fidelity of the author and his researches is authenticated by the publication of the latter in Woehler and Liebig's Chemical Annals, (Supplement to volume 53, Heidelberg, 1845,) I think you will not withhold from them complete reliance.

In general, persons in health, and of a strong constitution, are insensible to the influence of Von Reichenbach's new force. But all persons, the tone of whose health has been lowered by their mode of life—men of sedentary habits, clerks, and the like, and women who employ their whole time in needlework, whose pale complexions show the relaxed and therefore irritable state of their frames—all such, or nearly all—evince more or less susceptibility to the influence I am about to describe.

Von Reichenbach found that persons of the latter class, when slow passes are made with the poles of a strong magnet moved parallel to the surface—down the back, for instance, or down the limbs, and only distant enough just not to touch the clothes—feel sensations rather unpleasant than otherwise, as of a light draft of air blown upon them in the path of the magnet.

In the progress of his researches, Von Reichenbach found that the more sensitive among his subjects could detect the presence of his new agent by another sense. In the dark they saw dim flames of light issuing and waving from the poles of the magnet. The experiments suggested by this discovery afford the most satisfactory proofs of the reality of the phenomena. They were the following:—A horse-shoe magnet having been adjusted upon a table, with the poles directed upwards, the sensitive subject saw, at the distance of ten feet, the appearance of flames issuing from it. The armature of the magnet—a bar of soft iron—was then applied. Upon this the flames disappeared. They reappeared, she said, as often as the armature was removed from the magnet.

A similar experiment was made with a yet more sensitive subject. This person saw, in the first instance, flames as the first had done; but when the armature of the magnet was applied, the flames did not disappear: she saw flames still, only they were fainter, and their disposition was different. They seemed now to issue from every part of the surface of the magnet equally.

It is hardly necessary to add, that these experiments were made in a well-darkened room, and that none of the bystanders could discern what the sensitive subjects saw.

Then the following experiment was made:—A powerful lens was so placed as that it should concentrate the light of the flames (if real light they were) upon a point of the wall of the room. The patient at once saw the light upon the wall at the right place; and when the inclination of the lens was shifted, so as to throw the focus in succession on different points, the sensitive observer never failed in pointing out the right spot.

To his new force, which Von Reichenbach had now found to emanate likewise from the poles of crystals and the wires of the voltaic pile, he gave the arbitrary but convenient name of Od, or the Od force.

His next step was to ascertain the existence of a difference among the sensations produced by Od. Sometimes the current of air was described as warm, sometimes as cool. He found this difference to depend upon the following cause: Whenever the northward pole of a magnet, or one definite pole of a large crystal, or the negative wire of a voltaic battery, is employed in the experiment, the sensation produced is that of a draft of cool air. On the contrary, the southward pole of the magnet, the opposite pole of the crystal, the positive voltaic wire, excite the sensation of a draft of warm air.

So the new force appeared to be a polar force, and Von Reichenbach called the first series of the above described manifestations Od-negative effects, the second Od-positive effects.

From among his numerous experiments towards establishing the polarity of Od, I select the following:—One of the most sensitive of his subjects held, at his desire, a piece of copper wire, by the middle with the right hand—by one end with the left. Then Von Reichenbach touched the free end of the wire with one pole of a large crystal, in order to charge it with Od. The patient immediately felt a sensation in the right hand, which disappeared as quickly, to be felt by the left hand instead, at the further end of the piece of wire. She then was bidden to take hold of the wire with both her hands at the middle, and then to slide them away from each other to the opposite ends: she observed, on doing so, that sensations were produced, which were strong and decided when her hands held the two ends of the wire, and diminished in intensity in proportion as the hands were nearer its middle.

Von Reichenbach next came upon the observation that the human hand gives out the Od force; and that the right hand displays the characters of negative Od, the left those of positive Od. The more sensitive subjects recognized in the dark, the appearance of dim flames proceeding from the tips of his fingers; and all felt the corresponding sensations of drafts of cool or of warm air.

Subsequently the whole body was found to share the properties of the hands; the entire right side to manifest negative Od, the entire left side positive Od.

So, in reference to this new force, the human body exhibits a transverse polarity; the condition is thus realized which is required to belong to the hypothetical force through which the divining rod might be supposed to move. If any terrestrial influence were capable of disturbing the Od force in the body, however it might affect its intensity, a current or circuit could only be established through the arms and hands; unless, indeed, some extraordinary means were taken, such as employing an artificial conductor, arched half round the body, to connect the two sides.

The sensations which attend the establishment of a current of Od and interferences with it, in sensitive subjects, are exemplified in the following observations:—

A bar magnet was laid on the palm of the left hand of one of the most sensitive subjects, with its southward pole resting on the end of her middle finger, the northward pole on the fore-arm above the wrist. It thus corresponded with the natural polar arrangement of the Od force in the patient's hand and arm. Accordingly, no sensation was excited. But when the position of the magnet was reversed, and the northward pole lay on the end of the middle finger of the left hand, an uneasy sense of an inward conflict arose in the hand and wrist, which disappeared when the magnet was removed or its original direction restored. On laying the magnet reversed on the fore-arm, the sense of an inward struggle returned, which was heightened on joining the hands and establishing a circuit.

When the patient completed the circuit in another way—namely, by holding a bar magnet by the ends, if the latter were disposed normally, (that is, if the northward pole was held in the left hand, the southward pole in the right,) a lively consciousness of some inward action ensued. A normal circulation of Od was in progress. When the direction of the magnet was reversed, the phenomenon mentioned in the last paragraph recurred. The patient experienced a high degree of uneasiness, a feeling as of an inward struggle extending itself to the chest, with a sense of whirling round, and confusion in the head. These symptoms disappeared immediately upon her letting go the magnet.

A singular but consistent difference in the result ensued when Von Reichenbach repeated the last two experiments upon Herr Schuh. Herr Schuh was a strong man, thirty years of age, in full health, but highly impressible by Od. When Von Reichenbach took his two hands in his own normally, Herr Schuh felt the normal establishment of the Od current in his arms and chest. In a few seconds headache and vertigo ensued, and the experiment was too disagreeable to be prolonged. But when Von Reichenbach took his hands abnormally, no sensible effect ensued. Being equally strong with Von Reichenbach, Herr Schuh's frame repelled the counter-current, which the latter arrangement tended to throw into him. In the first or normal arrangement, the Od current had met with no resistance, but had simply gone its natural course. The distress occurred from its being felt through Herr Schuh's accidental sensitiveness to Od; of the freaks of which in their systems people in general are unconscious.

I have concluded my case in favor of the pretensions of the divining rod. It seems to me, at all events, strong enough to justify any one who has leisure, in cutting a hazel-fork, and walking about with it in suitable places, holding it in the manner described. I doubt, however, whether I should recommend a friend to make the experiment. If, by good luck, the divining rod should refuse to move in his hands, he might accuse himself of credulity, and feel silly, and hope nobody had seen him, for the rest of the day. If, unfortunately, the first trial should succeed, and he should be led to pursue the inquiry, the consequences would be more serious: his probable fate would be to fall at once several degrees in the estimation of his friends, and to pass with the world, all the rest of his life, for a crotchety person of weak intellects.

As for the divining rod itself, if my argument prove sound, it will be a credit to the family of superstitions; for, without any reduction, or clipping, or trimming, it may at once assume the rank of a new truth. But, alas! the trials which await it in that character!—what an ordeal is before it! A new truth has to encounter three normal stages of opposition. In the first, it is denounced as an imposture; in the second—that is, when it is beginning to force itself into notice—it is cursorily examined, and plausibly explained away; in the third, or cui bono stage, it is decried as useless, and hostile to religion. And when it is fully admitted, it passes only under a protest that it has been perfectly known for ages—a proceeding intended to make the new truth ashamed of itself, and wish it had never been born.

I congratulate the sea-serpent on having arrived at the second stage of belief. Since Professor Owen (no disrespect to his genuine ability and eminent knowledge) has explained it into a sea-elephant, its chance of being itself is much improved; and as it will skip the third stage—for who will venture to question the good of a sea-serpent?—it is liable now any morning "to wake and find itself famous," and to be received even at Lincoln's Inn Fields, where its remains may commemoratively be ticketed the Ex-Great Seal.

POSTSCRIPT, (1850.)—It may save trouble to some future experimenter to narrate my own exploits with the divining rod.

In the spring of 1847, being then at Weilbach in Nassau, a region teeming with underground sources of water, I requested the son of the proprietor of the bathing establishment—a tall, thin, pale, white-haired youth, by name Edward Seebold—to walk in my presence up and down a promising spot of ground, holding a divining fork of hazel, with the accessories recommended by M. de Tristan to beginners—that is to say, he held in his right hand three pieces of silver, besides one handle of the rod, while the handle which he held in his left hand was covered with a thin silk.

The lad had not made five steps when the point of the divining fork began to ascend. He laughed with astonishment at the event, which was totally unexpected by him; and he said that he experienced a tickling or thrilling sensation in his hands. He continued to walk up and down before me. The fork had soon described a complete circle: then it described another; and so it continued to do as long as he walked thus, and as often as, after stopping, he resumed his walk. The experiment was repeated by him in my presence, with like success, several times during the ensuing month. Then the lad fell into ill health, and I rarely saw him. However, one day I sent for him, and begged him to do me the favor of making another trial with the divining fork. He did so, but the instrument moved slowly and sluggishly; and when, having completed a semicircle, it pointed backwards towards the pit of his stomach, it stopped, and would go no farther. At the same time, the lad said he felt an uneasy sensation, which quickly increased to pain, at the pit of the stomach, and he became alarmed, when I bade him quit hold of one handle of the divining rod, and the pain ceased. Ten minutes afterwards, I induced him to make another trial; the results were the same. A few days later, when the lad seemed still more out of health, I induced him to repeat the experiment. Now, however, the divining fork would not move at all.

I entertain little doubt that the above performances of Edward Seebold were genuine. I thought the same of the performances of three English gentlemen, and of a German, in whose hands, however, the divining rod never moved through an entire circle. In the hands of one of them its motion was retrograde, or abnormal—that is to say, it began by descending.

But I met with other cases, which were less satisfactory, though not uninteresting. I should observe that, in the hands of several who tried to use it in my presence, the divining fork would not move an inch. But there were two younger brothers of Edward Seebold, and a bath-maid, and my own man, in whose hands the rod played new pranks. When these parties walked forwards, the instrument ascended, or moved normally; but when, by my desire, they walked backwards, the instrument immediately went the other way. I should observe that, in the hands of Edward Seebold, the instrument moved in the same direction, whether he walked forwards or backwards; and I have mentioned that at first it described in his hands a complete circle. But with the four parties I have just been speaking of, the motion of the fork was always limited in extent. When it moved normally at starting, it stopped after describing an arc of about 225°; in the same way, when it moved abnormally at starting, it would stop after describing an arc of about 135°; that is to say, there was one spot the same for the two cases, beyond which it could not get. Then I found that, in the hands of my man, the divining rod would move even when he was standing still, although with a less lively action; still it stopped as before, nearly at the same point. Sometimes it ascended, sometimes descended. Then I tried some experiments, touching the point with a magnetic needle. I found, in the course of them, that when my man knew which way I expected the fork to move, it invariably answered my expectations; but when I had the man blind-folded, the results were uncertain and contradictory. The end of all this was, that I became certain that several of those in whose hands the divining rod moves, set it in motion and direct its motion by the pressure of their fingers, and by carrying their hands nearer to, or farther apart. In walking forwards, the hands are unconsciously borne towards each other; in walking backwards, the reverse is the case.

Therefore, I recommend no one to prosecute these experiments unless he can execute them himself, and unless the divining rod describes a complete circle in his hands; and even then he should be on his guard against self-deception.

POSTSCRIPT II.—I am now (May, 1851) again residing at the bathing establishment of Weilbach, near Mayence; and it was with some interest and curiosity that the other day I requested Mr. Edward Seebold, now a well-grown young man, in full health, to try his hand again with the divining rod. He readily assented to my request; and he this time knew exactly what result I expected. But the experiment entirely failed. The point of the divining rod rose, as he walked, not more than two or three inches; but this it does with every one who presses the two handles towards each other during the experiment. Afterwards, the implement remained perfectly stationary. I think I am not at liberty to withhold this result from the reader, whom it may lead to question, though it cannot induce myself to doubt, the genuineness of the former performances of Mr. E. S.

FADING.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

Ay, thou art for the grave; thy glances shine

Too brightly to shine long; another spring
Shall deck her for men's eyes—but not for thine—

Sealed in a sleep which knows no wakening.

The fields for thee have no medicinal leaf,

And the vexed ore no mineral of power;

And they who love thee wait in anxious grief

Till the slow plague shall bring the fatal hour.

Glide softly to thy rest, then: death should come

Gently, to one of gentle mould like thee.

As light winds, wandering through groves of bloom,

Detach the delicate blossom from the tree.

Close thy sweet eyes, calmly, and without pain;

And we will trust in God to see thee yet again.

ANTIDOTE FOR MELANCHOLY.

"Ah, friend K—, good morning to you; I'm really happy to see you looking so cheerful. Pray, to what unusual circumstance may we be indebted for this happy, smiling face of yours, this morning?" (Our friend K— had been, unfortunately, of a very desponding and somewhat of a choleric turn of mind, previously.)

"Really, is the change so perceptible, then? Well, my dear sir, you shall have the secret: for, happy as I appear—and be assured, my appearances are by no means deceptive, for I never felt more happy in my life—it will still give me pleasure to inform you, and won't take long, either. It is simply this; I have made a whole family happy!"

"Indeed! Why, you have discovered a truly valuable recipe for blues, then, which may be used ad libitum, eh, K—?"

"You may well say that. But, really, my friend, I feel no little mortification at not making so simple and valuable a discovery at an earlier period of my life. Heaven knows," continued K—, "I have looked for contentment everywhere else. First, I sought for wealth in the gold mines of California, thinking that was the true source of all earthly joys; but after obtaining it, I found myself with such a multiplicity of cares and anxieties, that I was really more unhappy than ever. I then sought for pleasure in traveling. This answered somewhat the purpose of dissipating cares, etc., so long as it lasted; but, dear me, it gave no permanent satisfaction. After seeing the whole world, I was as badly off as Alexander the Great. He cried for another world to conquer, and I cried for another world to see."

The case of our friend, I imagine, differs not materially from that of a host of other seekers of contentment in this productive world. Like "blind leaders of the blind," our invariable fate is to go astray in the universal race for happiness. How common is it, after seeking for it in every place but the right one, for the selfish man to lay the whole blame upon this fine world—as if any body was to blame but himself. Even some professors of religion are too apt to libel the world. "Well, this is a troublesome world, to make the best of it," is not an uncommon expression; neither is it a truthful one. "Troubles, disappointments, losses, crosses, sickness, and death, make up the sum and substance of our existence here," add they, with tremendous emphasis, as if they had no hand in producing the sad catalogue. The trouble is, we set too high a value on our own merits; we imagine ourselves deserving of great favors and privileges, while we are doing nothing to merit them. In this respect, we are not altogether unlike the young man in the parable, who, by-the-bye, was also a professor—he professed very loudly of having done all those good things "from his youth up." But when the command came, "go sell all thou hast, and give to the poor," &c., it soon took the conceit out of him.

In this connection, there are two or three seemingly important considerations, which I feel some delicacy in touching upon here. However, in the kindest possible spirit, I would merely remark that there is a very large amount of wealth in the Church—by this I include its wealthy members, of course; and refer to no particular denomination; by Church, I mean all Christian denominations. Now, in connection with this fact, such a question as this arises in my mind—and I put it, not for the purpose of fault-finding, for I don't know that I have a right view of the matter, but merely for the consideration of those who are fond of hoarding up their earthly gains, viz.: Suppose the modern Church was composed of such professors as the self-denying disciples of our Saviour,—with their piety, simplicity, and this wealth; what think you, would be the consequence? Now I do not intend to throw out any such flings, as “Comparisons are odious”—“This is the modern Christian age”—“The age of Christian privileges,” and all that sort of nonsense. Still, I am rather inclined to the opinion that if we were all—in and out of the Church—disposed to live up to, or carry out what we professedly know to be right, it would be almost as difficult to find real trouble, as it is now to find real happiness.

The sources of contentment, and discontentment, are discoverable, therefore, without going into a metaphysical examination of the subject. Just in proportion as we happen to discharge, or neglect known duties, are we, according to my view, happy or miserable on earth.

Philosophy tells us that our happiness and well-being depends upon a conformity to certain unalterable laws—moral, physical, and organic—which act upon the intellectual, moral, and material universe, of which man is a part, and which determine, or regulate the growth, happiness, and well-being of all organic beings. These views, when reduced to their simple meaning, amount to the same thing, call it by what name we will. Duties of course, imply legal or moral obligations, which we are, certainly, legally or morally bound to pay, perform, or discharge. And certain it is, there is no getting over them—they are as irresistible as Divine power, as universal as Divine presence, as permanent as Divine existence, and no art, nor cunning of man can disconnect unhappiness from transgressing them. How necessary to our happiness, then, is it, not only to know, but to perform our whole duty?

One of the great duties of man in this life, and, perhaps, the most neglected, is that of doing good, or benefiting one another. That doing good is clearly a duty devolving upon man, there can be no question. The benevolent Creator in placing man in the world, endowed him with mental and physical energies, which clearly denote that he is to be active in his day and generation. Active in what? Certainly not in mischief, for that would not be consistent with Divine Goodness. Neither should we suppose that we are here for our own sakes simply. Such an idea would be presumptuous. For what purpose, then, was man endowed with all these facilities of mind and body, but to do good and glorify his Maker? True philosophy teaches that benevolence was not only the design of the Creator in all His works, but the fruits to be expected from them. The whole infinite contrivances of everything above, around and within us, are directed to certain benevolent issues, and all the laws of nature are in perfect harmony with this idea. That such is the design of man may also be inferred from the happiness which attends every good action, and the misery of discontentment which attends those who, not only do wrong, but are useless to themselves and to society. Friend K——'s case, above quoted, is a fair illustration of this truth.

Now, then, if it is our duty to do all the good we can, and I think this will be admitted, particularly by the Christian, and this be measured by our means, and opportunity, then there are many whom Providence has blessed with the means, and opportunity, of doing a very great amount of good. And if it be true, as it manifestly is, that “it is more blessed to give than receive,” then has Providence also blessed them with very great privileges. The privilege of giving liberally, and thus obtaining for themselves the greater blessing, which is the result of every benevolent action, the simple satisfaction with ourselves which follows a good act, or consciousness of having done our duty in relieving a fellow-creature, are blessings indeed, which none but the good or benevolent can realize. Such kind spirits are never cast down. Their hearts always light and cheerful—rendered so by their many kind offices,—they can always enjoy their neighbors, rich or poor, high or low, and love them too; and with a flow of spirits which bespeak a heart all right within, they make all glad and happy around them.

Doing good is an infallible antidote for melancholy. When the heart seems heavy, and our minds can light upon nothing but little naughty perplexities, everything going wrong, no bright spot or relief anywhere for our crazy thoughts, and we are finally wound up in a web of melancholy, depend upon it there is nothing, nothing which can dispel this angry, ponderous and unnatural cloud from our rheumatic minds and consciences like a charity visit—to give liberally to those in need of succor, the poor widow, the suffering, sick, and poor, the aged invalid, the lame, the blind, &c., &c.; all have a claim upon your bounty, and how they will bless you and love you for it—anyhow, they will thank kind Providence for your mission of love. He that makes one such visit will make another and another; he can't very well get weary in such well-doing, for his is the greater blessing. It is a blessing indeed: how the heart is lightened, the soul enlarged, the mind improved, and even health; for the mind being liberated from perplexities, the body is at rest, the nerves in repose, and the blood, equalized, courses freely through the system, giving strength, vigor, and equilibrium to the whole complicated machinery. Thus we can think clearer, love better, enjoy life, and be thankful for it.

What a beautiful arrangement it is that we can, by doing good to others, do so much good to ourselves! The wealthy classes, who “rise above society like clouds above the earth, to diffuse an abundant dew,” should not forget this fact. The season has now about arrived, when the good, people of all classes will be most busily engaged in these delightful duties. The experiment is certainly worth trying by all. If all those desponding individuals, whose chief comfort is to growl at this "troublesome world," will but take the hint, look trouble full in the face and relieve it, they will, like friend K—, feel much better.

It may be set down as a generally correct axiom, (with some few exceptions, perhaps, such as accidents, and the deceptions and cruelties of those whom we injudiciously select for friends and confidants, from our want of discernment,) that life is much what we make it, and so is the world.

ART AND SCIENCE.

EXPLOSIVE FORCES.—Repeated attempts to derive a useful motor from explosive compounds were made during the last century. No devices were matured, not because of insuperable difficulties to be overcome, but principally on account of the increasing popularity of steam. It was doubtful that any competing energy could stand before that agent; but now things are different. Steam engines have been greatly improved and extended, and the arts have reached a point where a more portable power has become greatly desirable. It is only as the requirements of advancing society present new exigencies, and such as current forces can not meet, that we begin to look seriously for others.

Though few have been developed, explosive forces are beyond question multitudinous, and include every imaginable quality and intensity. No systematic inquiry into their various natures and numbers has been undertaken—it is not time yet for that—nor into the means of drilling them to useful labor. Many persons have supposed them untamable; that their fitful violence incapacitated them for working steadily as other inorganic servants do;—an error, certainly. There is no active energy, revealed or to be revealed, no matter how refractory in its habits or paroxysmal in its manifestations, but will be subdued by man. It is his mission to make them all subservients. Give him time. Crumbling Cheops was not raised in a day, nor are the lasting edifices of civilization and science to be finished in a century. Some imagine their spires are already penetrating the clouds, while, in reality, it is their foundation courses only that are laid.

USE OF COLORED GLASSES IN FOGS.—The following curious observation is made by M. Luvini, of Turin:—"When there is a fog between two corresponding stations, so that the one station can with difficulty be seen from the other, if the observer passes a colored glass between his eye and the eye-piece of his telescope, the effect of the fog is very sensibly diminished, so that frequently the signals from the other station can be very plainly perceived, when, without the colored glass, the station itself could not be seen. The different colors do not all produce this effect in the same degree. The red seems the most proper for the experiment. Those who have good sight prefer the dark red; those who are short-sighted like light red better. The explanation of this effect seems to depend upon the fact that the white color of the fog strikes too powerfully upon the organ of sight, especially if the glass have a somewhat large field. On the contrary, by placing a colored glass between the eye of the observer and the eye-glass of the instrument, the intensity of the light is much diminished by the interception of a part of the rays; the observer's eye is less wearied, suffers less, and consequently distinguishes better the outlines of the object observed."

IMPROVEMENTS IN PAPIER-MACHE.—Charles Bilefield, a papier-mache manufacturer of London, has invented some very great and important improvements in the making of different kinds of articles out of papier-mache. He makes the substance, not out of paper, as has been heretofore practiced, but out of cotton rags, the substance of which paper is made. Picture frames having the appearance of the finest carved work, and resembling oak, mahogany, bronze, &c., likewise panels, partitions, pillars, and grate slabs, resembling the finest marble, are made out of old rags. These preparations are water-proof and sound proof, and they will stand any climate without cracking or warping. They can be cut, filed, sawed, planed, turned on a lathe, nailed, screwed, and are bad conductors of heat; therefore, they are excellent for both hot and cold climates. He has lately had the fitting up of the interior of a new steamboat for the Pasha of Egypt, wood and other ornamental work not being able to stand the dry climate of that country. It is the intention of the inventor to make slabs of his material for the walls of houses, as a substitute for stone and iron. The blocks can all be moulded to fit into one another, so that they can be carried to any distance, and then fitted up with screws.

BURNING SMOKE.—Two years ago the cities in England and Scotland were like smoked hams, owing to the dense volumes of smoke which filled the atmosphere by the use of bituminous coal. The fields of grain were black in appearance from the same cause, and the hedges were in the like condition. Now all is changed; the sky is no longer like a smoke-house; the rains descend in clear streams, not in inky rivulets; the houses begin to look as if their faces were washed, and the hedges begin to wear their old dark green appearance. All this has been accomplished by an Act of Parliament making it penal for factories to let their smoke escape. The smoke is all burned by simple contrivances of furnaces. A Commission of Government first established that the burning of smoke was perfectly practicable, and Parliament then enforced the fact by law. The factory and mill owners soon found out how to fulfil the conditions of this law, and the result is, they save a great deal of fuel by the operation. Like many other good things, this important improvement at first met with a great deal of opposition; there are some men who cannot judge when a good turn is done to them, and we can say that this is true in respect to many useful inventions.—Scientific American.

HUMBLE WORTH.

Tell me not that he's a poor man,
That his dress is coarse and bare;
Tell me not his daily pittance
Is a workman's scanty fare.
Tell me not his birth is humble,
That his parentage is low;
Is he honest in his actions?
That is all I want to know.

Is his word to be relied on?
Has his character no blame?
Then I care not if he's low-born—
Then I ask not whence his name.
Would he from an unjust action
Turn away with scornful eye?
Would he, than defraud another,
Sooner on the scaffold die?

Would he spend his hard-gained earnings
On a brother in distress?
Would he succor the afflicted,
And the weak one's wrongs redress?
Then he is a man deserving
Of my love and my esteem;
And I care not what his birth-place
In the eye of man may seem.

Let it be a low, thatch'd hovel:
Let it be a clay-built cot:
Let it be a parish work-house—
In my eye it matters not.
And, if others will disown him
As inferior to their caste,
Let them do it—I befriend him
As a brother to the last.

HYMN OF THE MOUNTAIN
CHRISTIAN.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!
Thou hast made Thy children mighty,
By the touch of the mountain sod.
Thou hast fix'd our ark of refuge
Where the spoiler's foot ne'er trod;
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

We are watchers of a beacon
Whose lights must never die;
We are guardians of an altar
Midst the silence of the sky:
The rocks yield founts of courage
Struck forth as by thy rod—
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

For the dark, resounding heavens,
Where Thy still small voice is heard,
For the strong pines of the forests,
That by Thy breath are stirr'd!
For the storms on whose free pinions
Thy Spirit walks abroad—
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

The royal eagle darteth
On his quarry from the heights,
And the stag that knows no master,
Seeks there his wild delights;
But we for Thy communion
Have sought the mountain sod—

For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

The banner of the chieftain
Far, far below us waves;
The war-horse of the spearman
Cannot reach our lofty caves:
Thy dark clouds wrap the threshold
Of freedom's last abode!
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

For the shadow of Thy presence
Round our camp of rock outspread;
For the stern defiles of battle,
Bearing record of our dead;
For the snows, and for the torrents,
For the free heart's burial sod,
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee,
Our God, our fathers' God!

CHRISTMAS IN SWEDEN.

BY FREDRIKA BREMER.

LETTER TO A FRIEND IN ENGLAND—TRANSLATED BY MARY HOWITT.

DEAR FRIEND:—"Whilst I in Mercury float round the sun in fiery circles, you wander heavily and wearily in your remote Saturn, far from the centre of life." Thus, excellent friend, were you so polite as to write in your letter from Mercury—England. I now send you my salutation from Saturn—Sweden; (what an opportunity for enlightenment this communication between the planets will open!) and my thanks also for your communication respecting the life in Mercury. I see that it is as I have been told, that the wheels of existence hurry on with precipitate speed, like that of the steam-engine; that day and night change rapidly: that business goes on by high pressure. "That is life! that is action!" you exclaim. And yet, you eternal tourist, you are wearied and out of humor—that must be the case, I believe, when people are perpetually out of breath with mere exertion!—and write at every station on your route, like a certain travelled Swede in the day-book of an Italian hotel, "Malcontentissimo!" and proceed farther, forever seeking a "contentissimo," whilst you begin to despair of ever finding one. Think about coming to Saturn! You shudder, you are afraid of stiffening with the cold there. Do you not remember that Saturn has a glowing belt! Think, if after all that should be the light of an inward, deep, warm flame of life!

But I will not deceive you. Here, as in Jupiter, in Venus, and in Mercury, people may become torpid, weary, stiff with cold, as in many other places, whether amid volcanic lava or the ice of the north-pole. But here, as everywhere else, the people can live, work, and enjoy themselves; the thing is, how do they conduct their life? The greatest of all arts is to live!—the greatest of all arts and sciences! For a thousand years has man labored after this, and labors for it still. And that which all are seeking for in common is, some life which will make the heart leap, which will make it a pleasure to rise in the morning, which will make the stars of night speak of peace and hope, which causes in all ages a contentment which cannot be resisted; a perpetually reproducing, perpetually vivifying contentment. You ask, "can this be produced on the earth?" Permit, oh winged son of Mercury, that a bear out of the woods of Saturn answer you, "yes?" "Under what circumstances?" One great thought in the soul which lights up existence; also our own aim in life; and for each day its own work; an organized activity which will make our lives a week of tranquil working-days, at the close of which we may look back, in the joyous rest of the Sabbath, upon our work, and, notwithstanding its defects, may still hope that it is good. Behold here a happiness for all! I do not know whether it may be found in Fourier's Phalanstere—from which God preserve me!—but this I know, that it may be found under a Swedish roof of turf, and that I, among my own family, am not a long way from it.

Some other time we will talk about the great thought—to-day we will merely speak of that still life which people can lead here, whilst out of doors the snow lies a yard deep. "Still life!" I hear you exclaim almost contemptuously; and you think immediately about stagnant water and the like. But no; by the eternal sun! I know of no other kind of life than that which aspires, improves, develops itself. But the aspiration may be more inward than outward, and the improvement a calm development of life and of knowledge. Blessed, therefore, is the "movement" of the present time which enables us from our humble homes and huts to behold the whole world; which brings all the noble fruits of inquiry home to our orchards. The sciences make themselves popular, as a means of elevating the masses of the people. (In this respect they resemble—I know whom!) Pluto, Fauna, and Flora, and the heavenly Urania descend, like the gods of old, and in certain human shapes enter our dwellings, to impart to us of their treasures. The newspapers—do you know the origin of newspapers, my brother?—I will tell you.

Hugin and Munin, Odin's two wise ravens, which every day took a flight round the world, in order to inform their master of all that occurred there, now and then alighted to rest themselves upon the little mole-hills of the earth, and in this way they made acquaintance with the crows and magpies of the world. The immortal birds became enamoured of the mortal, and—you see my meaning—the offspring of these now fly round the world in the shape of gazettes, journals, and such like. They have inherited from their parents something immortal, and something mortal: something of the firmament, and something of the clod; something of Odin's nature, and something of the crow and magpie nature. And in the degree in which these dissimilar natures preponderate is their appearance and their speech. At all events, they are in the service of the All-benificent; and I and you, the shoemaker, the king—nobody in the world can live without them. With them we travel every day round the world; and in what a comfortable way—in our undress, in our arm-chair, and with our coffee!—survey new lands, whether in the realms of thought or of action, observe all that goes on in China as well as America—to say nothing of the antipodes. With them, and by means of them, we see an infinite deal which we should not see without them. And the fact is, that the broader a man's range of vision, the deeper his insight into things, the safer he can both stand and act. In short, if we, who are absorbed by our homes, our interests, our love, only knew the wealth which is revealed to us at this present moment, we should possess, in mere observation alone, a perpetually flowing spring of perpetually vigorous life-enjoyment.

But apropos of home, I forgot just now to mention one condition for happiness on earth which, according to my feelings, is indispensable, and that is—a peaceful home, with good hearts in it, and bright eyes, and in whose select, warm circle, man, in union with noble fellow-minds, may pass innocent and happy days. I once heard three stout gentlemen talking about happiness. The one said that a man might always be happy if he would; and the other said, that was not so easy, because the stomach had so much to do in the business; to which the third remarked, that before everything else the cravings of the stomach ought to be appeased: to which I will make reply, "Gentlemen! as a matter of course, people must have a sufficiency; must have enough of food, clothes, house-room, and the like; but, gentlemen, what is enough of outward necessities as compared with inward; will be understood by the wise only, and they only will value of the outward the right proportion. Gentlemen, I do not explain this expression—that will explain itself."

But I must now conduct you into my home, my humble home: but still there is to be found there the best which can be found under the sun, from the juice of the grape, and silk, and gilding—but all in the right proportion to my ability, my position in life, and my requirements, which I do not allow to go swarming about after pleasure, but put them early under a queen-bee's guidance.

"He is always satisfied with himself and what belongs to him:" you may, perhaps, dear brother, somewhat calumniously remark. We have a great festival to-day, you must know, and it may possibly so happen that the smell of candles, and—now, also, there is an abominable smell of sealing-wax! That is because my wife is packing up and sealing Christmas-boxes? The smell of tarts and roast meat, and the rejoicing of children, get rather into my head. It is Christmas-eve, dear brother, a day which, through the whole of Sweden, is celebrated in castle and cottage, with gifts given and received; with the best that people have of this world's wealth. For a month past one has seen that the festival was coming by the increase of life and bustle over the whole country, as if the whole country got itself ready for a feast. In the capital it seems as if a population of 80,000 souls had, all at once, increased to 100,000, and as if the bodies of all their souls had no more rest within the house. People drive, people walk, or rather people trudge up and down, from morning till night. People meet, people cross, people jostle one another in the crowds, in streets and lanes. At the turning on each hand one hears the words, "Your most humble servant!" And in the Great West street in particular, people are in peril of their life—if they are poor foot-passengers, like me. In the shops the ladies elbow one another, under the pleasant pretence of desiring to see this and that; examine, consider, turn over and over, ask questions, chatter, chafeen, and finally open their pocket-books and put in the bill; and then, without any impropriety, go out with their parcels, be they large or small, oblong or four-cornered, wrapped up with ingenuity in waste paper, and tied with pack-thread. The ladies, in their elegant pelisses, float to their elegant carriages, attended to the door by the gentlemen of the shops, who ask with low bows, "Shall I send them home?—shall I add them to the account?" A nod, or gracious "be so kind!" the window is pulled up, the whip cracks—the bills swell out! 500 rix-dollars for fine dresses; 1000 for gold and silver stuffs; 2000 for fine wines. Such purchases make them, the powerful money-potentates, and then drive home to scold about a few pence, and grumble over the dear times. "Two farthings' worth of gingerbread!" demands little Janne, in his ragged coat, and with his nose-end red with the cold, standing before the paradise of the huckster's stall, gets called little friend by its red-breasted cherub, receives two brown hearts, pays his money contentedly, goes his way as happy as a—prince? No, because a prince has too much to be happy with so little—but as a little, poor, good-hearted lad, who is as proud as can be to bid his little sister to a feast.

In the great market-place, booth after booth is opened in long rows, each one filled with bread, books, stuffs of all kinds, confectioneries, and with—everything in the world. It is the Christmas-market. And all the world—in Stockholm—goes to the Christmas-market to make purchases and to look about. Behind all this visible movement there is another movement in operation, which is invisible. There are, at this time, in Stockholm, tailors, seamstresses, shoemakers, carriage-builders, furriers, lace-weavers, gloves, in a word, makers and workers of every kind, who are not so lucky as to deceive more than twenty times in the day, with their "it shall be ready this evening!" "in the morning!" "by the end of the week!" "the very first of all!" which means the very last.

Thus it goes on in the month of December in the capital, and thus, no doubt, down to the very least of Swedish towns. In the country it is fresh life. Every mistress of a house steeps the fish, makes candles, and stuffs puddings. Every maid-servant is overheard in business. All heads and all hands are busy for Christmas. All men and all domestic animals will be fed plentifully: even sparrows will sing of Christmas on their appointed sheaf of oats; and human sparrows—the beggars—will be abundantly fed from rich men's tables. The earth experiences the truth of the Lord's words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

At this time there is an end of all candor and confidence in the family. Husbands and wives, parents, children, brothers and sisters, relations and friends, all conceal themselves from one another, all have secrets from one another, all have something to hide or withdraw from each other's sight. And an observer might think that such things testified but indifferently for the happiness of Swedish homes if the mirror of the soul, the eye, was not in the meantime become more loving and friendly than ever. But with roguish gravity, and repressed breath, the spirit of secrecy goes about sealing all lips until—all at once—as if by a magic stroke—amid the darkest night of the year, millions of lights are kindled, and, like a festive board, stands on the twenty-fourth of December, the whole kingdom of Sweden, from Lapmark down to Skone, and millions of voices exclaim the while, "it is Christmas! it is Christmas!"

The genius of equality never reigned thus absolutely in the old States of the republic, as this evening throughout Sweden. A groat-ladle is the sceptre in his hand. The odor of sweet groats prevails over the whole kingdom, and in its atmosphere breathe all, in a brotherly concord, high and low, great and small. Christmas-candles burn in castle and cottage. Such is Christmas-eve. But the light which is thus kindled extends much farther; and, like a circling wheel—pleasure follows pleasure for a long succession of days. There is dancing in cities, in towns, in hamlets. People drive, people feast, people play, and amid the sportive hours, a more gladsome turn is often given to serious life. Many a grudge; much ill-will disappears amid the "borrowed fire," and, Spirit, dost not observe something? Many a happy bond is knit for life amid blind man's buff and "hide the ring—hide the ring, show it to no one!" And so people go on till the twentieth day of Christmas, which is also called Knot, and which puts one upon the thread of Christmas pleasures. Christmas ends then; and on this evening, conformably with old Swedish custom, Christmas is danced out.

In the midst of this garland of sports and pleasures occurs the great festival of the Church, full of solemnity and light. On this occasion the churches are filled with people. The true religion of God is the friend of joy and animation. Therefore we rejoice at Christmas.

And now again is this festival come, and everywhere people think about giving pleasure to themselves, and, what is better, of giving pleasure to others. Oh! what delight I had in childhood for many weeks before Christmas, in thinking upon the Christmas-boxes with which I should surprise my parents, and brothers and sisters. I remember, in particular, a sketch, a landscape of my own composition, with which I designed to astonish and delight my father. I awoke every morning with this in my mind. It was a very ambitious work. Every thing was there: the Alps, the Mediterranean Sea; sun-rise; a vessel under sail; a Roman aqueduct in ruins; a rushing mountain-torrent, beside which sat a shepherd, playing on his flute to his flock, (a union of the sublime and the beautiful!) two travelling gentlemen, (the one was to represent my father) who, from a path down the Alps, observed all this, and were enraptured. The joy of the artist,—the child's love: the child's, or rather human nature's—self-love united to make my heart beat with the thought of the evening on which this sublime composition should be exhibited to the light, be admired by my father and the whole family, perhaps even by the provost and burgomaster; and—who knows?—perhaps the fame of it might go over the whole city. I did not remark, until the picture was finished, that the Mediterranean chanced to lie above the aqueduct; that the ship could not avoid striking against the sun; that the Alps looked like confectionery, and my father like a highwayman. My good father had not the heart to enlighten me on this subject; so that, although my masterpiece did not, by any means, cause the rapture which I expected, yet I remained for this time unpunished for my presumption. But ah! I fear that the hour of retribution is come; that my first-born son inherits my artistical talent and designs, to prepare for me a surprise like that which I, once upon a time, prepared for my father. I have seen something horribly shining forth from his drawing-board, and which, as I came nearer, was concealed with mighty haste. I wish, that when my hour comes, I may restrain myself as well as my deceased father did. We have now, for several days, been so full of mysteries one with another, and have attempted to hide in all corners with our intrigues, that I am quite weary of it, and long for the Christmas-goat, which will explain all. And, anon, his hour will be come. The clock strikes seven; I hear the voice of my wife, which orders tea and saffron cakes, “and lights in the parlor.” Now beat the hearts of the children, and—I almost think—mine also! I leave you, and will continue my letter to-morrow.

Christmas Day.

You should have seen them, my four children, dancing round the Christmas-tree, which hung full of apples, gingerbread, and other gimeracks; you should have seen them in the light of the Christmas candles, beaming with joy, skipping, singing, laughing in unrestrained life-enjoyment, and you would not have wondered that I, absorbed by the observation of the joyous picture, did not remark that the contents of my tea-cup which I poured into the saucer ran over, until I perceived something warm at my side, and to my horror, saw a grey pool upon the red worsted damask of the sofa. I immediately wiped it up, fortunately unobserved by my wife; but many will be the wonderings as to how and when that stain came upon it!

And now we were all assembled; my wife—an excellent wife, I assure you, but almost too great a hater of stains upon furniture—my wife, my wife's husband, two young relations: the Student N., and Mamsell Mina, and my four children. We drank tea and dipped in great slices of saffron bread. We ought to have talked and made believe that nothing was going to happen. But it would not do. The state of the weather was attempted. I thought we should have snow; the Student, that we should have thaw; my wife's idea was, that we should soon have winter; mine, that we had winter already; Mamsell Mina's, that we should have an early spring, and so on. In the meantime, the children began to cast expressive glances one at another, and then quickly I saw my eldest daughter, with diplomatic address, steal out of the room, and then the rest, one after another. Nobody observed it—Heaven forbid! but my wife smiled, and so did I.

In a little while the children again entered, and now, in solemn procession, the eldest first, the youngest last.

My eldest daughter, a twelve-year old and very patriotic girl, stepped forward towards me with a waistcoat in her hand, which she herself had worked for me, and which blazed with the colors of the Swedish flag—yellow and blue: both waistcoat and girl I clasped tenderly to my heart. My first-born son, a promising youth of thirteen, presented at the same time to his mother, with some pride, a colossal long-legged footstool, which, with a certain fear and circumspection, she received into her hands, uttering a joyous exclamation of applause at this, his first masterpiece of carpentry. After this he approached me, and, with a certain degree of horror, I saw a great paper in his hand. “Now it comes!” thought I. I saw, in spirit, the Alps, the Mediterranean Sea, the sun, myself—myself, even!—but, the gentle stars be thanked! it was better than I expected; for, as with terror I took the paper into my hands, I saw no Alps, only a pair of human heads, which seemed to be goring one another—although it was meant to represent kissing—yet, still, the whole thing was so human, that I could with great truth answer my wife's somewhat uneasily questioning glances by—“Ay, ay! look here, now. At his age I could hardly have done better myself!”

My six-year-old Willie, a little quiet lad, given to looking after relics, and who must be designed for an antiquary—I had a presentiment regarding the Christmas gift which, with some importance, he presented to his mother. This was a collection of remarkable things which he had found—crooked pins, broken-pointed needles, headless nails, glittering grains of sand, little pieces of gilding, a possible piece of money, and such-like curiosities, which caused us to burst into a hearty laugh. This embarrassed the little collector, and filled his eyes with tears, which we immediately kissed away, and assumed that demeanor of respect with which one regards relics from Herculaneum. And as among these treasures we discovered an old Northern coin of real value, then were my little fellow and I proud and glad. Bertha, my little darling—she, with her own small dear fingers, had made her first essay at hemming on a pocket-handkerchief, which father and mother were to use alternately, or in company. The two young relations also came forth modestly with their presents. The student, with verses which he dedicated to my wife and me, in which “the strength of the North” was spoken of, Ygdrasil and Ragnorak, and again “the strength of the North.” Mamsell Mina presented us with an especially beautiful piece of work, for which, with crimsoning cheeks, she received our thanks.

Whilst we—my wife and I—were more closely examining our Christmas-gifts by the light, turning them in every direction, and finding them all remarkable, there suddenly was heard a thundering noise at the door. Great sensation! especially among the younger part of the company. Immediately afterwards the door opened, and there entered a beast which might have put to flight all the wild beasts of Africa, but which saluted with great good-will the small community in the room. This was the Christmas-goat, with great horns, with wild shaggy eye-brows, and many characteristics of the monster: behind him came a young servant-maid with a baking trough full of Christmas-boxes. And immediately was the room bombarded with these. They rolled about, and flew here and there, and after them the four children, amid a tumult of delight. A terrible tumult was this. The long legs of my first-born occasioned a dreadful convulsion among chairs and tables, and, as I feared, even upon his own masterpiece of carpentry. Amid the universal tumult, I happened to see my wife wrap something up in her shawl: it seemed to me to be the ruins of the colossal footstool, and I fancied that three legs were missing!

Every seven or ten minutes the Christmas-goat made a volcanic movement, upon which many little packets were flung up into the air. At one time a half-anchor, and then a half-cask, was rolled in; and all these had to be brought to the light, and there, in presence of all, their inscriptions read, which contained many odd and significant puns jeu d'esprits, which were duly interpreted. In various of the verses I perceived the young genius of the student; and in many of the jokes the merry humor of Mina. Two hours were spent amid frolics of this kind, and the peals of laughter which they excited. At the end of that time the young student stood in a new black suit, and, striking his hand upon his breast, declaimed, I know not what sort of tragi-comic oration, before Mamsell Mina, and she, almost killing herself with laughter, attempted to answer him in the same spirit. My first-born made entrechats on entrechats around a library of ten volumes: my eldest daughter danced before her new hat; Willie beat a drum; and little Bertha embraced a cat of pasteboard, and gave it the most loving of pet names. That was a confusion, but it was a confusion which did the heart good. All the young ones found their wishes gratified; and each and all had therein his sugar-plum to suck at a future time.

And now we had to eat, and after that to sleep; both of which were difficult for the children, who now could see nothing, could occupy themselves with nothing, but their Christmas-boxes. Each one took his most precious gift to table. Little Bertha's cat must go with her to bed. Every one longed for the morrow, that he might the better examine his splendid treasures. Whilst they lay and talked of these, slumber came and kissed the words from their lips. They now lie and sleep. Joyous evening! God be praised for thee, and that thou comest and lightest up a portion of our long dark winter with a ray of that light which once, in the darkness of the world, was kindled at the cradle of a child. Beautiful, also, is the old Swedish custom of allowing all children to celebrate the birth of the Child of God. I have been a child, and have wept, and laughed, and wept again, like all my little April-mooded compeers, quickly forgetting the occasion both of smiles and tears. I have become a man, and have experienced the sorrows of life, and the pleasures of the world: they are now only as a dimmed memory; but, like a newly-kindled light—like a clear, crackling winter's fire—flames up before my mind the delights of Christmas evening in my childhood. Many a pleasure, many a breeze of spring, many a bright beam of autumn sunshine, may still cheer the aged; but the joy of Christmas-eve, that indescribable, unmixed, innocently-intoxicating delight, experiences he never more! Yet he still can enjoy it, in the gladness of children—his own, or—others!

Come to Sweden, George. Celebrate with us next Christmas-eve; and let us together drink a health to all good parents and happy children for Christmas this year, and every year until the end of time!

Your friend,

F. B.

HEART-SHADOWS.

BT MEETA.

It was a cold night—quite cold, the snow fleecing down, and the hail rattling against the windows. The wild storm-king was out with the blast, intent on mirthful mischief. The old clock ticked cheerily, and the fitful shadows waved unsteadily on the wall. The winter was without, but the summer of peace rested in my heart.

I sat in the great arm-chair, in the fire-twilight, alone, and in a reverie, half dreaming, as it were, my past life over again. The golden book of Memory lay unclasped before me—every thought, every feeling of by-gone hours traced ineffaceably there. All sorrows, all joys, intermingling and forming link in link, a beautiful chain, without which life would be incomplete. We were friends, Alice and I, early friends and true ones; she was older and far gentler, with mild, loving eyes, and soft, shadowy, dark hair. I was young and thoughtless, and I had treasured up in my heart an idol, one worshipped and adored. I dwelt in a beautiful dream, waking and sleeping, and my guardian spirit was ever Alice. Alas! how rudely was that dream broken; how inexpressibly sad the knowledge that it could never come again; and yet all life is but a dream.

Beautiful in soul was she, and they called her Alice Faye, but to me she was only Alice—darling Alice. We were wandering, two hearts in one, through the beautiful Present, seeking not to unveil the rugged world of Futurity, and knowing and believing that to the Past were confided all estimable things.

Oh, our Father! Thou who knowest the frailty of all earth's flowers, lend, oh! lend us Thy aid to withstand the frosts of adversity, the chilly, wintry winds that crush the already bruised and broken reed.

How vivid is that memory rising before me now—the memory of our parting. It was a beautiful, radiant day, late in the summer. Alice and I had been in company with some youthful friends, and now, arm-in-arm, were returning through the wood. We bent our steps towards our favorite haunt—a hushed, sweet spot, where the grass grew long and luxuriant, and the wild vine trailed its crimson bloom-flowers, dark, yet bright amid the flowers that begemmed the earth. Our accustomed seat was beside a shelving rock, overhung with the graceful honeysuckle and clambering roses, its rude face half hidden by the beautiful objects clinging around it. The wild-locust, laden with its pure blossoms, and the poplar, silver-limbed, threw a pleasant shade over it.

Here, the earth seemed more kind and smiling, and, among all fond memories, this is to me the holiest and best-beloved.

We sat silently—Alice's hand clasped fast in mine, and her head leaning down upon my shoulder so confidently, so caressingly. The sunlight was glimmering through the glossy leaves, and the rich snowy blossoms of the locust were dropping softly—softly down around us.

It was then that we first awakened from our happy dream-life—for the first time ventured to peep into the unknown futurity. I felt that life was, indeed, but a "walking shadow," and bursting into tears, hid my face amid Alice's bright tresses.

"Don't cry, Ruby, darling," whispered Alice, very soft, calling me by an endearing name of childhood; "don't cry, it will not be for a long time—not very long.

Her own voice trembled a little, although she tried hard that it should not.

"Ah, Alice," said I, sadly, "a dim foreshadowing of the future is twining itself around my spirit—that great future, which is a strange world to us. Perhaps we may never meet in friendship again, Alice; perhaps we may doubt each other's sincerity."

"No, no, Ruby, dear Ruby," replied Alice, winding her arms closer around me, "we'll never doubt each other. Our dearest hopes are anchored in the great sea of the world; but they will remain steadfast. Oh! we'll never be estranged, Ruby."

"Never!" I echoed, and, yet through the mazes of the forest there seemed to float a voice, strangely mournful, repeating that vow of eternal friendship, breathing a warning for our sanguine hopes, a knell for our parting hour.

Alas! how slowly, how sadly, have the years passed since then, for doubt and mistrust gliding in, severed that sacred chain where we thought it was the strongest. We met again in after years, but the world—the world had taught us how to crush the wild, wayward throbbings of our hearts. We were living—and yet dead; living as the breath giveth life; yet dead to all the gentler influences, the holier emotions of that love once so dear to us. And the youthful years that had shadowed us so kindly with their wings, withdrew to weep over the ashes of our former friendship.

The fire was gleaming faintly in the chimney, my reverie was over—and yet I felt so sad, so lonely sitting there. I thought I felt a soft touch upon my shoulder—heard a gentle voice whispering a name of other years—Ruby! I was glad some one had said it: it was a sweet remembrance in a time of sorrow. Somebody whispered loving words, somebody knelt beside me and pressed a soft cheek to mine. I returned the pressure—I wept, yet I knew not why. I only remember that Alice was kneeling there beside me, my own Alice, and that we were friends again.

It was so sweet, so strangely sweet, to have her there as of old, the same love-light in those kindly eyes, the same holy beauty resting on that placid brow, I fancied that it was all a dream, and I dared not move, lest the entrancing spell should break.

That joyful meeting is marked forever with a "morning star" in the heaven of my existence. And now, each budding hope, each undefined fear, give I henceforth to the sacred keeping of our Father, our Protector, and our God.

In the hushed and holy stillness of the night, when the stars and flowers keep watch over earth, and every soul ascends on trembling wings to the Throne of Him above, I fall asleep quietly to dream of the angels and of Alice Faye.

Even so hath He ordained, that we shall give a smile for every new sunbeam born to the earth, a tear for every blossom untimely withered.

For every heart hath a sunlight, every soul a shadow.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 1852.

EARLY NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

BY E. KENNEDY.

Tommy. One thing I've often wondered about, papa.

Papa. Well, Tommy; I love to hear boys say they wonder about things, it is evidence of an enquiring mind.

T. This long river, the Mississippi, how did the people navigate it before the steamboats began to run there?

P. Sure enough, how did they? If you mean the Indians, the answer is readily given; they navigated it in canoes and "dug-outs," formed from the trunks of trees. As it was in the days of their ancestors, so is it now, and will be whilst any of the tribes of the Red Man remain, for they seem to be a people altogether incapable of improvement.

T. But I didn't so much mean the Indians, as the white men, who, about the time of the Revolutionary War, began to settle in Kentucky, as I have read.

P. They had flat-boats and keel-boats: these floated along with the current of the river, and conveyed the produce of these industrious men far down the distant stream, reaching New Orleans in the course of their patient pilgrimage. Flat-boats were merely huge floating-houses, made sufficiently water-tight to endure the voyage down stream. The adventurous farmer, having built himself such a rude, flat-bottomed craft, stored it well with hogsheads of tobacco, and barrels filled with grain, and taking with him three or four others, as hardy and as adventurous as himself, set sail, as we would term it, upon the broad bosom of the stream, moving onward with its waters, and, in the course of a few weeks, would find himself safely landed at the levee of New Orleans.

T. But how would he get back home, again, if there were no steamboats to carry him up the river?

P. Aye, that, indeed! His flat-boat he sold for lumber, and, with the money in his pocket, the entire proceeds of his trip, he started homewards on foot.

T. What! did he walk all the way from New Orleans to Kentucky and Ohio?

P. Yes; every step of the way. I myself have seen, in the back counties of the State of Mississippi, an old, grass-grown path through the woods, called the "Natchez trace," where companies of these returning boatmen passed, years ago, upon their long and wearisome journey homeward. By the shortest possible route, the distance to their forest homes, in Kentucky, could not have been less than five or six hundred miles. I might tell you long stories of their perils and adventures, such as I have heard old people relate, in the far-off region of the South-West; of their encounters with robbers and Indians, and of the resolute defence they made against all intruders upon their midnight camping-ground.

T. But some of their boats were brought back again, else how did they supply themselves with groceries, and such things as they should buy in New Orleans?

P. The keel-boats were for that purpose; and, indeed, a most tedious process it was to force their way up the strong current of the Mississippi. To row their boats up stream was impossible, and poles were useless in deep water, and when the river was swollen.

T. I can't imagine, then, how they got along at all.

P. Well, it was tough, ugly work. To pull a big, heavy keel-boat, by hand, all the way from New Orleans to Cincinnati, or Pittsburg, a distance of fifteen hundred or two thousand miles, was a labor of the severest kind, and required months to accomplish it: two, three, four months, perhaps.

T. You say, to pull the boat—how?

P. Why, by means of the trees that overhung the water, and by the branches, seizing upon which, they hauled themselves onward; or, sometimes, by carrying out a rope a long distance ahead, and attaching it to a tree, and thus impelling onward the huge, struggling keel-boat, laden heavily with "freight." Up to about the years 1817 or 1820, this was the plan practised for the toilsome navigation of these noble Western streams, which now echo to the sound of the puffing steamer. Now-a-days, the trip is performed in eight or ten days, which, within the recollection of men now living, was only accomplished by the excessive toil of weeks and months.

T. O! the wonders of steam!

P. You may well say, O! the wonders of steam! But the Kentuckians hardly dreamed of such a result as that which has now come to pass when they set about nullifying, and setting up for themselves as an independent government.

T. I suppose that account I've read in Butler's History of Kentucky is true, then, of their notions to be independent?

P. Yes, it is true, as a matter of history, but no imputation rests upon Kentucky patriotism on account of it. You must bear in mind, that steamboating has opened out new views of things upon these Western waters, altogether. In the year 1800, and before that time, the difficulties of navigation, and the general infancy of our country, contributed to the neglect of these backwoods settlements, as they were called, and from the force of circumstances, as then existing, the hardy Western pioneers were driven to think of throwing themselves into the hands of Spain or some foreign power, or of endeavoring to maintain their own independence.

T. I can't help but wonder at that!

P. We do wonder at it now, in our time, when the tide of enlightened progress and improvement has so far extended over these forest regions, and when everything seems so completely changed about; but call to mind, for a moment, the condition of this American Union as it was in the days of our grandfathers and grandmothers, and when we were few in numbers, and without any national name or character, and when the infant Republic embodied only a dozen feeble States clustered along the sea-board, with hardly a town of any size out of the reach of salt water! Kentucky, fifty years ago, was regarded as "far, far away!"—an abode of Indians and wild beasts; and the noble rivers which swept by its borders were hardly esteemed useful to man, in consequence of the immense difficulties, such as I have described to you, in the way of navigation. The canoe of the savage was paddled about along the shores, and an occasional keel-boat, loaded with groceries and dry goods, iron and salt, found its laborious and tedious way up the arrowy current, but otherwise they all swept onward in silence, emptying their vast floods into the far off Gulf of Mexico, and nobody was much the gainer by such vast and bountiful channels of nature as they proved to be. But Robert Fulton came after awhile, and he introduced steam and steamboats, and then the deep forests began to echo to a new sound, and a new appearance of things began.

T. So Kentucky never expected to be almost in the centre of the Union, did she?

P. I should rather think not. Her few adventurous pioneers, fighting manfully with their axes, against the huge forests, and protecting themselves with their rifles whilst ploughing in the field, against the murderous attacks of the savages, thought of but little else than self-preservation. The broad range of the Allegheny Mountains lay between them and the older settlements; it was a wearisome journey ever to get there. Their own natural outlet and place of deposit was New Orleans, and this was held by Spain. We are not to wonder, then, that even some of the best men, Kentuckians of the first distinction, were found, as you will see them mentioned by the historian, listening—unworthily, as we would think—to the tempting tale told into their ears by the wily and seductive Spaniard: How that they should join in an amicable union of the West, aided and assisted by Spain, in some way which does not clearly appear,—and that then all these mighty rivers, and these productive plains should be independent, and that they should be a nation of themselves, and without any allegiance to the poor infantile Republic strung along the far distant Atlantic coast.

T. But the design, and never attempted to be carried out, was it?

P. No: in 1800 Louisiana passed out of the hands of the Spaniards into the possession of the French, and in 1803 we obtained the ownership of the country very happily, which forever hushed all causes of discontent, and all notions of a separate government. And in the course of a few years steam and steamboats were introduced, and this, as I said, put a new view upon things altogether: but what I have told you is a matter of history, nevertheless, as you yourself can search into, at your leisure.

CHOICE READINGS.

MARRIAGES.—Marriages not solemnized by the duties of religion, are seldom happy; and all ages testify to the truth that marriage has ever been closely allied to religion. It has had its altar, its offering, its rites, its invocation, its shrine, its mysteries, its mystical significance. "It is honorable," says the apostle. "Precious," some commentators tell us; the epithet should be rendered,—of great value, of highest price. In either sense, it would well denote what may be called, by way of eminence, the conservative institution of human society, the channel for the transmission of its purest life, and, for this very reason, the object ever of the fiercest attacks of every scheme of disorganizing philosophy. In harmony with this idea, there was a deep significance in some of the Greek marriage ceremonies; and, among these, none possessed a profounder import than the custom of carrying a torch or torches in the bridal procession. Especially was this the mother's delightful office. It was her's, in a peculiar manner, to bear aloft the flaming symbol before the daughter or the daughter-in-law, and there was no act of her life to which the heart of a Grecian mother looked forward with a more lively interest. It was, on the other hand, a ground of the most passionate grief, when an early death, or some still more sadder calamity, cut off the fond anticipation. Thus, Medea,—

"I go an exile to a foreign land,
Ere blest in you, or having seen you bless'd.
That rapturous office never shall be mine,
To adorn the bride, and with a mother's hand,
Lift high the nuptial torch."

Like many other classical expressions, it has passed into common use, and become a mere conventional phraseology, and this is the case with much of our poetical and rhetorical dialect.

CHILDREN.—The part that children play in the economy of families, is an important one. But important functions often devolve upon creatures trivial in themselves. Not so in the case of children. The child is greater than the man. The man is himself, and that is often a shabby enough concern; but the child is a thing of hope and anticipation; we know not what it may become. The arch laughing glance of those eyes, which flash upon us when the bushy nut-brown hair is thrown back by a toss of the head—what a lovely creature that may become, to make some honest man's heart ache! That boy, with flaxen hair slightly tinged with the golden, while his clear, resolute eye looks fearlessly at everything it encounters—what may he not accomplish in after-life! To us there is more of terror in the passions of children, than of grown men. They are so disproportioned to their causes, that they rudely draw back the veil from our own hearts, reminding us "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." Of all expressions of pain, we can least endure the wail of an infant. The poor little innocent cannot explain its sufferings; and, if it could, so little lies in our power to alleviate them. There is nothing for it but to have one's heart rent by its complainings, and pray in one's helplessness that its dark hour may pass away.

GOOD MANNERS.—If your ambition is to be a well-bred lady, you must carry your good manners everywhere with you. These are not things that can be laid aside and put on at pleasure. True politeness is uniform disinterestedness in trifles, accompanied by the calm self-possession which belongs to a noble simplicity of purpose; and this must be the effect of a Christian spirit running through all you think, say or do; and unless you cultivate and exercise it upon all occasions, and towards all persons, it will never become a part of yourself: When you try to assume it for some special purpose, it will sit awkwardly upon you, and often fail you at your greatest need. If you are unpolite to your washerwoman, you are in great danger of being so to the very lady whose good wishes you are trying to propitiate. Rude manners are so insinuating that they will steal upon you unawares, without their opposite has become a habit. The charm which true Christian politeness sheds over a person, though not easily described, is felt by all hearts, and invariably responded to by the best feelings of your nature.

HAVE NO SECRETS.—Unreserved communication is the lawful commerce of conjugal affection, and all concealment is contraband. It is a false compliment to the object of our affection, if, for the sake of sparing them a transient uneasiness, we rob them of the comfort to which they are entitled of mitigating our suffering, by partaking it. All dissimulation is disloyalty to love; besides, it argues a lamentable ignorance of human life, to set out with an expectation of health without interruption, and happiness without alloy. When young persons marry with the fairest prospects, they should never forget that infirmity is bound up with their very nature, and that in bearing one another's burdens, they fulfil one of the highest duties of the union.

ACTIVE WOMEN.—As a rule, it may be remarked that noisy women do much less than they seem to do, and quiet women often do more. But it does not follow that all quiet women are active; on the contrary, six out of ten are indolent, and work only on compulsion. Indolent women have their good points, and one of the most valuable of these is their quietness. It is a great luxury in domestic life; but perhaps it is a luxury which is too expensive for a poor man, unless he can get it combined with activity. The wife of a poor man, no matter what his profession or position, ought to be active in the best sense of the word. She ought to rule her own house with diligence, but not boast of it. Her managing powers ought to be confined to her own house, and never be sent out to interfere with her neighbors.

THE FAME OF AUTHORS.—The fame of most writers is very ephemeral, chiefly owing to their choice of subjects of the day or of the age or nation. English literature does not preserve above eight or ten authors before the age of Shakspeare; not above twenty from Shakspeare to Addison, and scarcely fifty from the time of Addison to the year 1840. Since the days of Elizabeth one or two books or pamphlets per day have been printed; but the subjects were obsolete theology, forgotten politics, or superseded philosophy, the majority in bad method or bad taste. It has been the same in France, Germany, Italy, and Holland, and doubtless was the same among the ancients, though we so often lament the loss of their works.

CHILDHOOD'S TEARS.—There is sometimes a moral necessity for the correction of children, notwithstanding the pain which a profusion of their tears will often give us. The great rule is, never to correct in anger, but with the firmness which is founded on the deliberations of reason. The sorrows of children, however, are exceedingly transient, and have often been the subject of poetical remark, but in no instance with more beauty than in the following simile by Sir Walter Scott:

"The tear down childhood's cheek that flows
Is like the dew-drop on the rose;
When next the summer breeze comes by,
And waves the bush, the flower is dry."

THE DREAM OF LIFE.—How few of us at the close of life can say, "I have filled and occupied the position to which I looked forward when a boy!" In the onward progress of life, how often, in some stray moment of thought and reflection, do we not find ourselves inquiring, "Is this as I hoped,—have I enacted my dream?" And the answer is invariably—No! We look forward in childhood—and only look forward—without reflection. We build up gorgeous palaces, we sketch a career of life all gold and sunshine,—what are they, and where are they, when years sober us?

READING IN BED.—We never knew much good, if any, come out of such a habit. In our opinion it is not only absurd, but baneful, in the highest degree dangerous, and should be strictly prohibited. What, although Sheridan did it? That mad and dissipated statesman did many things which no other person would do, who did not wish to lose all modern character for common sense or discretion. There is a time for everything, and so there ought to be a place for everything, and the bed is not the proper one for reading, but for sleeping.

Many of the self-righteous are not only proud of their supposed nearness to God, but assume towards Him patronizing airs; so monstrous are the effects of pride in combination with religion.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES.

TALE OF A PIN.—In an early month of the year 1778, with a tolerable education, and with many natural qualifications for a financial life, Jacques Laffitte was seeking for a situation as a clerk. He had high hopes and a light heart, for he brought with him a letter of introduction to M. Perregaux, the Swiss banker. But with all his sanguine anticipations and golden day-dreams, he was bashful and retiring. It was with a trembling heart that the young provincial appeared before the Parisian man of bonds and gold. He managed to explain the purpose of his visit, and presented his letter of recommendation. The banker quietly read the note. "It is impossible," said he, as he laid it aside, "that I can find room for you at present; all my offices are full. Should there be a vacancy at a future time, I will see what can be done. In the meantime, I advise you to seek elsewhere, as it may be a considerable period before I shall be able to admit you." Away went sunshine and prosperous visions! Disappointed and gloomy, poor Jacques left the presence of the polite banker. As he crossed, with downcast eyes, the court-yard of the noble mansion, he observed a pin lying on the ground. His habitual habits of frugality, amidst his disappointment, were still upon the watch. He picked up the pin, and carefully stuck it into the lapel of his coat. From that trivial action sprang his future greatness; that one single act of frugal care and regard for little things opened the way to a stupendous fortune. From the window of his cabinet, M. Perregaux had observed the action of the rejected clerk, and he wisely thought that the man who would stoop to pick up a pin, under such circumstances, was endowed with the necessary qualities for a good economist; he read in that single act of parsimony an indication of a great financial mind, and he deemed the acquisition of such a one as wealth itself. Before the day had closed, Laffitte received a note from the banker. "A place," it said, "is made for you at my office, which you may take possession of to-morrow." The banker was not deceived in his estimate of the character of Laffitte, and the young clerk soon displayed a talent and aptness for his calling that procured his advancement from a clerk to a cashier; from a cashier to a partner; and from a partner to the head proprietor of the first banking-house in Paris. He became a deputy, and then a president of the council of ministers. What a destiny for the man who would stoop to pick up a pin!

PERILOUS POSITION.—At midnight, there was a perfect gale from the south-east. The ship had been snugged, by little and little, until at length she was "hove to," under close-reefed maintop-sail. About eight o'clock, orders were given to stow the flying jib, the foremost sail in the ship. Two of the men went out to perform this duty. As one of them was feeling his way out, for it was as dark as pitch, he planted his feet on the lee foot-rope, and was almost precipitated into the yawning abyss. He caught hold of a rope in his fall, and struggled for a long time. It was very long, indeed, not to him, but to those who were watching his writhing form by the light of the boiling and phosphorescent waves beneath. I was on the weather bow, at the time, and saw how his comrades behaved. No one spoke a word, for that might only diminish his chances of escape; there was no help for him if he failed to save himself. The man who was on the jib-boom with him, moved neither hand nor foot, and uttered not a word. At length, he regained his footing, and proceeded to his duty. Had he been a minute longer swinging among the foot-ropes, he would have been swept off never more to be seen, for the bowsprit was buried in the sea, while the two men were clinging with clasped arms to the yielding spar, on the strength of which their lives were hung. When they came in, having discharged the duty entrusted to them, I endeavored to be near the one who had made such a narrow escape. As he stepped down upon the deck, he touched me by the merest accident. A trembling sensation passed through his whole frame, and a marked inspiratory effort carried gratitude to Heaven from his breast. On the very threshold of home we might have lost this poor fellow, after the Arctic winter and the intense frost, after the fatigue of travelling, and the excruciating thirst had all failed to break our numbers. — Sutherland's Journal of Captain Penny's Voyage to Wellington Channel.

MOORE AND HIS MOTHER.—The mother's care of Moore's early years and unabated love, through her advanced age, was truly beautiful. They were requited, too, with the fullest measure of grateful affection and undying respect by the son. When Mr. Moore (the father) died, having held for years a Government appointment of barrack-master, friends sought to secure for his widow a pension; but Moore claimed the privilege of her support, and declined the kind agency which would have debarred him of a son's greatest pleasure. His habit was to write twice a week, at least, to his mother; and the postman's knock at the expected period was an anxiously watched moment in the old woman's fleeting hours. Any visitor could tell, on entering her drawing-room, as she sat in winter by the fire, or in summer at her window, whether the bi-weekly want was supplied. A shade upon her aged brow told either that the letter had not come, or the news was not good: whilst a radiant smile proclaimed that she got "Tom's letter." These letters, short though they might be, often but a line, were the cherished treasures of her old age. How beautiful, and the more beautiful because true, are the lines which he wrote in her pocket-book, in 1822:—

"They tell us of an Indian tree
Which, howso'er the sun and sky
May tempt its boughs to wander free,
And shoot the blossom, wide and high!—

Far better loves to bend its arms
Downward again to that dear earth,
From which the life that fills and warms
Its grateful being first had birth.

'Tis thus, though woo'd by flattering friends,
And fed with fame (if fame it be),
This heart, my own dear mother bends,
With love's true instinct back to thee."

With what fond pride were those lines exhibited to those who had won the mother's confidence! A willing listener, one who did not soon tire of

"Tom's" repeated praises, was sure of such a mark of favor.

FEMALE PRESENCE OF MIND.—A lady, one day, returning from a drive, looked up, and saw two of her children, one about five and the other about four years old, on the outside of the garret-window, which they were busily employed in rubbing with their handkerchiefs, in imitation of a person whom they had seen a few days before cleaning the windows. They had clambered over the bars which had been intended to secure them from danger. The lady had sufficient command over herself not to appear to observe them; she did not utter one word, but hastened up to the nursery, and, instead of rushing forward to snatch them in, which might have frightened them, and caused them to lose their balance, she stood a little apart, and called gently to them, and bade them come in. They saw no appearance of hurry or agitation in their mamma, so they took time, and deliberately climbed the bars, and landed safely in the room. One look of terror, one tone of impatience from her, and the little creatures might have become confused, lost their footing, and been destroyed.

USEFUL AND INSTRUCTIVE.

The Vatican contains eight grand stair-cases and two ordinary ones, twenty courts and squares, and 4220 rooms. With all its galleries, grounds and appurtenances, it has been computed to cover as large a space as the city of Turin.

PALMS.—Palms are the most useful productions of Ceylon. First, the cocoa-nut, in universal use for food, drink, and the arts of life. The palmyra, nearly as valuable. The areca catechu, whose nuts, the betel and the chunan, are the universal luxury of Asiatics. A tree produces from 500 to 1000 nuts. The sago palm, whose pith, dried and granulated, is in use through Europe, is also prolific in sugar. The talipot is famous for its large leaves (one of which shelters fifteen or twenty men) and its fruit. The jack produces fruit as large as a man's body, filled with delicious pulp, and with seeds as large as chestnuts, of which many dishes are made. A Cingalese family live at ease on the produce of a dozen cocoa-nuts and three or four jack trees.

FEVERS NOT CONTAGIOUS—Dr. Wallis, Senior Physician of the Bristol Infirmary, writing to the Bristol Journal, says:—"The common fevers of this country, including typhus fever, have no contagious power whatever? These are produced by malaria and depressed and unhealthy conditions of the digestive organs. Hence, a complete defence against these diseases is, wholesome food, wholesome air, and cleanliness. Further, an inquiry has been instituted by the Government, and a report has been made by the naval and military medical officers, upon the nature and causes of yellow fever, the most violent and fatal of all fevers: and these eminent men declare that the yellow fever is not contagious. The report was kindly sent to me by an officer of the Government, and is now before me. In our own infirmary it is the constant practice to place the severest forms of fever indiscriminately among the other patients, and, although the beds are only two feet apart, no instance has ever been known of any fever affecting the occupant of the next bed. No such infection of fever from one bed to the next has occurred within my memory, and it is upwards of forty years since I commenced my profession as a pupil in our infirmary; and I then inquired of an old medical officer respecting this fact, and he declared that he had been forty years an officer of the house, and that no such occurrence had taken place in his time. Thus, if fever will not affect another person who lies two feet apart, once in eighty years, such an occurrence cannot reasonably be expected to happen at all. In short, wholesome food, cleanliness, and ventilation, are all that is necessary for a defence against fevers."

DIVISIBILITY OF MATTER.—It is scarcely credible, yet a slip of ivory, of an inch in length, may be divided into a hundred equal parts, each of which is distinctly visible, but by the application of a very fine screw, 5000 equi-distant lines, in the space of a quarter of an inch, can be traced on a surface of steel, or glass, with the fine point of a diamond, producing delicate and varied colors, thereby proving that the beautiful hues of mother-of-pearl, peacock-pearl, and the less delicate appearance of what are termed watered fabrics, are the effect of irregularity of surface, not, as might be supposed in the case of mother-of-pearl and peacock-pearl, the result of variety of substance. A single pound of cotton has been spun into a thread seventy-six miles in length, and the same quantity of wool has been extended into a thread of ninety-five miles, the diameters of those threads being only the 350th and 400th parts of an inch.

EXTRAORDINARY LOCK.—The editor of the American Artisan was recently shown a piece of mechanism, which certainly goes ahead of anything in the shape of a lock that we have ever seen or read of in the essential of security from depredation. It is called Yale's Magic Lock, and is absolutely unpickable as the kernel of a walnut would be without damaging the shell. The only opening is a circular orifice, half an inch in diameter, for admitting the key, and through which there is no possible access to the tumblers by any instrument whatever—not even by the key itself, strange as that may seem. By a singular contrivance, a portion of the key is detached after insertion, and sent to a distant part of the lock, where it moves the tumblers, and where the tools of the burglar could never arrive, except by first battering the lock to pieces.

The key-hole resembles the interior of a small pistol barrel, and having no opening in the interior basin of the lock, would not receive powder enough to blow it open. The lock is, therefore, absolutely gunpowder proof, also. Among other peculiarities, the key is susceptible of from forty thousand to one million of changes. A change of the key changes the lock, also, in the act of locking, so that one may have a new lock every day for hundreds of years! By a change of the key, after locking it, it is rendered impossible to unlock, even with the same key, until altered back again. One may thus lose the key, or have it stolen, and still entertain no fears of the lock being opened with it. The proprietors offer a reward of five hundred dollars to any one who will pick it through the key-hole, using whatever instruments he pleases, and taking any length of time he may desire.

ABOUT SOME BIRDS.

May I tell you child-readers a little story, and ask a question or two in connection with it, to set them thinking?

During a few months' residence in M——, Vermont, there lived opposite us a widow, somewhat advanced in life, and poor. She lived alone in a small white cottage, surrounded with trees and shrubbery, which afforded nesting-places to many birds. In the absence of other companions, the widow cherished these birds with great care, not willingly allowing either man or beast to disturb them. One pair used every year to make their nest in a shrub, which grew so near that she could put her hand into it from her bedroom window; and they were so tame and trustful of her, that she often used in this way to feed both parents and young.

By the roadside, in front of her house, were some tall poplars, in which many families of birds were reared every spring. During the season we spent there, it became necessary for widening the road, to cut down one of these poplars, greatly to the old lady's sorrow, for she knew there were several nests in it, and among them that of a favorite pair of robins, in whose domestic affairs she felt a deep interest. While the men were chopping the trunk, it was painful to see and hear the distress of the poor birds, manifested in their short, rapid circles of flight, and their screams, that went to the heart. But the tree fell, bringing five nests of young birds violently to the ground, and killing most of them. The cries of the bereaved parents now became more affecting than ever. One could hardly refrain from tears who heard them. The old lady dared not look for her robin's nest, for she had no doubt that the young were all dead. By and by, hearing a singular noise at her front door, she opened it, and what do you think she saw? The two old robins had somehow or other brought their four young ones unharmed, or at least not killed, but unfledged, placed them upon the doorstep, and with pleading looks and plaintive voices appealed to the poor widow to befriend them in their distress. And you will readily believe she did the best she could for them.

Now, why do you suppose those robins in distress took their little ones to the widow's door? We asked her the question, and she said she imagined it was because she was a poor, lonely widow, and they thought she could sympathize with their troubles better than most folks. I guess it was because she had always been kind to the birds, and their instinct taught them, now when they so much needed kindness, to go where they had been wont to find it.

Do you not suppose it made that kind old lady very happy to have the birds confide in her as they did, when they are ordinarily so shy of us? And wouldn't you like to have them do the same by you? Suppose, then, you treat the birds and all other animals as she did, and try them when you have an opportunity. Many boys are so cruel that they can never learn, by their own observation, how many pleasant things there are about birds. I was hardly ever so ashamed of my old home as when I read, awhile ago, that on a public day some boy fired a bunch of crackers in a nest of young birds in one of the trees on Boston Common, killing them all. What could be more cruel?

Is it not true what the Bible teaches, that God takes care of the birds? Will He not then care of you, and ought you not ever to trust Him?

He has always taken care of you, and do you feel towards Him a gratitude and confidence as far exceeding that shown by the robins towards their friend, as your knowledge and indebtedness exceed theirs?"

If not, then does He not say with reason, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me?"—Congregationalist.

PUNCTUALITY.

We know of nothing more commendable as a general rule, and in a general sense, than Punctuality. We allude not only to important, but to trifling matters. Character—confidence—depend greatly upon the manner in which an individual keeps his engagements. One who habitually violates his word, who promises, never intending to perform, is morally deficient to a frightful extent, and deserves neither respect nor consideration. But, there are others who mean well, who do not lack principle, who would blush to utter a deliberate untruth, and yet they falter and fail, for want of firmness, nerve and decision. They promise, intending to perform, hoping to be able to keep the engagement, and yet without due consideration, or a proper appreciation of the consequences of failure. There are others again who are always "a little too late"—always behind the time. They have a habit of delay, and thus they postpone and procrastinate from hour to hour, and not only injure themselves, but waste the time of other people. The error is one that should, if possible, be corrected in early life. The lad who is a laggard and always the last at school, will rarely be first in any position of credit. How many posts of honor and profit—how many fine chances—how many noble fortunes have been lost by procrastination! A little too late—alas! how fatal the policy! Who has not seen it illustrated? Who has not committed the error and reaped the bitter fruits? Only a few weeks have gone by since a merchant of this city made an engagement with another, in relation to a very valuable property. They had long been discussing the matter, and endeavoring to come to terms, and at last had agreed upon a certain day and a certain hour either to close the bargain, or consider the negotiation at an end. If neither party should appear at the designated time, the other was at liberty to act as if nothing had occurred. The place of meeting was the Merchants' Exchange, and the hour twelve o'clock. The one had offered the other real estate in a very central position, for the sum of forty thousand dollars, with the understanding that he would take or reject it, at any period within the specified limit. Meanwhile he had a bid for the same property, of forty-five thousand dollars, a circumstance having taken place which had materially increased its value. He was bound in honor, however, to await the arrival of the specified period, and he did wait. Nay, he was scrupulous, conscientious and sensitive, and lingered for half an hour over the time. Then, the other party being in readiness, he accepted the offer of forty-five thousand dollars, and the affair was closed. Only a few seconds after, and his first customer appeared, but it was too late. He had made up his mind to accept the proposition, but he nevertheless lingered and hesitated, until the golden opportunity had passed away. He was annoyed, irritated and mortified—and yet compelled to confess that the error was all his own.

On another occasion, not long since, several gentlemen met together for the purpose of deciding upon the claims to office of an applicant who was highly recommended, and concerning whom they were all favorably impressed. But it was necessary that he should appear before them in person, and make certain explanations. This he promised to do, and could have done very readily, and the hour for the interview was fixed. For some reason or other, he hesitated, and at last, either from timidity or want of moral courage, he persuaded himself that his presence was not necessary, and that every thing was as it should be. The committee were prompt, talked over the matter in a friendly and kindly spirit, were anxious and willing to hear the expected explanations, and ready to confer the place. But, as already stated, the applicant failed to appear, and this failure was fatal to him. If, they argued, he cannot be prompt and punctual in a case in which he himself is so vitally interested—how can he be safely entrusted with the business of others? The error was lamented afterwards, but it was too late. In social life, the importance of punctuality cannot be too earnestly enforced and inculcated. It is quite a common occurrence for an individual to promise a visit on a certain evening, and thus to enter into a tacit engagement with the family to be visited, that they and theirs will remain at home. Other objects may command their attention meanwhile, but, if they possess a proper sense of propriety, they will refuse, and for the reason that they have no right to trifle with the time or the feelings of another. When, therefore, the engagement thus entered into is not kept, but is disregarded and violated, the effect is pernicious in a double sense. It excites ill-will and unfriendliness, and it destroys confidence. To make an engagement of the kind, indeed, not intending to keep it, is to inflict an insult, and by the sensitive or fastidious it is so considered. Punctuality may be said to be the soul of truth, of honor, and of propriety. The man whose word is as good as his bond, who never makes an engagement that he does not feel bound conscientiously and scrupulously to fulfil—who can always be relied upon, no matter what the difficulty, the danger or the self sacrifice, is not only the model and the exemplar for the punctilious and the honorable, but also for the polished, the moral, the gentlemanly and the Christian.—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

Bishop Hedding, speaking of the muddy travelling at the West, mentioned a case of Irish wit. The bishop was moving along in a gig, his horse in a slow walk, when an Irishman, on foot, overtook him. “Good morning,” said the bishop. “Good morning, yer honor,” replied Pat. “You seem to have the advantage of me, in our modes of travelling, my friend,” continued the bishop. “An’ I’ll swap with yer, if yer plaze, sir,” was the quick reply.

HOW TO “FINISH” A DAUGHTER.—For the attainment of this end, Punch gives the following directions:—

1. Be always telling her how pretty she is.
2. Instil into her mind a proper love of dress.
3. Accustom her to so much pleasure, that she is never happy at home.
4. Allow her to read nothing but novels.
5. Teach her all the accomplishments, but none of the utilities of life.
6. Keep her in the darkest ignorance of the mysteries of housekeeping.
7. Initiate her into the principle that it is vulgar to do anything for herself.
8. To strengthen the latter belief, let her have a ladies’ maid.
9. And, lastly, having given her such an education, marry her to a clerk in the Treasury, upon £75 a year; or to an ensign that is going out to India.

If, with the above careful training, your daughter is not finished, you may be sure it is no fault of yours, and you must look upon her escape as nothing short of a miracle.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

We were under the impression that sensible people no longer consulted the "Man in the Almanac" as to when crops were to be planted, hogs killed, and children weaned: and, in all seriousness, placed the alleged influence of lunar changes on the animal and vegetable kingdoms, in the same category with those which set Friday down as an unlucky day. In this, if we are to credit the following, we have been, and in quite a large and respectable company, unlearning too fast.

Mrs. Lydia Jane Peirson, in a controversy with a correspondent of the Farm Journal, on the subject of lunar influences, after some earnest arguments, invites him to a trial of the following experiments. She says:—"First we test the influence of the moon in her nodes. If Medicus will lay a board on young growing grass, when the moon is in her descending node, he will find, on taking it up after a week or so, that it has smothered the grass under it, and settled close to the earth. A similar board similarly placed, in the time of the moon's ascension will not do so. He will find, on taking it up, after the same interval, that the grass has continued to grow under it, apparently lifting the board with its growth. Next for the phases, he shall select a head of the large double French marigold; he shall have no seed but what grows in this head. He shall plant some near the full of the moon, when the sign is in Gemini or Libra: they will produce large double flowers. He shall plant the same head of seeds near the change of the moon, and the flowers will be single: and if the sign be at Leo or Scorpio, they will not develop even one full row of petals.

"He shall sow, plant, or transplant herb, vine or tree, when the moon is near the full, and the sign of Virgo, and he will have abundance of blossoms, and of long succession, but great paucity of seed or fruit. He shall transplant trees, or cut down weeds, briars or thistles, when the moon is old, and in the sign of the Heart, and if they do not die at once, they will never thrive, but dwindle away and perish.

"When Medicus shall have made these experiments, and witnessed their results, year after year, he will become a convert to the theory of lunar and stellar influence; and though like hundreds of others he may know nothing of the astrological principles by which nature is governed, he will believe the results which he sees, and cannot controvert. Then I shall expect to hear from him again."

All of our readers must have heard of Miss Harriet Hosmer, of whom much has been written of late in the press of this city and of Boston. Miss Hosmer is an American, and resides at Watertown, Massachusetts. A correspondent of the Weekly Post, published at Raleigh, N. C., recently visited her studio. Below is the result of his observations:

"Miss Harriet Hosmer (you will not, surely, have forgotten the stories concerning her numberless eccentricities,) has just completed a marble bust of Hesper, the Evening Star, which is of wondrous beauty. The conception was her own, and proves her truly a genius. The head droops a little, and the eyelids are heavy with drowsiness, thereby covering the want of expression so often painfully felt, but which seems to be inevitable in a sculptured eye. The hair, classically arranged, is bound with a wreath of poppy buds, and a brightly polished star gleams upon the forehead. Upon the pedestal, but carved in bold relief, is a crescent, also beautifully polished. And this work of art was executed by a young lady of twenty, without aid or instruction. It is now some five months since she commenced it. Would that you had been here to accompany me to the lady's atelier and studio. I must attempt a description of the latter for your amusement. The first object that presented itself, as I entered the door, was an entire skeleton, standing erect, grinning hideously. Is there anything more humiliating to one's pride than such vestiges of humanity? Upon the piano lay a dried human heart; immense anatomical plates, executed by the lady herself, adorned the walls; a large case of rare and variegated insects attracted the gaze on one side, which was almost instantly diverted by numerous stuffed birds, pickled vipers, and skeletons of various small animals. The candles were placed in excavated egg-shells. The ink-stand was in the throat of a blue jay, which stood upon the writing-table, with expanded wings and distended beak. The card-rack was a small turtle shell, minus its rightful possessor. Among other curiosities, 'too numerous to mention,' I discovered three hairs from the head of Red Jacket, and a very tiny vial from the pool of Si-loam. Books, both quaint and rare, notes, drawings, casts of different portions of the human frame, and various little models, were scattered about in the most admirable confusion. Miss H. leaves next month for Rome, where she will, in all probability, remain three or four years in perfecting herself in the art of sculpture."

There are some of our exchanges that contain valuable matter, of which we would often like to avail ourselves, but are obliged to forego the pleasure and benefit because the types upon which they are printed are so small that we cannot read a column without fatiguing our eyes beyond a prudent limit. It is the same with too many of the books coming from the press, although some of our publishers are growing wiser in this respect. Diseases of the eyes are said, by physicians, to be increasing, and one of the causes assigned is the small type with which books and newspapers are printed. Too many of the school books in use are open to this objection, and where children study lessons at night, as most of them are required to do, injury to the eyes must inevitably take place. The attention of parents should be directed to this matter. Most of them will find, among the varied books, supplied through the direction of teachers, some that ought to be rejected for the reason assigned. Minion and nonpareil types, fit only to be introduced in foot-notes, marginal readings, or for the condensation of brief matters, are often used in books intended for study, and never without producing mischief to the children who are compelled to read them. In pocket editions of Bibles and Hymn books, even smaller sized types, as diamond and pearl, are frequently used. In these cases, cheapness and portability are gained at too great a cost. The public mind should become active on this subject. Let books and newspapers, printed on the larger kinds of type, always receive a preference over those that are printed on smaller types—the quality of the matter, of course, having due weight in determining the preference—and the evil of which we complain will, in good time, be corrected.

Since the death of Mr. Webster, the public have been admitted to a closer view of his private and social life, and this closer view has shown him to have been as distinguished for personal kindness, amenity of character, and all those qualities that adorn the man, as he was for commanding intellect, and the power to sway the political destinies of a great nation. We have had the pleasure of conversing with those whose privilege it was to meet him often, and they speak of him with a warmth of feeling that nothing but high personal virtues on his part could have inspired.

In a recent correspondence with a young writer of rare promise, we have met with another of these spontaneous tributes to the memory of a great man, and we introduce it here, more, perhaps, from a natural desire to give the unsought testimony of Mr. Webster in favor of our earnest efforts to produce a pure and good paper for home reading, than for any other reason. If our readers think us either vain, or weak, in doing so, we must bear the imputation. Such testimony is valuable, and full of encouragement. In the correspondence referred to, occurred this passage:—

"It was through the advice of Mr. Webster (who remarked to me, some weeks before his death—'Were I a young writer, I would sooner my writings would appear in the Home Gazette, than in any other paper of the kind in the Union') that I sent this production to you."

To a question asked by us, in reference to the above remark, our correspondent replied:—

"It was the 'great expounder of the constitution' to whom I referred in my last. It was my fortune to know him more intimately than by mere reputation, and if tears fell from eyes that never beheld him, and from 'eyes unused to weep,' how must a young girl, whom death has deprived of so exalted and fatherly an affection, mourn the going out of that great light! An approving glance and smile from Mr. Webster, often sent a thrill of delight to my girlish heart, and every word of kind encouragement is treasured there."

A beautiful and touching tribute, this, to a man, whose great intellect had elevated him to a position that made him the admiration and wonder of the best minds of the age.

That portion of Loch Katrine, rendered famous by Scott's "Lady of the Lake," is pleasantly referred to by Grace Greenwood, in one of her letters to the National Era:—"At the head of Loch Katrine, we embarked on a funny little steamer, which certainly did not hurry us past scenes on which our imagination delighted to linger. The head of this lake is not particularly beautiful, but I found that my most glowing conceptions had not surpassed the exquisite loveliness of that portion which forms the opening scene of 'The Lady of the Lake,' 'Ellen's Isle,' the mountains Ben-An and Ben-Venue, and the defile of the Tro-sacks. Here, island and shore and hill are richly clad in the most magnificent foliage; and the grandeur of rocky heights and dark ravines is so pleasantly relieved, so softly toned down, that you feel neither wonder nor awe, but drink in beauty as your breath—lose yourself in delicious dreamings, and revel in all the unspeakable rapture of a pure and perfect delight. A remembrance which is an especial joy to me now, 'and ever shall be,' is of a walk taken with my friends that night, along the shore of the lake, to the pebbly strand opposite Ellen's Isle, which seemed sleeping in the moonlight, afloat on the still waters, even as its fair vision had floated before my soul, on the silver waves of the poet's song."

"Sontag had a ten-thousand-dollar audience at the Melodeon, in Boston, on Tuesday night; but she only received one-third that amount. Speculators pocketed the balance. Most of the tickets were bought up by enterprising gentlemen, and sold at a premium of five dollars."

We clip the above from an exchange, as another instance of the extent to which the public will submit to the present system of exorbitant charges for Concerts—a system introduced under the Jenny Lind management, and, since then, continued, much to the pecuniary benefit of singers, agents and speculators. The payment of ten thousand dollars for a single concert, is out of all proportion to the benefit gained by the public. It is, in fact, a waste of money not to be justified on any plea; and only shows how a few interested and wordy writers for the press may create false estimates of things, and lead the people into the most ridiculous and extravagant subserviency to their interests.

The public still feel an intense interest in regard to the fate of Sir John Franklin, and every new item of intelligence bearing thereon is read with avidity. The last we have seen is the following:—A vessel called "The Prince Albert," which was despatched by Lady Franklin in search of her long-lost husband, recently arrived at Aberdeen. She brought intelligence of the expedition under Sir Edward Belcher—intelligence that is greatly calculated to deepen the interest in relation to the lost voyagers, and to produce the keenest anxiety for further news from Sir Edward himself. It seems that official advices have been received, that Sir Edward Belcher started up Wellington Channel on the 14th of August. He did so, too, with an open sea before him, and the probability now is, that he is locked up in winter quarters, in the very quarters, it is thought, that were occupied by Sir John Franklin. It is well known that the locality of the "first winter quarters" of Sir John was discovered by the English and American vessels which returned home last year. The question then arose—where did he winter in the season of 1846-7? The presumption now is, that Sir Edward Belcher has found that spot—that he has passed into the open sea beyond Wellington Channel, is on the track of the missing navigators, and about to solve the mystery of a northwest passage.

A new book from the press of Putnam & Co., entitled "Homages of American Authors," contains an article on Bryant, from which this beautiful tribute to the man is taken:—"It is under the open sky, and engaged in rural matters, that Mr. Bryant is seen to advantage, that is, in his true character. It is here that the amenity and natural sweetness of disposition, sometimes clouded by the cares of life and the untoward circumstances of business intercourse, shine gently forth under the influences of nature, so dear to the heart and tranquilizing to the spirit of her child. Here the eye puts on its deeper and softer lustre, and the voice modulates itself to the tone of affection, sympathy, enjoyment. Little children cluster about the grave man's steps, or climb his shoulders in triumph; and 'serenest eyes' meet his fullest confidence, finding there none of the sternness of which casual observers sometimes complain. * * * * *

"There can hardly be found a man who has tried active life for fifty years, yet preserved so entire and resolute a simplicity of character and habits as Mr. Bryant. No one can be less a man of the world—so far as that term expresses the worldly man—in spite of a large share of foreign travel, and extensive intercourse with society."

Emerson, under cover of his affectations of style, says many good things. Here is one of them:—"I pray you, oh! excellent wife, cumber not yourself and me to get a rich dinner for this man or woman who has alighted at our gates; nor a bedchamber made at too great a cost; these things, if they are curious in them, they can get for a few shillings in any village; but rather let the stranger see, if he will, in your looks, accent, and behaviour, your heart and earnestness, your thought and will, which he cannot buy at any price in any city, and which he may well travel twenty miles, and dine sparsely, and sleep hardly, to behold. Let not the emphasis of hospitality lie in bed and board; but let truth, and love, and honor and courtesy, flow in all thy deeds."

The following anecdote is told of Emerson:—One night, not long after his marriage, and before his wife had become accustomed to his habits, she awoke suddenly, and hearing him groping about the room, enquired anxiously, "My dear, are you unwell?" "No, my love," replied the thinker, "only an idea."

The London Literary says:—"A German gentleman, named Leidersdorff, who has just died, has left 400 thalers a year to the heirs male of Schiller, forever, as a tribute of admiration to the poet's genius." The Romans, it will be remembered, were accustomed to leave legacies to the writers whose works they admired; and it is very desirable for the literary fraternity that the laudable custom should be revived. Now that M. Leidersdorff has set an example, let us hope that he will find imitators. A legacy to an author or his heirs is not only an individual advantage, but a graceful acknowledgment of the claims of literature."

Every object on the moon's surface of the height of one hundred feet is distinctly seen through Lord Rosse's telescope. On its surface are craters of extinct volcanoes, rocks, and masses of stone almost innumerable. But there are no signs of habitations such as ours, no vestige of architectural remains, to show that the moon is ever inhabited by a race of mortals similar to ourselves. No water is visible, no sea, no river,—all seems desolate.

The Hon. JOHN SERGEANT died in this city, at his residence, in South Fourth street, on the 23d November. In speaking of his personal character, a cotemporary says:—"We venture to affirm that he has not left an enemy behind him. A more perfect gentleman never breathed. Courteous, kindly, humane—his hand and heart were ever open—and his charities were, comparatively speaking, princely. Integrity and moral virtue were among the shining qualities of his truly noble character. In all the relations of life, as a husband, as a father, as a friend, as an American, and as a citizen, he was upright and exemplary. A just man, and with a spotless reputation, he has passed in peace to his last, long home."

HABIT.—"I trust everything, under God," said Lord Brougham, "to habit, upon which, in all ages, the lawgiver as well as the schoolmaster has mainly placed his reliance; habit, which makes everything easy, and casts all difficulties upon a deviation from a wonted course. Make sobriety a habit, and intemperance will be hateful; make prudence a habit, and reckless profligacy will be as contrary to the child, grown or adult, as the most atrocious crimes are to any of your lordships. Give a child the habit of sacredly regarding truth; of carefully respecting the property of others; of scrupulously abstaining from all acts of improvidence which involve him in distress, and he will just as likely think of rushing into an element in which he cannot breathe, as of lying, or cheating, or stealing."

Grace Greenwood left Paris on the 28th October for Rome, where she intends passing the winter.

James, the novelist, has been recognized by the President as British consul for Norfolk.

FALSE BENEVOLENCE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

"I believe, Maria," said Mrs. Willerton, addressing her cousin, "that as well as I like Horace, I should never have married him, had I known how much annoyance I should receive on account of his poor relations."

"Do they annoy you?" asked Maria, with a look of some surprise.

"Yes, they do, exceedingly. I have been made unhappy all the morning on their account."

"I never have met with any of them here, and thought they did not call on you."

"They don't, neither do I call on them; but Horace does, and they enter their complaints to him, and he thinks we ought to do something to assist them, I suppose. No longer ago than last evening, he called on his sister, Mrs. Woodbridge, who told him her health was very poor, and persuaded him into believing that she and her children were actually suffering for food."

"Mrs. Woodbridge is a widow, I believe."

"Yes, and the word widow, with some people, is expected to untie the purse-strings of every person who has a decent income. It is well, I think, that the business was so arranged as to give me the control of the property left me by my father; otherwise, I do believe that Horace would squander one half of it upon his sister and her children. I am charitable, as every one knows, who is at all acquainted with me. Within the last year, I have headed half a dozen subscription papers, and now, just at the time I want to prepare a few fancy articles for the Fair, I must be teased about Mrs. Woodbridge and her children. Look, Maria, isn't this card-case pretty? I shall get it off on some young clerk—who would like to make a present to a lady—for five or six dollars, and the whole material did not cost over four-and-sixpence, and it has taken me no more than five or six hours to make it. Don't you intend to contribute something for the Fair?"

"No, I think not."

"Well, let me tell you, cousin mine, that a young lady, with a clear income of five thousand a year, ought to, if she don't."

"What purpose is the money intended for, which it is expected will be raised at the Fair?"

"Why, haven't you heard? Your ignorance on the subject shows the little interest you take in benevolent schemes. It is our wish to raise a sum sufficient to purchase a new chandelier for the church; also, to carpet and cushion all the pews—those occupied by the poor as well as the rich. The inside of a church has a very mean look, when one half of the pews have neither carpets nor cushions; and, for my part, I feel ashamed whenever any distinguished stranger is present. Besides, it will be such a luxury for the poor to sit on cushions, and to have a carpet for their feet—especially in the winter season."

"Then, why not provide the pews of the poor with the luxury, and leave the rich to furnish their own?"

"Don't you see that, if we do, perfect patch-work will be made of the affair? If permitted to consult their own fancy, no two individuals would choose alike."

"It don't appear to me to be of much consequence whether they are alike or not; and as for a chandelier, we certainly don't need a new one. I always thought the one in our church remarkably tasteful and elegant, and it has never, I believe, sustained the least injury."

"I don't know that it has, but, for my part, I think our pastor is as worthy a handsome church, as respects decorations, and all else, as any one in the city, and our chandelier is not half as costly as that in Mr. Yarmouth's church. Come, Maria, do, for once, try to think and act like other people. No one understands fancy-work better than you, and, as you have plenty of leisure, you ought, at least, to prepare have a dozen articles for the Fair. By the way, what have you done with that beautiful collar I saw you embroidering, some time since? I have never seen you wear it."

"It was not for myself. It was one of a half dozen a poor woman was employed to do, and as she found that she could not finish them in season, I offered to assist her."

Mrs. Willerton was prevented from making any reply, by hearing the door-bell ring.

"I rather think it is Mrs. Wyman," said she. "I have been expecting her all the morning. She told me she was going round, to-day, to try and obtain something to augment the funds of the Dorcas society. Now, Maria, you certainly cannot refuse to subscribe for such a purpose."

"I believe I shall be obliged to," returned Maria—"that is, if I have been rightly informed as to the manner the society is conducted. I cannot think it right to employ poor women to make garments at prices so low as to render it impossible for them to earn a comfortable subsistence."

"O, we calculate to make them ourselves."

"Worse still," was Maria's reply.

Mrs. Wyman, a showy, fashionably-dressed woman, now entered. After a few minutes, spent in pleasant conversation, she unrolled a sheet of paper, on which was written a few lines by way of preamble, stating the object of the society, and the inadequate means at its disposal to carry that object into effect in a manner which was at all satisfactory. It closed with a pathetic appeal to those ladies charitably disposed, calling upon them to give of their abundance to those perishing with hunger and cold.

Mrs. Wyman, with some difficulty, commanded her voice, while she read it aloud. She and Mrs. Willerton both shed tears. After having had time to compose herself a little, Mrs. Wyman handed the paper to Mrs. Willerton, saying, as she did so,—

"My dear friend, you must head the subscription. I brought the paper to you first, on purpose, because I knew you would give liberally. It will be a good example to others. Example, you know, goes a great way."

"You must not expect too much," returned Mrs. Willerton, "but the little I am able to give will be given cheerfully."

She opened a little, portable writing-desk, considered a moment, and then, with a sweet smile irradiating her countenance, wrote her name, and against it, fifty dollars. She then drew forth her purse.

"I will pay you at once," said she. "I have placed my name on the paper merely to encourage others."

"A little ready money would certainly be acceptable," said Mrs. Wyman, "as we are entirely out of material, and there is a capital chance to get sewing done cheap. Nearly a dozen poor women, who have families, and several young girls are waiting for work, who, for the sake of having it, will do it for less than they ever have before. One young girl, Fanny Woodbridge, I think she told me her name was, offered to make a dozen shirts for half the usual price, which will be a great saving. A number of others will make different articles at a rate nearly or quite as low."

Maria thought that Mrs. Willerton winced a little at the mention of Fanny Woodbridge, who was her husband's niece. If it did excite any interest in her mind, or cause any feelings of compunction, she abstained from making any enquiry. She probably felt afraid that it might lead to some discovery relative to her connection with Mrs. Woodbridge.

"Miss Vernon," said Mrs. Wyman, presenting the paper to Maria, "I know we may count on something handsome from you."

"I am sorry to disappoint you," she replied, "but I must decline giving anything whatever."

"You surprise me, Miss Vernon: I have been told that you were very benevolent."

"A reputation which is certainly desirable, yet I cannot consent to maintain it, by contributing to the funds of the Dorcas society."

"I suspect you do not understand the principles by which the society is guided,"

"I think I do, perfectly."

"And pray what can be more laudable than to make and distribute garments among those poor wretches, who are sunk so low in vice and idleness, that they neither have the means nor the inclination to clothe themselves."

"To speak plainly," said Maria, "I don't approve of the manner in which the labor of making the garments for those poor outcasts is obtained. Women who are willing to labor, and have too much self-respect to beg, are required to work for them at prices so low, as to make it utterly impossible for them to procure an adequate supply of even the coarsest food. I am told that the members of the society do most all the work themselves, which according to my mind—"

"Yes, we do most of it ourselves," said Mrs. Wyman, eagerly interrupting her; "we only give those work who beg and pray for it, because they cannot possibly get a stitch anywhere else."

"But," said Maria, "if the poor and industrious were employed to do it, at a fair compensation, two benevolent objects would be effected at the same time; if, indeed, an indiscriminate distribution of garments among the idle and vicious, is worthy the name of benevolence. I am afraid that it only fosters the evil it is designed to remedy. In one instance, I happen to know, a woman of intemperate habits pledged a calico gown given her by your society, and thus obtained the means to procure liquor, by which she and her children were rendered more miserable than before. She needed some kind hand to put her in the way to help herself, as well as to furnish her with clothing."

Mrs. Wyman made no reply to this. She evidently considered it in the light of a reproof; and to one who was almost daily receiving the incense of adulation, on account of her superior benevolence, any remark calculated to show that her manner of exercising it was not the most judicious, was by no means palatable. Consequently, her manner towards her was exceedingly cold and distant during the remainder of her call. Soon after her departure, Maria likewise took leave.

Mrs. Wyman had been gone scarcely half an hour, when there was another ring of the bell. This time the visitor was a lady by the name of Underwood. Her husband did not rank among the wealthier class of citizens; on the contrary, his wife, to enable them to live within their means, was obliged to conduct the domestic department according to the rules of strict economy. Mrs. Willerton, therefore, who did not consider her as quite up to her level, received her less cordially than she did the other lady.

"I have taken the liberty to call on you," said Mrs. Underwood, after some little delay, "in behalf of a poor widow, who on account of declining health, even with the assistance of her daughter, finds it extremely hard to get along."

"Really, madam," said Mrs. Willerton, "I believe it will be out of my power to contribute anything. I have already given fifty dollars to-day, for charitable purposes, which is, I think, as much as it is my duty to give in one day."

"I don't ask for money," said Mrs. Underwood. "The lady—for she is a lady, in every sense of the word, though in such indigent circumstances—would hardly be willing to accept anything without an equivalent on her part. What I ask for her is work, at a price which will enable her to live. She is a very nice sewer, as is also her daughter, a girl of fourteen. They have lately been sewing, at prices so low, that they have been almost literally reduced to starvation. My heart bled at sight of the girl, who called on me to beg some work. A sad tale of toil and want was written on her young face, which, in spite of them all, was beautiful. I gave her what work I had on hand, and paid her in advance, to enable her to procure food, for I really believe she was nearly famishing. She told me that she had been promised some sewing by a lady of the Dorcas society, and named the remuneration she was to receive, and I must confess that I was astonished that ladies could in the name of charity ask a poor, pale girl like her, to work at such shamefully low prices. It seems like taking life by inches."

"As the funds of the society are at present low, we don't feel it to be a duty to give more than is demanded," said Mrs. Willerton.

Mrs. Underwood made no attempt to reason with her on the subject. She thought what she had already said, was sufficient to suggest such reflections as might, in the end, prove salutary. Till Mrs. Willerton, in allusion to the society, made use of the pronoun we, she did not know that she was a member. She, however, did not regret having censured an inconsistency so glaring, and so culpable. After a few minutes' silence, she asked Mrs. Willerton if she could not furnish some plain sewing for the widow and her daughter in question.

"I am unable to, at present," was her answer. "Just now, I have no time to prepare work, as I am extremely busy in making fancy articles for the Fair. You, of course, will contribute something, as you and your family, in common with others who attend Mr. Carter's church, will share the benefit of the proceeds."

"It is not my intention. Our pew is already furnished with a decent carpet and comfortable cushions, and the most Mr. Underwood can do, will be to pay the average price of the new ones. He will be sure to do that as soon as the sum can be ascertained. I hope," said she, rising to go, "that when your hurry about the Fair is over, that you will be able to prepare some work."

"Perhaps I may," replied Mrs. Willerton, coldly.

"I am afraid," thought Mrs. Underwood, as she turned away from the door of the palace-like dwelling, "that the eclat of heading a subscription paper with forty or fifty dollars, influences Mrs. Willerton more than any real desire to relieve the destitute."

When Mr. Willerton came home to dinner, his spirits were evidently much depressed, though he endeavored to appear cheerful. The truth was, the suffering condition of his sister caused him great uneasiness; for strange as it may seem for one who dwelt in a palace, and fared sumptuously every day, he was unable to afford them very little relief.

He was a lawyer by profession, and had an average share of practice. He never had, nor had he now, a wish to be idle, though he certainly imagined, at the time he married a rich wife, that he might, occasionally, relax a little in his exertions. He soon found that he had indulged in a vain imagination. His lady-wife told him in plain terms, that she expected he would defray the family expenses, with the exception of furnishing her wardrobe. This, as he would have no rent to pay, the house where they lived being a part of the property inherited from her father, she thought would be extremely easy, as she should make it a point to get along with three servants. She would thus, she said, be at liberty to gratify her benevolent impulses, and her taste for the beautiful (and, she might have added, her whims,) her yearly income being nearly ten thousand dollars. It was nothing more, she thought, than she was entitled to. Poor Willerton soon found, that instead of relaxing in his exertions, he was obliged to redouble them. Before his marriage, he took what practice was offered him; now, he was obliged to seek for more. Early and late he worked like a slave, yet, after all, he failed to realize his wife's expectations. She was ambitious to see his name on subscription papers. It seemed strange to her that he could not save fifty dollars, now and then, to devote to charitable purposes. The difficulty, she thought, was his lack of energy, or worse still, as she was afraid, the want of a disposition to give; yet, when he asked her one day, if she had not some cast-off clothing, which his sister could manage to make over for the children, she told him carelessly that everything of that kind which could be made available, was placed at the disposal of the Dorcas society.

Mrs. Willerton either did not notice, or would not appear to do so, the depression of her husband's spirits.

"I am really ashamed of you, Horace," said she, as soon as they were fairly seated at the dinner-table.

"For what reason?" he asked.

"Why, Mr. Tarleton, whom I happened to meet with yesterday, told me that the gentlemen of our society, if they can raise money enough, have it in contemplation to purchase a new bell; but, added he, so many throw cold water on the project, that he don't know but they shall be obliged to give it up. At my request, he showed me the subscription paper, and I was truly mortified to find that your name was among the missing."

"We have a very good-bell, now," said he.

"It is not a good-toned bell, nor never was, and now when it is rung at the same time the bell at Mr. Yarmouth's church is, I feel fairly ashamed of it. Five hundred dollars, Mr. Tarleton said, would make up the necessary sum, and I am sure you might put your name down for fifty of it. Dr. Southwick's name is down for a hundred, and I don't believe that his profession is more lucrative than yours. I wish ladies subscribed for the bell—if they did, my name would soon be down for a hundred dollars."

"If I should put my name down for five dollars, I couldn't pay it. If I were able to give my sister only one dollar a week, which would pay her rent, she and Fanny could sew enough, so as not to suffer for bread—now it is impossible."

"I cannot believe, Horace, that your sister is in the suffering condition she represents herself to be. When you call there, because you don't see her surrounded by the luxuries you are accustomed to at home, you are easily made to believe that she is in want of the common necessities of life."

"I wish, Jane, you would call with me—if you would, I think you would change your mind."

"Well, perhaps I may sometime, but as you know, it is a very busy time with me now."

Mr. Willerton was, just then, so much pressed with business, that he was obliged to be at his office early and late—sometimes as late as midnight. This prevented him from calling on his sister, though his thoughts often wandered to her humble abode, where, in imagination, he saw her surrounded by her children, whose meagre faces would have brightened with joy, could the delicacies which Mrs. Willerton bestowed on her pet dog, have been added to their scanty fare.

Mrs. Willerton, as well as her husband, had been extremely busy, and had not left the house at all, for several days, except to do a little shopping. One morning, when out making a few purchases for the completion of the fancy articles for the Fair, she fell in with Mrs. Somers, a lady of her acquaintance. As they walked slowly along, they became so pleasantly engaged in conversation, that Mrs. Willerton did not observe that they had arrived at a portion of the city, inhabited by the poorer classes. Mrs. Somers suddenly stopped opposite one of the houses. "I have a call to make here," said she. "Will you not go in with me?"

Mrs. Willerton glanced her eyes over her elegant and fashionable dress, and as she did so, involuntarily drew back.

"You will not find a better opportunity," said Mrs. Somers, "for the exercise of your well-known benevolence."

"I don't know," she replied, "that I can spare the time to go in with you now. In a few days, I shall be more at leisure."

"It may be too late then, as far as you are concerned, and I know that you would be sorry to miss the opportunity of helping to carry into effect a plan for ameliorating the sufferings of the worthy and industrious poor. The case in question is one too urgent to be delayed. Last evening, for the first time, I was informed of the sufferings of the family I am now going to visit. I called immediately, and have since found that Maria Vernon had already commenced arrangements, which, if carried into effect, will enable the poor widow and her daughter to maintain themselves and the rest of the family in comparative comfort."

Mrs. Somers had already rapped at the door, and it was now opened by a little girl about seven years old.

"My dear," said she, "please tell your mother that Mrs. Somers is at the door, and, if convenient, would like to see her."

Before the child turned away from the door, she raised her large, dark eyes to the face of Mrs. Willerton, enquiringly.

Mrs. Somers saw the look, and said in answer—"You may also say to your mother, that I have a friend with me, a very benevolent lady."

"Yes ma'am," was her reply.

After an absence of about a minute, she returned, and said her mother would be glad to see Mrs. Somers and the other lady.

The first object that attracted the attention of Mrs. Willerton, on entering a room finished in a coarse, rough manner, expressly for the accommodation of the poor, was a woman bolstered up in bed, holding in her left hand, a coarse shirt-sleeve, she had commenced making. She was about thirty-five, and traces of uncommon loveliness still remained on her countenance, though pale, care-worn and emaciated. Mrs. Willerton gave a nervous start, for she at once recognized in the lady before her, Mrs. Woodbridge, her husband's sister. The recognition was mutual, for though neither of them had ever before entered the other's home, they had often seen each other at church. Mrs. Willerton hoped that her sister-in-law did not know her. Mrs. Woodbridge was made sensible of this, from her noticing her in no other way, than by a slight inclination of her head. As Mrs. Willerton took the chair offered her by the child who had conducted her and Mrs. Somers in, her eye fell on the sleeve Mrs. Woodbridge held in her hand, and by its coarse texture, she knew it to be work furnished by the Dorcas society.

"How do you feel to-day?" said Mrs. Somers, going up to the bedside.

"Better than I did last evening—much better," was her reply.

"You should not attempt to sew," said Mrs. Somers.

"I thought I must try and do a few stitches," she answered, "for Fanny is almost as feeble and exhausted as I am. Your medicine, however," and she faintly smiled, as she emphasized the word, "has restored her quite as much as it has me."

"Where is Fanny?" asked Mrs. Somers.

"Gone to carry home some work we have been doing for a Mrs. Underwood. She is a very benevolent lady, and though her means are limited, does a great deal in her quiet, unostentatious way, for the relief of the poor. Had it not been for her sudden and severe illness, we should not have been reduced to the suffering condition in which you found us last evening."

"It was through Mrs. Underwood's means, that I found you," said Mrs. Somers. "The moment she was a little better, she remembered you, and sent to request me to call on you."

"Friends are starting up around us, all at once," said Mrs. Woodbridge. "You had not been gone ten minutes last evening, before a young lady called by the name of Vernon. Her thoughts seemed to have turned the same way that yours and Mrs. Underwood's have, relative to some plan which would enable Fanny and me to help ourselves. Perhaps, by some means, she had been made aware, that though we are willing to work, to beg we are ashamed. Miss Vernon said she would call again in the morning."

"I hope that she will call while Mrs. Willerton and I are here," said Mrs. Somers. "We three—I mean Mrs. Willerton, Miss Vernon and myself—have ample means to carry the proposed plan into effect. All we shall need from Mrs. Underwood will be her excellent advice, and I have met with no lady, whose judgment and discrimination are superior to hers. If some of the ladies who preside over our benevolent societies were like her, they would, I think, be conducted in a manner quite different from what they now are."

Mrs. Willerton, when Mrs. Somers mentioned her name, felt extremely uneasy. She dreaded the return of Fanny, lest when she addressed her, she should call her aunt, and thus betray to Mrs. Somers her connection with the Woodbridge family; for she could not hope that one so young, would exercise the same proud forbearance which her sister-in-law had done. From the younger children, soon after her entrance, she found that she had nothing to fear. They had no idea that she was the aunt Willerton, they had heard their mother and sister mention. In addition to her uneasiness on this account, she felt depressed and humbled in the presence of Mrs. Woodbridge. A sense of her superiority, which she could not throw off, forced itself upon her mind. Seeing that Mrs. Somers was engaged in saying something to the children, she rose and went close to the bedside.

"I had no idea," said she, speaking in an under-tone, "that you were reduced to the condition in which I find you. Your brother will call and see you this evening, and I shall try and do something for you."

"I beg that you will not put yourself to the least inconvenience on my account," replied Mrs. Woodbridge, coldly. "Providence has seen fit to raise up friends for the relief of my suffering family, so that any aid from you will be unnecessary."

"If you refuse to accept aid from me, you will be willing to accept it from your brother."

"Yes; I am willing to accept all that he is able to give, and that I am sure of receiving."

"What is it?"

"His sympathy. The thought of his withholding it would cause me much unhappiness."

Mrs. Willerton instead of answering, started, and, turning hastily away from the bedside, drew her veil over her face. She had caught the sound of footsteps approaching the door, and the thought if Fanny had returned, and should recognize her, it would cause her reputation for benevolence to suffer in the estimation of Mrs. Somers, occasioned her quite as much uneasiness as the idea of having her know that Mrs. Woodbridge was her husband's sister. The door opened, and Fanny entered. Mrs. Willerton's fears subsided, for merely curtsying to her, she turned to Mrs. Somers, who greeted her with a smile and pleasant words. Mrs. Willerton, in the mean time, stood with averted face, and as soon as she could do so, without breaking in upon Mrs. Somers, told her that she could not possibly remain longer.

"I will detain you only a minute longer," replied Mrs. Somers; and, after interchanging a few words with Mrs. Woodbridge, she joined the impatient Mrs. Willerton, whose hand was already on the door-latch.

When Mrs. Willerton, in silent communion with her own mind, recalled the scene of poverty and suffering she had been constrained to witness, her own course during the six years of her wedded life, assumed an aspect quite different from what it had formerly done. Being unimaginative, one example had influenced her more than many precepts. She saw, that to be truly benevolent, discretion was necessary, as well as time and money, and the discovery was turned to good account. Those degraded women, who had been accustomed to pledge the garments given them by the Dorcas society, in order to obtain the means of indulging in habits of intemperance, soon found that they could no longer do so without discovery.

Formerly, a large number of garments, at stated intervals, were given to those who would take the trouble to apply for them. It had even been found, on investigation, that the same applicant, by borrowing a different bonnet, or outside covering of some kind, had received what had been intended for several; and what was still more provoking, such instances of fraud had been traced to those, who at once parted with the clothing for the purpose above mentioned.

In discovering the nature of true benevolence, she found that she had, in its name, been sacrificing on the altar of vanity. In other respects, she also became more clear-sighted. She found that in the midst of plenty, her husband was over-working himself, and that for the sake of furnishing the table with those luxuries, which to her had become necessities, he was actually, at times, reduced to as great pecuniary straits as the humblest day-laborer. She made no verbal acknowledgment of her error, but what was better, acknowledged it by pursuing a different course.

By the exertions of those ladies, who had interested themselves in their behalf, Mrs. Woodbridge and her family were soon provided with a dwelling, with sufficient room for their comfortable accommodation.

While Mrs. Woodbridge was furnished with work for which she was well paid, Fanny was enabled to learn a dress-maker's trade. In a few years, the mistress of the establishment, having received a handsome competency, retired from business, and Fanny Woodbridge, as her successor, aided by her mother and sisters, was soon enabled not only to surround herself and them, with every desirable comfort, but to minister to the necessities of others.

The race of mankind would perish did they cease to aid each other. From the time that the mother binds the child's head, till the moment that some kind assistant wipes the death-damp from the brow of the dying, we cannot exist without mutual help. All, therefore, that need aid, have a right to ask it of their fellow-mortals. No one, who holds the power of granting it, can refuse it without guilt.

THE CHILD AND THE SNOW-FLAKES.

"DON'T HURT IT, THERE'S AN ANGEL IN IT."

BY FANNY FALES.

"O, look, dear Mae,—how beautiful!
How fast the snow-flakes fall,
They're lighting softly on the top
Of our old elm so tall;

"They come so very soft and warm,
So very large and white."—
Mae saw, and clapp'd her little hands,
And shouted with delight.

She stretch'd her rosy fingers out,
And clasp'd a flake of snow;
The sister cried—"Don't hurt it, Mae,
An angel's there, I know."

O many, many things we touch,
With hand ungentle—rude,
Would seem to us an angel's home,
If with pure spirit view'd.

In the deep penitential sigh—
The discipline of woe—
The aspiration pure and high,
An angel dwells, I know.

A mother's smile, a mother's prayer,
Her warning whisper'd low:
The mem'ry of a mother's face,—
An angel's there, I know.

The glance, the word, the deed of love,
Oft slighted here below;
Its simplest token, crush it not,
An angel's there, I know.

THE VISION OF BOATS.

BY ELLEN L. BOSTWICK.

One morn, when the Day-god, yet hidden
By the mist that the mountain enshrouds,
Was hoarding up hyacinth blossoms,
And roses, to fling at the clouds;

I saw from the casement, that northward
Looks out on the Valley of Pines,
(The casement, where all day in summer,
You hear the dew drop from the vines,)

White shapes 'mid the purple wreaths glancing,
Like the banners of hosts at strife;
But I knew they were silvery pennons
Of boats on the River of Life.

And I watched, as the mist cleared upward,
Half hoping, yet fearing to see
On that rapid and rock-sown River,
What the fate of the boats might be.

There were some that sped cheerily onward,
With white sails gallantly spread;
Yet ever there sat at the look-out,
One, watching for danger ahead.

No fragrant and song-haunted island,
No golden and gem-studded coast
Could win, with its ravishing beauty,
The watcher away from his post.

When the tempest crouched low on the waters,
And fiercely the hurricane swept,

With furled sails, cautiously wearing,
Still onward in safety they kept.

And many sailed well for a season,
When river and sky were serene,
And leisurely swung the light rudder,
'Twixt borders of blossoming green.

But the Storm-King came out from his caverns,
With whirlwind, and lightning, and rain;
And my eyes, that grew dim for a moment,
Saw but the rent canvas again.

Then sorely I wept the ill-fated!
Yea, bitterly wept, for I knew
They had learned but the fair-weather wisdom,
That a moment of trial o'erthrew.

And one in its swift sinking, parted
A placid and sun-bright wave;
Oh, deftly the rock was hidden,
That keepeth that voyager's grave!

And I sorrowed to think how little
Of aid from a kindly hand,
Might have guided the beautiful vessel
Away from the treacherous strand.

And I watched with a murmur of blessing,
The few that on either shore
Were setting up signals of warning,
Where many had perished before.

But now, as the sunlight came creeping
Through the half-opened lids of the morn,
Fast faded that wonderful pageant,
Of shadows and drowsiness born.

And no sound could I hear but the sighing
Of winds, in the Valley of Pines;
And the heavy, monotonous dropping
Of dew from the shivering vines.

But all day, 'mid the clashing of Labor,
And the city's unmusical notes,
With thoughts that went seeking the hidden,
I pondered that Vision of Boats.

EDINBURGH, Ohio.

THE LAW OF OUR LOVES; AND A LESSON THEREFROM.

The human soul cannot live without some kind of love. Every man has natural affections. God intended that these should be directed to himself and humanity, attract the mind to the most worthy objects of thought, and keep the will fixed upon the highest course of action. But even if this does not happen, the need to love still remains, and these affections cluster about other and unworthy objects and persons. Therefore, wicked men and wicked habits of life are loved with an attachment as perilous as unnatural. A man cannot exist without loving something. Love is life; the capability to love is the capability to live; and the depth and purity of love is a sure test of true greatness of being. Man cannot banish this need from his soul. He will love—either what is high or what is low, either like an angel or a demon.

Selfishness is merely a diseased form of love. The selfish man differs from others only in the quality and objects of his affections. He bestows himself upon things which will yield him the most speedy and full return. He hugs worldly possessions and pleasures close to his heart. He has not forgotten to love, but he loves falsely.

The great difference in men is not in the possession, but in the quality of their affections. One consecrates his powers to God and humanity, and loves wisely and with a celestial strength and purity; others, in various degrees, do not give themselves to the true purpose of life, and are punished by loving basely. There is a great variety in the objects of affection. Probably there are not two souls in existence who love precisely the same things in the same degree. Each spirit selects its own company out of the whole universe, and creates a heaven of its own liking. The objects of human affection are almost infinite in variety; so the quality of love is the surest test of difference between men.

How far can we control our affections? We have seen that love is a necessity of our nature, and its quality a test of our character. Have we the power to determine that quality? There is an opinion quite prevalent that a man cannot control his affections. They are supposed to be wayward, unmanageable and irresponsible. And, in practice, men commonly obey their affections as if they were a destiny. This popular opinion contains just half the truth, and is practically false because it omits the other half. It is true, in one sense, that we cannot control our love. We are obliged to love according to our characters, and we cannot violently change the current of our affections.

But the real question lies back of this. How came we to love what we, at present, do love? Had we anything to do in producing that condition of mind and heart by which we are compelled, for the time, to love in a particular direction. The answer to this will expose the fallacy of the popular opinion.

Probably our natural constitution of mind and temperament, and the changes produced upon us by causes beyond our control, have a great influence in determining the objects of our affections. We cannot radically change our nature—at least, not suddenly. For a time our love must depend upon what nature and circumstances have made us. But no man is obliged, by his constitution or by circumstances, to love what is actually evil. True, one may be born with diseased propensities, and may have been exposed to corrupting influences during youth, which determine, for a time, the quality of his affections. But such a person always has a consciousness of the lowness of his state, and a desire for something higher, strong enough to lead him into a better condition, if he will follow it; and this possibility of becoming better determines the whole question in its moral aspect. We have the capacity to follow our ideal of excellence, and, by thus doing, of increasing our capacity to love what is excellent and beautiful to an unlimited degree.

It is not, then, a matter of fate or chance what shall be the quality of our affection. The quality of our love depends upon our character. If we follow truth, devote ourselves to right-doing, and cast off temptations to selfish and sinful living, we shall become good, and cannot help loving what is good and beautiful. On the other hand, if we love party more than truth, lose our manhood in a wicked course of life, and become the slaves of our lowest impulses, we must love what is low and like ourselves. The moral quality of our affections thus being dependent on our character, we have just as much control over it, as we have over our character. Nobody doubts that he can make himself good or bad, in the same sense that he can do anything else. We build up our characters by our daily thought, speech and conduct, and insensibly mould them to the shape they assume; therefore, we create our own loves in the same way, since we love according to what we are. The mistake of the popular opinion is in supposing that, because we cannot instantly change the current of our affections, we have no power over them. The process must be gradual, and depends upon a previous change in the character; yet, though slow and imperceptible, it is certain. We determine the moral quality of our love by everything we think, say, or do—by the whole course of our voluntary action.

Having thus attempted to show that we have power over our affections, let us briefly indicate the process by which a man may degrade himself, so that his love at last shall become his most fearful retribution.

Deterioration of character, and consequently of the affections, is so gradual that few are conscious of it. The character becomes degraded imperceptibly—even while the outward appearance of decency is preserved. Evil thoughts, ambitious purposes, avaricious desires, revenge, contempt, hatred, pride, are secretly cherished and brooded over. Sensual and corrupt feelings get a lodgment in the heart, distract the intellect, pollute the imagination, undermine the will, while the person hardly knows his danger. Day after day, a new crowd of these wicked, foolish, malignant guests is entertained, and no harm is apprehended while the outward life is yet firm. But each of these secret mental indulgences makes its mark upon the character, just as every violation of the laws of health breaks down the constitution, and hastens on final dissolution. Little by little, the tone of the mind is changed. The person becomes more and more incapable of loving nobly, or of cherishing affections and thoughts which his reason and conscience approve. He is below his own admiration; and, in spite of his better reason and occasional efforts to lift himself out of his low state, he is compelled to love and follow persons and practices which in his very soul he may abhor. And this slavery to wicked affections is an awful retribution, perhaps the worst that can come upon the sinful spirit.

A young man may in this way begin a downward course of conduct, which, after a few years, shall leave his soul captive in the hands of the lowest affections. Let him employ his leisure hours in dissipated or low society, in frivolous conversation, or corrupt reading; let him trample on the reverence for honor and perfect honesty with which he began life, and gradually go over to the practice of half-dishonest tricks by which a man may kill his conscience and fill his purse; let him give free admission to every impure thought, and lay up in his memory every vulgar and obscene jest and turn of expression; let him fix his eye on riches, or some post of honor in the gift of the people, and determine, at all hazards and by any means, to obtain them. He may thus, while outwardly decent, produce a total change in his character in a few years, and, while yet living in respectable society, really love best the lowest persons and things. He may think that he has lost nothing by indulgence in these habits of thought and life. But he has lost much. He has lost his power to love the best things—the highest, most worthy objects. He has lost the power to enjoy the society and conversation of noble, sincere men—the excellent of the earth; he has lost his consciousness of innocence and honesty, and is now able to derive a contemptible and demoniac pleasure from over-reaching his neighbor. The love of place or popularity has caused him to lose his independence, and made him a coward, and a slave to the very people whom he despises. He has lost his relish for the society of pure and high-minded women, and loves only the low, frivolous and gossiping, and such as best gratify his depraved taste. He has lost almost everything of value. He has ceased to love the best and most elevated things in life. His affections gravitate towards, and grovel amongst, sinful, base, unworthy objects. He has lost innocence, and purity, and honor, and integrity, and sincerity, and independence. Is not this loss enough for one soul? He has brought upon himself fearful retribution. He has degraded himself till, gradually, he has become incapable of elevated and noble affections, and he is now given up to the wild, passionate, restless feelings which make a bad man's soul like an ocean tossed by storms, to which no calm day ever comes. His low and wicked loves are the evil spirits that inflict the punishment due to his transgression.

And, in like manner, a young woman may destroy the beauty, innocence and strength of her character, till she is compelled to live in the same low region of life. She may neglect mental culture, read only books full of foul insinuations and unnatural delineations of life, may love excitement and pleasure better than home, and overlook all preparation for the duties of womanhood. A few years of such a life will cause her dreadful loss—loss of delicate and pure affections, loss of the true dignity of womanhood, loss of love of good society, loving instead the weak and foolish, loss of love of home and rational enjoyment. And, then, when the great want of a woman's soul comes, she will bestow her affections, and give herself away, loving one low and unworthy, but like herself. Her frivolous mind and restless passions will compel her to such a wretched union. Henceforth she must live in company with the lowest loves. She must live on husks and chaff.

We seek happiness by heaping on our puny selves all we can, each one building, according to the joint force of his intellect and selfishness, a reversed pyramid, under the which the higher it rises the lower he is crushed on the small spot his small self can fill.

COMMON PEOPLE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"Are you going to call upon Mrs. Clayton and her daughters, Mrs. Marygold?" asked a neighbor, alluding to a family that had just moved into Sycamore Row.

"No, indeed, Mrs. Lemmington, that I am not. I don't visit everybody."

"I thought the Claytons were a very respectable family," remarked Mrs. Lemmington.

"Respectable! Everybody is getting respectable now-a-days. If they are respectable, it is very lately that they have become so. What is Mr. Clayton, I wonder, but a school-master! It's too bad that such people will come crowding themselves into genteel neighborhoods. The time was when to live in Sycamore Row was guarantee enough for any one—but, now, all kinds of people have come into it."

"I have never met Mrs. Clayton," remarked Mrs. Lemmington, "but I have been told that she is a most estimable woman, and that her daughters have been educated with great care. Indeed, they are represented as being highly accomplished girls."

"Well, I don't care what they are represented to be. I'm not going to keep company with a school-master's wife and daughters, that's certain."

"Is there anything disgraceful in keeping a school?"

"No, nor in making shoes, either. But, then, that's no reason why I should keep company with my shoemaker's wife, is it? Let common people associate together—that's my doctrine."

"But what do you mean by common people, Mrs. Marygold?"

"Why, I mean common people. Poor people. People who have not come of a respectable family. That's what I mean."

"I am not sure that I comprehend your explanation much better than I do your classification. If you mean, as you say, poor people, your objection will not apply with full force to the Claytons, for they are now in tolerably easy circumstances. As to the family of Mr. Clayton, I believe his father was a man of integrity, though not rich. And Mrs. Clayton's family I know to be without reproach of any kind."

"And yet they are common people for all that," persevered Mrs. Marygold. "Wasn't old Clayton a mere petty dealer in small wares. And wasn't Mrs. Clayton's father a mechanic?"

"Perhaps, if some of us were to go back for a generation or two, we might trace out an ancestor who held no higher place in society," Mrs. Lemmington remarked quietly. "I have no doubt but that I should."

"I have no fears of that kind," replied Mrs. Marygold, in an exulting tone. "I shall never blush when my pedigree is traced."

"Nor I neither, I hope. Still, I should not wonder if some one of my ancestors had disgraced himself, for there are but few families that are not cursed with a spotted sheep. But I have nothing to do with that, and ask only to be judged by what I am—not by what my progenitors have been."

"A standard that few will respect, let me tell you."

"A standard that far the largest portion of society will regard as the true one, I hope," replied Mrs. Lemmington. "But, surely, you do not intend refusing to call upon the Claytons for the reason you have assigned, Mrs. Marygold."

"Certainly I do. They are nothing but common people, and therefore beneath me. I shall not stoop to associate with them."

"I think that I will call upon them. In fact, my object in dropping in this morning was to see if you would not accompany me," said Mrs. Lemmington.

"Indeed, I will not, and for the reasons I have given. They are only common people. You will be stooping."

"No one stoops in doing a kind act. Mrs. Clayton is a stranger in the neighborhood, and is entitled to the courtesy of a call, if no more; and that I shall extend to her. If I find her to be uncongenial in her tastes, no intimate acquaintanceship need be formed. If she is congenial, I will add another to my list of valued friends. You and I, I find, estimate differently. I judge every individual by merit, you by family, or descent."

"You can do as you please," rejoined Mrs. Marygold, somewhat coldly. "For my part, I am particular about my associates. I will visit Mrs. Florence, and Mrs. Harwood, and such as move in good society, but as to your school-teachers' wives and daughters, I must beg to be excused."

"Every one to her taste," rejoined Mrs. Lemmington, with a smile, as she moved towards the door, where she stood for a few moments to utter some parting compliments, and then withdrew.

Five minutes afterwards she was shown into Mrs. Clayton's parlors, where, in a moment or two, she was met by the lady upon whom she had called, and received with an easy gracefulness, that at once charmed her. A brief conversation convinced her that Mrs. Clayton was, in intelligence and moral worth, as far above Mrs. Marygold, as that personage imagined herself to be above her. Her daughters, who came in while she sat conversing with their mother, showed themselves to possess all those graces of mind and manner that win upon our admiration so irresistibly. An hour passed quickly and pleasantly, and then Mrs. Lemmington withdrew.

The difference between Mrs. Lemmington and Mrs. Marygold was simply this. The former had been familiar with what is called the best society from her earliest recollection, and being, therefore, constantly in association with those looked upon as the upper class, knew nothing of the upstart self-estimation which is felt by certain weak, ignorant persons, who, by some accidental circumstance, are elevated far above the condition into which they moved originally. She could estimate true worth in humble garb as well as in velvet and rich satins. She was one of those individuals who never pass an old and worthy domestic in the street without recognition, or stopping to make some kind inquiry—one who never forgot a familiar face, or neglected to pass a kind word to even the humblest who possessed the merit of good principles. As to Mrs. Marygold, notwithstanding her boast in regard to pedigree, there were not a few who could remember when her grandfather carried a pedlar's pack on his back—and an honest and worthy pedlar he was, saving his pence until they became pounds, and then relinquishing his peregrinating propensities, for the quieter life of a small shop-keeper. His son, the father of Mrs. Marygold, while a boy, had a pretty familiar acquaintance with low life. But, as soon as his father gained the means to do so, he was put to school and furnished with a good education. Long before he was of age, the old man had become a pretty large shipper; and when his son arrived at mature years, he took him into business as a partner. In marrying, Mrs. Marygold's father chose a young lady whose father, like his own, had grown rich by individual exertions. This young lady had not a few false notions in regard to the true genteel, and these fell legitimately to the share of her eldest daughter, who, when she in turn came upon the stage of action, married into an old and what was called a highly respectable family, a circumstance that puffed her up to the full extent of her capacity to bear inflation. There were few in the circle of her acquaintances who did not fully appreciate her, and smile at her weakness and false pride. Mrs. Florence, to whom she had alluded in her conversation with Mrs. Lemmington, and who lived in Sycamore Row, was not only faultless in regard to family connections, but was esteemed in the most intelligent circles for her rich mental endowments and high moral principles. Mrs. Harwood, also alluded to, was the daughter of an English barrister, and wife of a highly distinguished professional man, and was besides richly endowed herself, morally and intellectually. Although Mrs. Marygold was very fond of visiting them for the mere eclat of the thing, yet their company was scarcely more agreeable to her, than hers was to them, for there was little in common between them. Still, they had to tolerate her, and did so with a good grace.

It was, perhaps, three months after Mrs. Clayton moved into the neighborhood, that cards of invitation were sent to Mr. and Mrs. Marygold and daughter to pass a social evening at Mrs. Harwood's. Mrs. M. was of course delighted; and felt doubly proud of her own importance. Her daughter Melinda, of whom she was excessively vain, was an indolent, uninteresting girl, too dull to imbibe even a small portion of her mother's self-estimation. In company, she attracted but little attention, except what her father's money and standing in society claimed for her.

On the evening appointed, the Marygolds repaired to the elegant residence of Mrs. Harwood, and were ushered into a large and brilliant company, more than half of whom were strangers even to them. Mrs. Lemmington was there, and Mrs. Florence, and many others with whom Mrs. Marygold was on terms of intimacy, besides several "distinguished strangers." Among those with whom Mrs. Marygold was unacquainted, were two young ladies who seemed to attract general attention. They were not showy, chattering girls, such as in all companies attract a swarm of shallow-minded young fellows about them. On the contrary, there was something retiring, almost shrinking in their manner, that shunned rather than courted observation. And yet, no one, who, attracted by their sweet, modest faces, found himself by their side that did not feel inclined to linger there.

"Who are those girls, Mrs. Lemmington?" asked Mrs. Marygold, meeting the lady she addressed in crossing the room.

"The two girls in the corner who are attracting so much attention?"

"Yes."

"Don't you know them?"

"I certainly do not."

"They are no common persons, I can assure you, Mrs. Marygold."

"Of course, or they would not be found here. But who are they?"

"Ah, Mrs. Lemmington! how are you?" said a lady, coming up at this moment, and interrupting the conversation. "I have been looking for you this half hour." Then, passing her arm within that of the individual she had addressed, she drew her aside before she had a chance to answer Mrs. Marygold's question.

In a few minutes after, a gentleman handed Melinda to the piano, and there was a brief pause as she struck the instrument, and commenced going through the unintelligible intricacies of a fashionable piece of music. She could strike all the notes with scientific correctness and mechanical precision. But there was no more expression in her performance than there is in that of a musical box. After she had finished her task, she left the instrument with a few words of commendation extorted by a feeling of politeness.

"Will you not favor us with a song?" asked Mr. Harwood, going up to one of the young ladies to whom allusion has just been made.

"My sister sings, I do not," was the modest reply, "but I will take pleasure in accompanying her."

All eyes were fixed upon them as they moved towards the piano, accompanied by Mr. Harwood, for something about their manners, appearance and conversation, had interested nearly all in the room who had been led to notice them particularly. The sister who could not sing, seated herself with an air of easy confidence at the instrument, while the other stood near her. The first few touches that passed over the keys showed that the performer knew well how to give to music a soul. The tones that came forth were not the simple vibrations of a musical chord, but expressions of affection given by her whose fingers woke the strings into harmony. But if the preluding touches fell witchingly upon every ear, how exquisitely sweet and thrilling was the voice that stole out low and tremulous at first, and deepened in volume and expression every moment, until the whole room seemed filled with melody! Every whisper was hushed, and every one bent forward almost breathlessly to listen. And when, at length, both voice and instrument were hushed into silence, no enthusiastic expressions of admiration were heard, but only half-whispered ejaculations of "exquisite!" "sweet!" "beautiful!" Then came earnestly expressed wishes for another and another song, until the sisters, feeling at length that many must be wearied with their long continued occupation of the piano, felt themselves compelled to decline further invitations to sing. No one else ventured to touch a key of the instrument during the evening.

"Do pray, Mrs. Lemmington, tell me who those girls are—I am dying to know," said Mrs. Marygold, crossing the room to where the person she addressed was seated with Mrs. Florence and several other ladies of "distinction," and taking a chair by her side.

"They are only common people," replied Mrs. Lemmington, with affected indifference.

"Common people, my dear madam! What do you mean by such an expression?" said Mrs. Florence in surprise, and with something of indignation latent in her tone.

"I'm sure their father, Mr. Clayton, is nothing but a teacher."

"Mr. Clayton! Surely those are not Clayton's daughters!" ejaculated Mrs. Marygold, in surprise.

"They certainly are, ma'am," replied Mrs. Florence in a quiet but firm voice, for she instantly perceived, from something in Mrs. Marygold's voice and manner, the reason why her friend had alluded to them as common people.

"Well, really, I am surprised that Mrs. Harwood should have invited them to her house, and introduced them into genteel company."

"Why so, Mrs. Marygold?"

"Because, as Mrs. Lemmington has just said, they are common people. Their father is nothing but a schoolmaster."

"If I have observed them rightly," Mrs. Florence said to this, "I have discovered them to be a rather uncommon kind of people. Almost any one can thrum on the piano; but you will not find one in a hundred who can perform with such exquisite grace and feeling as they can. For half an hour this evening I sat charmed with their conversation, and really instructed and elevated by the sentiments they uttered. I cannot say as much for any other young ladies in the room, for there are none others here above the common run of ordinarily intelligent girls—none who may not really be classed with common people in the true acceptance of the term."

"And take them all in all," added Mrs. Lemmington with warmth, "you will find nothing common about them. Look at their dress; see how perfect in neatness, in adaptation of colors and arrangement to complexion and shape, is every thing about them. Perhaps there will not be found a single young lady in the room, besides them, whose dress does not show something not in keeping with good taste. Take their manners. Are they not graceful, gentle, and yet full of nature's own expression. In a word, is there any thing about them that is 'common?'"

"Nothing that my eye has detected," replied Mrs. Florence.

"Except their origin," half-sneeringly rejoined Mrs. Marygold.

"They were born of woman," was the grave remark. "Can any of us boast a higher origin?"

"There are various ranks among women," Mrs. Marygold said, firmly.

"True. But,

The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man's the gold for a' that."

Mere position in society does not make any of us more or less a true woman. I could name you over a dozen or more in my circle of acquaintance, who move in what is called the highest rank; who, in all that truly constitutes a woman, are incomparably below Mrs. Clayton; who, if thrown with her among perfect strangers, would be instantly eclipsed. Come then, Mrs. Marygold, lay aside all these false standards, and estimate woman more justly. Let me, to begin, introduce both yourself and Melinda to the young ladies this evening. You will be charmed with them, I know, and equally charmed with their mother when you know her."

"No, ma'am," replied Mrs. Marygold, drawing herself up with a dignified air. "I have no wish to cultivate their acquaintance, or the acquaintance of any persons in their station. I am surprised that Mrs. Harwood has not had more consideration for her friends than to compel them to come in contact with such people."

No reply was made to this; and the next remark of Mrs. Florence was about some matter of general interest.

"Henry Florence has not been here for a week," said Mrs. Marygold to her daughter Melinda, some two months after the period at which the conversation just noted occurred.

"No; and he used to come almost every evening," was Melinda's reply, made in a tone that expressed disappointment.

"I wonder what can be the reason?" Mrs. Marygold said, half aloud, half to herself, but with evident feelings of concern. The reason of her concern and Melinda's disappointment arose from the fact that both had felt pretty sure of securing Henry Florence as a member of the Marygold family—such connection, from his standing in society, being especially desirable.

At the very time the young man was thus alluded to by Mrs. Marygold and her daughter, he sat conversing with his mother upon a subject that seemed, from the expression of his countenance, to be of much interest to him.

"And so you do not feel inclined to favor any preference on my part towards Miss Marygold?" he said, looking steadily into his mother's face.

"I do not, Henry," was the frank reply.

"Why not?"

"There is something too common about her, if I may so express myself."

"Too common! What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that there is no distinctive character about her. She is, like the large mass around us, a mere made-up girl."

"Speaking in riddles."

"I mean then, Henry, that her character has been formed, or made up, by mere external accretions from the common-place, vague, and often too false notions of things that prevail in society, instead of by the force of sound internal principles, seen to be true from a rational intuition, and acted upon because they are true. Cannot you perceive the difference?"

"O yes, plainly. And this is why you use the word 'common,' in speaking of her?"

"The very reason. And now, my son, can you not see that there is force in my objection to her—that she really does not possess any character distinctively her own, that is founded upon a clear and rational appreciation of abstractly correct principles of action?"

"I cannot say that I differ from you very widely," the young man said, thoughtfully. "But, if you call Melinda 'common,' where shall I go to find one who may be called 'uncommon?'"

"I can point you to one."

"Say on."

"You have met Fanny Clayton?"

"Fanny Clayton!" ejaculated the young man, taken by surprise, the blood rising to his face.

"O yes, I have met her."

"She is no common girl, Henry," Mrs. Florence said, in a serious voice. "She has not her equal in my circle of acquaintances."

"Nor in mine either," replied the young man, recovering himself. "But you would not feel satisfied to have your son address Miss Clayton?"

"And why not, pray? Henry, I have never met with a young lady whom I would rather see your wife than Fanny Clayton."

"And I," rejoined the young man with equal warmth, "never met with any one whom I could truly love until I saw her sweet young face."

"Then never think again of one like Melinda Marygold. You could not be rationally happy with her."

Five or six months rolled away, during a large portion of which time the fact that Henry Florence was addressing Fanny Clayton formed a theme for pretty free comment in various quarters. Most of Henry's acquaintance heartily approved his choice; but Mrs. Marygold, and a few like her, all with daughters of the "common" class, were deeply incensed at the idea of a "common kind of a girl" like Miss Clayton being forced into genteel society, a consequence that would of course follow her marriage. Mrs. Marygold hesitated not to declare that, for her part, let others do as they liked, she was not going to associate with her—that was settled. She had too much regard to what was due to her station in life. As for Melinda, she had no very kind feelings for her successful rival—and such a rival too! A mere schoolmaster's daughter! And she hesitated not to speak of her often and in no very courteous terms.

When the notes of invitation to the wedding at length came, which ceremony was to be performed in the house of Mr. Clayton, in Sycamore Row, Mrs. Marygold declared that to send her an invitation to go to such a place was a downright insult. As the time, however, drew near, and she found that Mrs. Harwood and a dozen others equally respectable in her eyes were going to the wedding, she managed to smother her indignation so far as, at length, to make up her mind to be present at the nuptial ceremonies. But it was not until her ears were almost stunned by the repeated and earnestly expressed congratulations to Mrs. Florence at the admirable choice made by her son, and that too by those whose tastes and opinions she dared not dispute, that she could perceive any thing even passable in the beautiful young bride.

Gradually, however, as the younger Mrs. Florence, in the process of time, took her true position in the social circle, even Mrs. Marygold could begin to perceive the intrinsic excellence of her character, although even this was more a tacit assent to a universal opinion than a discovery of her own.

As for Melinda, she was married about a year after Fanny Clayton's wedding, to a sprig of gentility with about as much force of character as herself. This took place on the same night that Lieut. Harwood, son of the Mrs. Harwood before alluded to, led to the altar Mary Clayton, the sister of Fanny, who was conceded by all to be the loveliest girl they had ever seen—lovely, not only in face and form, but loveliness itself in the sweet perfections of moral beauty. As for Lieut. Harwood, he was worthy of the heart he had won.

MY SCISSORS.

BY FRANCIS DANA GAGE.

"Good morning, Mrs. Wicks; hope I see you well, this morning."

"Well, yes, pretty well, all but my hands."

"Your hands! What's the matter with your hands; not been scalding them I hope?"

"No! worse than that; I have got them all blistered up, trying to cut out the children's fall clothes with my old scissors; I've have had 'em these ten years, and they're just as dull as a hoe, and every time I cut a roundabout, shirt, or pair of pants, I have just such a time of it. Susan Willard is sewing for me now, and I wanted to get my cutting done while my hand was in, so I just wanted to see if you would not lend me your nice large tailor shears, a day or two, for I won't do another thing with mine for a week to come."

"Really, Mrs. Wicks, I would like to accommodate you, but I am very busy with mine just now, cutting rags for my carpet, and could not possibly spare them without great inconvenience."

"Well, I don't know what I'll do; I can't cut out any more with mine, and Susan has only two weeks to stay. Do you know of any one that has a good pair?"

"No, I do not. Would it not be better for you to purchase a good pair? I could hardly get along without mine for a single day, without feeling the want of them."

"What did yours cost?"

"Two dollars and a half."

"Two dollars and a half—goodness! Mr. Wicks would no more let me have money to buy such a pair of scissors, than he'd fly."

"Oh I think you are mistaken; I have always thought Mr. Wicks very indulgent."

"There's where you are altogether mistaken. I hardly ever ask him for money, but what he says something to hurt my feelings, and I often do without things I really need, rather than have any words. Why, yes, to-day I asked him for money to get my fall trimmings for my bonnet and Rosina's, and it was all I could do to get it out of him—"

"How much did it require to fit your bonnets up for winter?"

"Only five dollars; it would cost ten you know to get us both new ones. I thought he need not have complained at fixing up the old ones."

"And you have the five dollars in your possession—"

"Yes, and we thought we would get trimmings at Grant's. That beautiful royal purple with the orange edge, it's a love of a ribbon, and so cheap, only seventy-five cents a yard."

"My dear Mrs. Wicks, let me give you a new idea. Would your husband complain if you should trim your bonnets with ribbon worth half that sum, and appropriate the balance to the purchase of a good pair of scissors?"

"No, of course he would not; but who, I'd like to know, is going to make themselves the town-talk for the sake of gratifying a husband's whims?"

"Do it to gratify yourself, to add to your own comfort. My bonnet trimmings and all will not cost me over one dollar and a half, and I don't believe the town will trouble itself one bit about it. Town-talk or no talk, you may be sure I'll never run about with my fingers in rags while I can save the price of a pair of scissors in one bonnet trimming. Now don't be offended, Mrs. Wicks; I know you really think you can't get along any other way than just as you do; but if you will only make the effort to economise in your items of dress, &c., you will soon find yourself amply supplied with all these little household conveniences, which you seem so much to want, and my word for it, your husband will not make half the objection to furnishing money for usefuls that he now does for the purchasing of non-essentials."

"Now, there is neighbor Pennymann's wife flourishing in a fifteen dollar crape shawl, but her girl complains that she has to borrow wash-tubs, weekly, and that Mrs. P. says that it is all Mr. Pennymann's fault."

"Why, Mrs. Smith, I thought you were a Woman's Rights' woman."

"And so I am; but I assure you I am no advocate for woman's injustice and folly, and while I feel that the law of the land, in common justice, greatly oppresses woman, I also feel that she oftentimes greatly oppresses herself, and lays heavier burdens upon her own heart than she herself is willing to bear, and to excuse her own weakness of purpose, her own foolish love of display, lays all the blame upon her husband, who would willingly indulge every reasonable desire, and only frowns when ungenerous demands are made upon his means."

"Well, I don't know, Mr. Wicks seems more willing to give me money for dress than anything else."

"Is not that because he does not feel at liberty to deny you any personal gratification, because he feels that he can make you happier thus than in any other way? Try the experiment, Mrs. Wicks. Tell him you will reserve half your usual expenses for household conveniences, and if he does not fill your purse with a more cheerful heart, I am much mistaken in him. Begin on the scissors, and if he makes one word of objection, I will agree to change with you for a week, and wear my hands to blisters on your old ones."

"Well, I'll try this once. Good morning."

"Good morning, Mrs. Wicks."

Mrs. Wicks went home, and when her husband came in to dinner, the first thing that took his attention was a beautiful pair of polished steel scissors, not worth less than two dollars.

"Whose are these? been borrowing again, Sarah?"

"No," replied Mrs. Wicks; "I blistered my hands, yesterday, with my old ones, and I just concluded I would wear my old, last winter trimmings, and have me a good pair of scissors for my work. Don't you think they are nice ones? I thought you would not care how I spent my money." Her voice was kinder than usual.

"Of course not," he replied. Nothing further was said. In the evening, instead of going out, he drew up his chair by the work-stand.

"Ain't you going down street?" said Rosina.

"No, I believe not to-night; I like the click of your ma's new scissors, and if I go down street, I am afraid they will lose their pleasant tone."

Mrs. Wicks did not look up: her heart was full, for just then a little roll of "royal purple with orange edge," "cheap at seventy-five cents," fell into her lap.—Ohio Farmer.

THE MOTHER OF CROMWELL.

An interesting person, indeed, was the mother of Cromwell; a woman with the glorious faculty of self-help, when other assistance failed her; ready for the demands of fortune in the extremest adverse time; of spirit and energy equal to her mildness and patience: who, with the labor of her own hands, gave dowers to five daughters, sufficient to marry them into families as honorable, but more wealthy than their own; whose single pride was honesty, and whose passion love; who preserved in the gorgeous palace, at Whitehall, the simple tastes that distinguished in the old brewery at Huntingdon: whose only care, amid all her splendors, was for the safety of her beloved son in his dangerous eminence; finally, when her care had outworn her strength, according with her whole modesty and tender history, she implored a simple burial in some country church-yard, rather than the ill-suited trappings of state and ceremony, wherewith she feared, and with reason, too, that his Highness, the Lord Protector of England, would have carried her to some royal tomb.

There is a portrait of her at Hinchildbrook, which, if it were possible, would increase the interest she inspires and the respect she claims. The mouth, so small and sweet, yet full and firm as the mouth of a hero; the large and melancholy eyes, the light, pretty hair, the expression of quiet affectionateness suffused over her face, which is so modestly developed in a satin hood, the simple beauty of the velvet cardinal she wears, and the richness of the small jewel that clasps it, seems to present before the gazer her living and breathing character. — Forrester's Statesmen of England.

BABES OF HEAVEN.

BY MRS. DENISON.

There are some infants who seem destined for Heaven from their birth. Over these the mother may smile and weep, and watch the fragile beauty of cheek and brow in vain.

Old and learned doctors may stand beside their little couches, and count the quick-beating pulse; they cannot stay the steady footsteps of death—they cannot wave him back, that angel warden of Heaven. Something is written in the blue eyes, the gentle smile, that mortals may never interpret; for them the tiny headstones stand in niches, fresh from the graver's hands. For them the little marble urns are already sculptured, and sweet spots in burial grounds lie waiting. Hug it ever so closely to the fond bosom, the favored immortal is ever in the hands of the angels, and they will claim it.

I have known a few such children. I remember, as I write, a sweet sister, who came when the bird pipes his first May song. For fifteen bright months she was spared to earth, but all who saw her gave ominous shakes of the head, and some said even with tears, "She will die."

Of all infant singers, none heard I ever sing like her. From morning till night from her twelfth month, her sweet, clear voice rang through the house. And she was neither taught this, nor paraded for her gift—but a friend coming in would be sure to hear "Old Hundred" from the singing lips of a babe who might be clinging to the chairs in her first happy essay to walk. "China," and many of the ancient melodies, were as household words to that little creature—and every day at twilight, till nearly the day she died, she would sing herself to sleep, lisping those old words:

"Life is the time to serve the Lord."

Precious angel! her life was holy service. How happy she has been these long years, up there—singing.

I had another little sister, who died at the same age. I remember a still, beautiful night, when I sat watching that sweet face—the pale hands, the laboring chest. Her mother, wearied out, had fallen into a light slumber.

Suddenly, in that dying hour, the old tune of "Sweet Home" rang out, clear, sweet, distinct. How can I describe the feeling that thrilled through all my veins, when looking at the little lips, pale and trembling, I saw them moving to the cadence of that cherished melody. There laid a babe, scarcely more than a year old, disease upon her, her temples whitening in death, singing a triumphal strain with a failing breath. No language can tell how indescribably beautiful, yet how awful was the scene. She sang it through to the last note—and her fragile form sank backward.

In the morning they were laying lightly and tenderly on her limbs the burial shroud.

I heard lately a little story, which for pathos could not be excelled.

A beautiful infant had been taught to say, (and it could say little else) "God will take care of baby."

It was seized with sickness, and at a time when both parents were hardly convalescent from a dangerous illness. Every day it grew worse, and at last was given up to die. Almost agonized, the mother prayed to be carried into the room of her darling, to give it one last embrace. Both parents succeeded in gaining the apartment, but just as it was thought the babe had breathed its last.

The mother wept aloud; and once more the little creature opened its eyes, looked lovingly up in her face—smiled, and moved its little lips.

They bent closer down.

"God will take care of baby."

Sweet, consoling words!—they had hardly ceased when the angel-spirit was in Heaven.—Olive Branch.

MY SCHOOL-GIRLS.

Bless them! Here they are, circling about me with their gay, sun-lighted faces, making my heart glad. You should see my Hettie. The tiniest, nimblest, cunningest, most graceful of them all, she is. The little thing is afflicted with some defect of sight, for which that chubby nose of hers is burdened with a pair of spectacles, and she peers out of them at me as I now write, with such an old, grandmother-like look, it undermines my dignity quite. Would you could listen to my Maria when she sings. She is all music. I never look at her but I think of sweet melodies: she never laughs or speaks, though ever so carelessly, but music comes out of it; she never moves, but motion seems inseparable from melody. Dear Maria! I wonder if she is not destined for a Jenny Lind or Madame Sontag! I hope not, though I cannot bear to look into her deep, dark eyes, and shape air-castles for her other than such as have firesides within them, and cosy home circles. I'd not like to fancy that gracefully carried head and pretty, pliant figure of hers, mere pictures to make up a public show. But, oh, how she does sing! Last spring her mother died, and poor Maria came back to the school with crape about her black hair, and a plaintiveness in her song, that made my heart ache. But when she learned to understand the real nearness of the Spiritual World, when she came to realize her own existence as a spiritual being—perhaps it is my silly partiality, but it seems to me since then, full of faults as she is, I can never hear her voice but I think—"Their angels do always behold the face of their Father which is in Heaven."

Three other Marias have I—one, a little housewife-like being, who loves best of all things in the world, the grand office of broom mistress. And oh, such dustings, such brushings, and picking up of papers! such reporting of slatternly girls! Even I—I tremble at her approach, and scramble my books into order and my crayons into their box, instinctively. My next Maria—alas, and alas! What to do with her, or what she may do with me, I know not! Now, I catch glimpses of her, her hair arranged à la Indian chief; now, she is seen caressing some hideous paper image; now, she is scampering about under the benches, startling a studious class competitor into shrieking by a grip upon her foot. Enough of her. My other Maria studies her book, and makes no friends or enemies.

Then there is my Jane with her little hands tracing such wonders on the black-board, and my Clara who cries at her failures, and laughs at her success. She cannot help it for the life of her—and then my Sarah, with her great, broad, good-humored face, making fun everywhere; and my other Sarah, the beauty. Would nobody had ever told her so, though. The knowledge has spoilt her for a school-girl—that is plain. Blessings indeed on them! My school-girls. I have not talked of my Nannie, or five Lizzies, or Ellens, or Marys. No, no—not that I forgot them. Ah, that would be impossible, for they sit here with the fire-glow upon their faces—they and a score of others, like so many heart-jewels. But I weary you already.

Here they sit, and what a bright, separate world does each one of those little beings see! Just as we see the rainbow, each one through a separate medium, and each seeing but glory and beauty. I will not look forward for coming time, moralizing with an introduction of "ten years hence," for them. Those happy little ones—Heaven forbid—but I will simply try in my poor way to keep those outward-looking eyes of theirs always clear and always looking upward. What if clouds do darken their skies in coming time, there is light forever coming from the sun, though it be behind the cloud. Ah, and their images of the world are the true ones, too, all aglow with beauty and promise as they are. It is we who see through mists. I'll not bring out my discolored world-visions to contrast with theirs. Not I; but I'll try to catch the habit of looking through their eyes, and may they ever be as clear as now.

THE DRUIDS.

BY H. COUTLAS.

The Druids were the representatives of the religion, learning and science of ancient Britain. As it was a maxim with them never to commit anything to writing, we obtain all our information about them from foreign sources, principally from the classic writings of Julius Cæsar, Strabo, and Tacitus.

From these authorities we learn that the Druids worshipped the mistletoe and the oak. The oak tree was regarded by them as the representative and special emblem of the Deity. Hence they planted groves of them, and beneath their shade they taught religion, administered justice, and communicated instruction to the people. We are aware that Druidism has been regarded as a sanguinary superstition, a terrible priestly despotism. But there is good reason to believe that this religion was once a system of pure morality and justice, and that it exercised an enlightening and beneficial influence over the people.

There is authentic evidence that the Druids taught the immortality of the soul, the existence of God, and the practice of the strictest morality and justice. They usually taught in groves of oak, which were of a circular form, and fenced round with stones. The avenues to the inner-most recesses of the grove were carefully guarded so as to prevent strangers from intruding on their solemn mysteries. The altar of the Druid consisted of three rough stones, two being placed vertically as uprights or supports, and the third stone was then placed horizontally on their summit, forming a rough, unhewn table, on which the sacrifices were offered. The sacrifices consisted of fine flour mingled with salt.

Beneath these hallowed groves, sacred to contemplation and study, the Druids administered justice and equity to the people. Against their decision there was no appeal. All who refused to abide by it were accounted impious, denied access to the altar, and placed without the protection of the laws.

The condition of the arts and sciences amongst the Druids appears to have been very humble. Their temples were generally without a roof, consisting of a circular row of stones, in the centre of which their cromlechs or rock-altars were erected. We are told that the Druids held it to be unlawful to worship the Deity under roofs, from certain sublime notions of the Divine omnipresence; but it is most probable that the extreme structural simplicity of their temples and altars originated in their want of architectural and mechanical skill.

On an extensive plain situated near the city of Salisbury, England, are to be seen the interesting remains of an ancient Druidical temple. These remains consist of several large blocks of stone, many tons in weight, which have been elevated and placed horizontally on the top of other blocks. To cut these stones and transport them from the quarry to their present elevation, certainly was impossible without a knowledge of the mechanical powers.

In astronomy and botany, the Druids appear to have made very considerable advances. We are told that they were acquainted with the fact of the sphericity of the earth, and could foretell eclipses. The circle appears to have been a favorite figure with the Druids. Their temples were generally situated on lofty eminences which commanded an extensive view of the heavens, and from which the sun, moon and planets could be observed. It is probable that the Druids were aware of the medicinal properties of plants, for they spent the greater part of their time in the recesses of mountains and groves, where the spontaneous productions of the earth presented themselves and naturally courted their attention.

The Druids were celebrated for their eloquence, and they had many opportunities for its exercise, as when they pleaded in courts of justice, or harangued in the great councils of the nation; when they addressed armies on the point of engaging in battle, at one time to inflame their courage, at another time to allay their fury. This last, though a task of great difficulty among fierce and warlike nations, they sometimes accomplished, thus bringing about a friendly settlement and a mutual adjustment of grievances.

Let not the memory of this ancient religion pass away forever from men's mind! The rude rock-altar still survives in its structural simplicity, and marks the spot where stood the consecrated groves of ancient Druidism.

THE RUNAWAY'S RETURN.

Well! here am I, after my night's walk, once more in the village where I was born. The sun is up now, and shining brightly. Things appear the same, and yet different. How is it? There was a big tree used to stand at that corner; and where is Carver's cottage?

Three days ago I landed at Portsmouth. It was on my birth-day. For ten long years have I been sailing about on the sea, and wandering about on the land. How things come over me! I am a man now; but for all that, I could sit down and cry like a child.

It seems but as yesterday since I ran away from home. It was the worst day's work that I ever did. I got up in the morning at sunrise while my father and mother were asleep. Many and many a time had I been unkind to my dear mother, and undutiful to my father, and the day before he had told me how wrong I was. He spoke kindly and in sorrow, but my pride would not bear it. I thought I would leave home. What is it that makes me tremble so now?

My father coughed as I crept along by his door, and I thought I heard my mother speak to him; so I stood a moment with my bundle in my hand, holding my breath. He coughed again. I have seemed to hear that cough in every quarter of the world.

When I had unlocked the door, my heart failed me: for my sister had kissed me over night, and told me she had something to tell me in the morning. I knew what it was: she had been knitting me a pair of garters to give me on my birth-day. I turned back, opened the door of her little room, and looked at her; but my tears fell on the bed-clothes, and I was afraid it would wake her. Half blinded, I groped down stairs.

Just as I had gently closed the door, the casement rattled above my head. I looked up and there was my mother. She spoke to me, and when I did not answer, she cried out loud to me. That cry has rung in my ears ever since; ay, in my very dreams!

As I hurried away I felt, I suppose, as Cain felt when he had murdered his brother. My father, my mother, and my sister had been kind to me; but I had been unkind to them, and in leaving them thus, I felt as if I were murdering them all.

Had I been a robber, I could not have felt more guilty. But what do I say that for? I was robbing them of their peace. I was stealing that from them that the whole world could not make up to them; but on I went. O that I could bring back that hour!

The hills look as purple as they did when I used to climb up them. The rooks are cawing among the high elm-trees by the church. I wonder whether they are the same rooks! There's a shivering comes over me as I get nearer home. Home! I feel there is no home for me.

Here is the corner of the hedge, and the old seat; but father is not sitting there. There is the patch of ground that my sister called her garden, but she is not walking in it. And yonder is the bed-room window; my mother is not looking out of it now. That cry! that cry!

I see how it is. There are none of them here, or things would not look as they do. Father would not let the weeds grow in this fashion, nor the thatch fall in, and my mother and my sister never stuffed that straw through the broken panes.

I'll rap at the door, anyhow. How hollow it sounds? Nobody stirs. All is as silent as the grave. I'll peep in at the window. It's an empty house, that's clear. Ten long years! How could I expect it to be otherwise? I can bear hard work, and hunger and thirst! but I can't bear this!

The elderberry is in blossom as it was when I ran away, and the woodbine is as fresh as ever, running up to the window that my mother opened to call after me. I could call after her now, loud enough to be heard a mile, if I thought she would hear me.

It's of no use stopping here! I'll cross the church-yard, and see if the clerk lives where he did; but he won't know me. My cheek was like the rose when I went away; but the sun has made it of another color. How narrow the path is between the grass! it used to be wider, at least I thought so: no matter. The old sun-dial, I see, is standing there yet.

The last time I was in that church, my father was with me; and the text was, "My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother." Prov. i, 8. O, what a curse do we bring upon us when we despise God's Holy Word!

My uncle lies under the yew-tree there, and he had a grave-stone. Here it is. It's written all over now, quite to the bottom: "In memory of Humphrey Haycroft." But what is the name under? "Walter Haycroft!" My father! my father! "And Mary his wife." O! my mother! and are you both gone? God's hand is heavy on me! I do feel it in my heart and soul!

And there's another name yet, and it's freshly cut: "Esther Haycroft, their daughter: aged 24." My father! my mother! and my sister! Why did not the sea swallow me up when I was wrecked! I deserved it. What is the world to me now! I feel, bitterly feel, the sin of disobedience; the words come home to me now: "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." Prov. xxx, 17.

But yet I recollect how my dear father and mother used to point us to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. "There is no refuge beside," said my mother; "Christ is able and willing to save." I paid but little attention to these words once; O may I never forget them now!

An Irishman having arrived from Dublin at the house of a respectable merchant in the borough, and having left Ireland three weeks before, brought with him a basket of eggs; his friend asked him why he took the trouble to bring eggs from Ireland to England? "Becase," said he, "I am fond of them new laid, and I know these to be so."

VITAL PHENOMENA.

"To Daimonion," or the Spiritual Medium. Its Nature Illustrated by the History of its Uniform Manifestation when unduly excited. In Twelve Familiar Letters to an Enquiring Friend. By Traverse Oldfield. Boston: Gould & Lincoln. (For sale by Zieber, and by Smith & English.) The assumptions, suggestions, and admonitions of this little volume are worthy of thoughtful consideration. The author, while admitting the facts in relation to what are called "Spiritual Rappings," and the whole series of like phenomena, rejects the idea of spiritual agency altogether, and assumes, as the cause of the surprising results which are obtained, the excitement and transmission of nervous energy, animal spirits, vital fluid, or whatever else we may term the medium of communication between soul and body—that medium or fluid which runs from the brain to the ultimates of the body, and produces actions in instant obedience to the will. The writer says:—

Less than a century ago, Franklin was first making his noble experiments in electricity, which proved satisfactorily to all thinking men, that the bolts of heaven were no supernatural uncontrollable power, but a natural agent, which could be guided with an iron rod, away from our exposed heads. Certainly it would have been presumption in a mere novice in that study to have attempted to theorize on any phenomena witnessed. Yet, bear witness, it would not have been presumption, it would have been sound discretion and commendable boldness, if even a common observer had stepped forward in the circle of his friends, awed by the terrible peals of a thunderstorm, and had said, "Friends, be we trustful and fearless; we may not explain the terrific agent rending the heavens and earth around us, but we may be sure it is a natural agent, which we should not dread." So, too, may not the spiritual phenomena, so mysterious and even awing, seen around us now, be surely referred to the action of our own nervous organism, though no scientific explanation be attempted?

Tables are moved by a mysterious power, when a circle of interested spectators, with a medium, are seated around it. But remark this, Charles. Stretch forth your arm, and grasp a heavy weight and raise it. How mighty that power put forth! Trace it back to its origin, and how wonderful! You willed to perform that act. Instantly in your brain, as in a Leyden jar, a nervous influence was generated, which, coursing along your nerves as on metallic wires, entered your muscles, and there the mere shrinking of the fibres of a little muscle, the shortening of a small cord, drew up the large weight in your hand. How immeasurable, how unaccountable, such a power! And now think of that circle around the table. When they first sit calmly down, no movement is seen; none can be produced. But when, for a few moments, in intense mental action, a nervous energy has been generated in the frame of each, until, like a circle of Leyden jars, a whole battery is surcharged, and there are negatives as well as positives in the circle, who can wonder if currents of nervous influence should leap over from one to the other, and if tables, chairs, or anything else intervening, should be moved? We should not wonder at any phenomena which might show themselves under such circumstances. We should only fear that, like inexperienced experimenters in electricity, we should thoughtlessly inflict upon ourselves an incurable injury. Our kind Creator has given me this mighty and wondrous nervous agency to be carefully used as the steady mover of my body's machinery. If I overcharge myself with it, if I strain the vital organs which generate it, I may weaken my own energies for life.

Mysterious rappings give response to our thoughts, uttered or merely conceived, as we sit around the table. This, however, is not a new exhibition of what we must regard an over-excitement of our own nervous energy. These raps are in nature not unlike those electric crackings heard amid the whizzing bands of factory wheels, and the electric snapping heard in cold weather from the skin of animals when stroked, and from our person in drawing off a woollen under-garment. Physiologists and ordinary historians have recorded numberless instances of these electric-like shocks and reports experienced by persons of an excitable nervous temperament.

The existence of this nervous fluid, and its transmission from living bodies to inanimate substances, and action thereon, governed by the will, is a fact which numberless experiments have testified. Three or four persons surrounding a small, light table, can, by joining hands, and pointing the fingers downward, near to, or touching the table, cause it, in a little while, to rise up, attracted by their hands; and, what is more remarkable, move from side to side, or in any direction, in obedience to the expressed wish of any one of the company. The hands are joined by linking the little fingers. The same curious result is obtained by placing the hands upon the table, and letting them remain there for some time. These are phenomena of daily production in hundreds of instances. Those who make the experiment, describe the physical sensations as peculiar, and resembling those produced by the reception of a galvanic current. Afterwards, they are much exhausted, as if they had parted with a large amount of nervous energy.

The author of the book now referred to, gives many facts in ancient and modern times, and from among all nations—the Eastern especially—which illustrate his position, and closes with the following summing up and exhortation, which we earnestly commend to all who are engaged in, or tempted to begin these experiments:—

It is dangerous to experiment with our own vital organism; especially with our nervous energy. The whole history of similar developments in distant ages and nations seems to indicate that these manifestations are the working of our nervous organism. The whole process of their excitement, the character of the persons affected, the mode of inducing the influence by forming a circle of positives and negatives, the sitting in fixed abstraction, during which the generated nervous influence must accumulate in the system, as in an isolated Leyden jar, the correspondence of the character of the responses given to the inquiries made, the whole process of the excitement, confirms the conviction that the agent is the nervous principle. Most of all, the effect of this influence on the persons practising it, is precisely that of other modes of nervous excitement. The poet, the orator, writing and speaking under a strong self-aroused enthusiasm, the raving Sibyl, the mesmerizer, the practiser of the spiritual rappings, all alike find a nervous exhaustion to be the result.

Ever since these letters to you were commenced, Charles, other minds, studying the mysteries which are now beginning to produce an alarming and Salem-like excitement in our community, have been tending to the same track of thought which we have been pursuing. There has just come from the press, for instance, a work on the "Philosophy of Mysterious Agents." Though differing in many vital points from this author, we may, with Cicero, rejoice when extreme theories meet in their practical conclusions. The justness of our main position, that a possible cause, shown by history to be conformed to universal facts, is a practical proof that these manifestations are natural,—this position is confirmed from Herschel, who says that "the detection of a possible cause must lead" either to "a real cause" or to "an abstract law of nature." That these mysterious manifestations are "facts," that the experience of them depends in part on one's nervous "organism," and that the agent through which they are produced is "not electricity," but like it in some of its modes of action, are all intimated. The cases cited, though all of the present day, are selected from those examined in France, Germany and elsewhere, by scientific men; and they are all in harmony with the extended history which it has been our chief aim to trace. They are manifestly the undue, the dangerous excitement of our "nervous principle."

Now, Charles, it is dangerous to experiment thus with our nervous principle. It is placed within us by the Creator, to be the steady, constant, and mighty, but perfectly controllable mover of the body, which is now the mind's machinery. If I use it carefully, never overcharging the delicate organs in which it is generated, and by which it is conducted through my frame, all will last and keep time like clock-work. Let me allow myself to excite this influence till it overflows and escapes from my fingers, or other organs, in snaps, like electricity from the bands of a factory-wheel, or till it sets my arm to quivering in ungovernable spasms, and I shall find that I might as safely try the experiment of over-heating and over-straining a steam-boiler. Mark the invariable result of any undue mental excitement; and especially of a persevering attendance on the circles now so common in our community. On first entering, no impression is made upon us. Soon, however, our nervous organism begins to feel the general impulse. There is a magnetic crawling and creeping sensation in the larger muscles, as of the arm; till it increases as we become more impressed. As we daily come in to join the circle, the influence is not felt till we have waited for its generation; and then, every time, more readily and more powerfully is it excited; till raps echo for us, and the table moves at our will. And now the confirmed "medium" cannot rid himself of the influence when away from the circle. He is nervous. All his senses being unnaturally acute, he naturally and necessarily hears strange sounds, sees strange sights, and feels strange sensations. His mind being disturbed in its calm working, he cannot fix his thoughts on his business, and he is all unsettled. His moral affections soon feel the influence. In the circle intent on spiritual manifestations, religion was all his theme; but at home he speaks hastily, often harshly; he feels conscious that the ties of his attachment to those who should be most dear to him are weakening; and he finds his impressions of duty to his family, and friends and neighbors growing blunted and dimmed. Finally, his religious nature feels the searing blight; his faith is all afloat, rocking and tossing; the anchor of his hope is broken off at the flukes; and driven starless and havenless by every wind of doctrine, even the white wings of his Christian charity, which once bore him to every chamber of suffering, are now riven as by a pestilential gale. Ere he is aware, he is lost. You would be surprised, Charles, to see how the most accurate students of the human mind, even the Arabian philosophers, have described the dangerous influence arising from these causes; ranking it as a diseased mental bias, as much to be guarded against as a tendency to pulmonary consumption. I would sooner experiment with my digestive organs, or my blood-vessels, than with my nervous principle; for, the body's derangement is less fearful than that of the mind. I beg of you, Charles, think of this, if you have yielded to craving curiosity in following up these experiments. Be wise before it is too late.

But, what is far more important, as much so as society is more important than an individual, remember, Charles, that all these excitements are epidemics. Wide-spread excitements of a nervous nature go and come in waves, ebbing and flowing like the tide, swelling with every breeze, and rolling on till they dash and break in terrific ruin. Using the fearful figure of the pestilence, such men as Virgil and Tertullian describe the sweep of deranging excitements in their day. Mental disease, like any contagious disease, prevails when the whole atmosphere and the general condition of the individual system is prepared for it. A whole community, like that of Paris, in the days of Robespierre, may be infected with overmental excitement bordering on mental derangement. Especially is this true of that species of nervous excitement which leads to an oversight of the link uniting matter and spirit, and to a conviction that the natural is supernatural. As in the case of the Salem witchcraft, and a thousand similar scenes in other lands and ages, there is a reality in some of these manifestations which startles observing and intelligent men, and awes the less experienced. Though thinking and learned men may themselves rest calm in the assurance that the mystery is the working of the God of nature, yet the difficulty they have in explaining their own impressions only excites the more those never accustomed to trace effects to their causes. Go read, Charles, Brattle's letter in the very midst of the rising tide of the Salem witchcraft excitement; and see how a strong, clear mind may itself rise above and personally breast the rushing, careering sweep of popular excitement, while, nevertheless, the blood is chilled with trembling anxiety for those tossed at its mercy; with whom reason and persuasion have utterly lost their influence. Read again that letter, Charles; for we may see its re-enactment. Every breath may add to the tempest brewing; every drop will add to the dashing billow. As noble Brattle, with a burning pen, quoted, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" It is a fearful responsibility to gratify one's own curiosity in following up these manifestations, at the hazard of awakening a general tendency of the popular mind which soon cannot be reasoned with or persuaded.
